a great principle under which all army prize would be distributed in future. The actions they were discussing took place exactly six years ago; they had not yet determined the parties who were to settle the prize roll, and when they got that length how many of the men entitled would have died or disappeared? The other day Sir G. Whitlock told him that one of the things which pained him most since his return to this country was that men came to him begging for charity whom he knew to be entitled to share this prize money. He asked the House not to be led away by recollections of the splendid services of this or that man into doing an act of injustice to the whole British army, into establishing a precedent certain to become a leading case hereafter, or into perpetuating that system of delay from which the army already had so grievously suffered. He trusted that the case he had presented was sufficient to show that it was unjust and unnecessary to keep these parties in suspense any longer. They now asked the House of Commons to interfere and intercede with the Crown. They said they had undergone two trials—one when the opinion of the Law Officers was taken, which they knew to be in their favour, and another when the Royal Commission, composed chiefly of general officers, examined the subject. Both these tribunals had, in effect, decided in their favour. They trusted that it would be unnecessary to subject them to any further expense and delay by referring it to any judicial tribunal. Still, if the House thought the matter doubtful, they wished it to be investigated by an open tribunal, in which they would have an opportunity of examining and cross-examining witnesses and making their own statements. If there was one thing Englishmen loved it was fair play. They would always accept a defeat with good humour if it came to them fairly; but if there was the slightest suspicion that they had not been allowed a full and fair hearing, there would necessarily be discontent and dissatisfaction on the part, he would not say of the officers, but of the soldiers. Last year the noble Lord at the head of the Government thought he had reflected upon him in the observations he (Sir Stafford Northcote) made on the subject. So far from that he had never desired to say anything that reflected either upon the noble Lord or his Government. He knew that the Government had paid their best attention to the subject. It was not, however, practicable for a Government to deal satisfactorily with all the details of such a case, and it was impossible that their decision should command the same confidence as an inquiry before a court of law. There would be no difficulty in such an investigation. The captors and all persons having claims might send in their petitions to the Crown, which had power to refer the petitions under the Act of Will. IV. to the High Court of Admiralty. The decision of such a court could not fail to give satisfaction, and he could not conclude without entreating Her Majesty's Government to consider whether those parties had not been kept long enough in painful suspense under the expectation that their claims would have been long since satisfied; and whether, in the interests of common justice and fair play, this matter should not be settled with the least further delay possible, and according to the mode which he had ventured respectfully to suggest. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving his Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to proceed in the distribution of the Banda and Kirwee Booty, upon the principle of actual capture, as recommended in the Report of the Royal Commission on Army Prize; and, should there be any dispute as to the troops entitled upon that principle to share in the distribution, to refer the question to some competent judicial tribunal,"—(Sir Stafford Northcote,)
—instead thereof.

Question proposed "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I must, in the first place, say that I think the Government and the House are much indebted to the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North) for the proposal he made last year that a Royal Commission should be appointed to investigate this question of army prize money. We adopted that suggestion with great readiness, and I think the Report shows that it was desirable to appoint a Commission to investigate the matter. No doubt great delays take place in the distribution of army prize money—delays that, in many instances, might by better arrangements be prevented. We were glad to carry into effect the recommendations of the Commission so far as they belong to the functions of the Government. I wish at the outset to state for the satisfaction of the hon. Gentleman that, after a full consideration of this matter, and of the difficulties that surround it, I have come to the decision that it will be desirable to give orders that the question shall be referred to the Court of Admiralty. There are three authorities that might decide in a matter of this kind, and of these the worst is that which was pressed upon us last Session—namely, this House. We all know that when questions affecting the interests of individuals come to be considered in this House there is no limit to the private canvass and the ex parte statements that may be made by parties interested, and which have a great effect upon the minds of hon. Members. Indeed, the very cheers which we sometimes hear in this House are a sure indication of what has been done out of the House to influence the minds of hon. Members. Now, a great deal of misunderstanding arises in all reasoning from the use of words which are capable of doubtful and ambiguous meaning, and the first thing when reasoning on any question is to attempt to sift the meaning of the words you employ. There are two words employed in this matter which are of doubtful and ambiguous meaning, and by which hon. Members may be misled—the words actual capture and constructive capture. In naval operations it is more easy to apply these words with certainty than in military operations. A ship is a single unit. A squadron may also be said to be a single unit. And when a capture is made by some ship or by a squadron there is no doubt that it is an actual capture, and any ship being out of sight or hull down in the offing cannot justly be deemed as having operated in the capture. But in military matters the case is essentially different. You may say that which is fairly contended by some that an army is a unit, and that you must deal with it as such; that captures made by any part of an army in a campaign should be thrown into a single fund, and ought to be divided among the whole of the army engaged in the campaign. Many reasons may be given in support of that view. The objection is, that when you come to divide prize money among the whole of a large force, the amount for each is frequently so small that it is hardly worth accepting, and that it is better to give the prize money to the individuals actually engaged in the operations. The former plan is adopted with regard to medals.

When an army gains a great victory the medals are given not only to those who were under fire, but to those who were in the reserve, and who were not actually engaged in the operations by which the victory was gained. The whole army is considered as one mass, and the whole are rewarded according to the part which may have been assigned to them. This question resolves itself into who were the actual captors? If you carry the matter to its logical conclusion, the actual captors are not the whole division or column by which the town is taken. The actual captors of the treasure are the company or regiment that happen to break open the door and take the booty. You are therefore driven by the necessities of the case to adopt the principle of what is called constructive capture. I will show the House how the principle of actual capture might, in some cases, apply most unjustly. Here are three columns, say, all acting under the orders of the general in chief, according to a plan sketched out by him, and all co-operating in the execution of that plan. The right hon. Gentleman has argued that these columns were not co-operating because they were not under the orders of either of the three generals commanding them. But that is not at all necessary for the purposes of co-operation. It is not necessary to show that General Whitlock was under the command of Sir Hugh Rose to prove that his force was co-operating with the column of Sir Hugh Rose. Each column was under the command of Lord Clyde, each was performing a duty assigned to it by Lord Clyde, and the duty of each was to support and co-operate with the other. Suppose, and it is not far from the reality, that the central column of these three gained a great victory over the enemy, and by driving him back rendered defenceless a town within reach of the right hand column, which had taken no part in the victory gained by the central column. The enemy, however, being driven away, the right hand column falls on the town and takes possession of all the booty. According to the doctrine of actual capture, these troops, who did nothing towards gaining the victory, would get all the booty, while the other column, which did all the fighting, would get nothing. That would be the result of a strict adherence to the technical doctrine. It would be another illustration of the principle sic vos non vobis, that those should have no share in the booty who had done all the fighting. I will not follow the hon. Baronet into the details of the case. He has argued it very ably as the advocate of one party. However, I retain my opinion, I have looked at the case with a good deal of attention, and my opinion certainly is that in fairness and justice all the parties who claim ought to share in the booty. But I am willing to waive that opinion and to refer the whole matter to the Court of Admiralty, under the power which allows this reference to be made, and it will be for that tribunal, after hearing the parties, as the hon. Baronet said, in open court, to pronounce a decision founded upon an accurate examination of the facts and details which will be brought out before them. That decision I am sure will be far more satisfactory to the parties and to the public than any arbitrary decision of the Treasury, and much more satisfactory than any vote of this House founded upon a canvass by those interested, and upon the imperfect knowledge which hon. Members must have of these intricate details. I have already given directions to this effect, and trust that the course proposed will be satisfactory to the hon. Baronet. As to the proposal that we should determine nakedly that the actual captors should be in all cases alone entitled, I should say that if you were to establish any rule, it should be that troops which indirectly contribute to the capture should be admitted to share the booty. But all these cases must be dependent upon an infinite variety of circumstances, admitting accordingly of an infinite variety of interpretations; and, therefore, I am of opinion that in all cases where any doubt exists it will be better to refer them to the determination of the High Court of Admiralty, to give what they think a just and proper award under the circumstances. I hope, therefore, that, satisfied with what I have said, the hon. Baronet will not press to a division his Resolution, the main point of which will, in fact, be gained by the directions already given.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he was willing to withdraw his Resolution upon the understanding that the question would be referred to the High Court of Admiralty. He wished to know, at the same time, whether there would be any objection to state the form of reference? He understood that the orders had already been given, and, if so, he should like to hear in what terms.

Viscount Palmerston

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he had already directed that the case should be so referred, but the particular form of reference had not yet been determined. About this, however, he presumed there would be no difficulty.

COLONEL SYKES considered there should be some definite law to guide the decision in these cases. At all events, there was no doubt that the Banda and Kirwee booty ought to have been distributed to the captors long since.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, that before the reference was finally made to the Court of Admiralty, the terms of it ought to be seen, because, unless some definite question was referred to them, the Court might say that it was matter of prerogative upon which they could not decide.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON intimated that he would communicate the terms of the reference to the hon. Baronet.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

REGISTRATION OF TITLES IN IRELAND.

ADDRESS MOVED.

MR. SCULLY said, he rose to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, for a Commission to inquire and report as to the best system of registering titles to land in Ireland, to frame a measure for that purpose, and to consider and report upon the creation of transferable debentures upon land in Ireland. He had brought the matter publicly forward some fifteen years before; in fact he entered Parliament principally for the purpose of introducing the subject, and he hoped to remain in that House until his object had been attained. Although he had confined the Commission to Ireland, he should not have the least objection to extend it to the Empire. Ireland, however, had usually been the pioneer in these important reforms, and possessed some machinery for carrying them out that did not exist in this country. There was an obvious distinction between the registration of titles and the registration of deeds and assurances. The registration of deeds spoke for itself. One either put upon the register the entire deed, which was then called an enrolment, or an abstract of the deed, which was called a memorial. That system existed only partially in England—namely, in Yorkshire and Middlesex, but it was general throughout Ireland, and was found the cause of great expense. The registration of titles was a very different matter. It was known that in the case of stock and shares, certain persons were entered as owners in the books of the bank, or of a company, and they could then transfer without any investigation of title. It had often been asked why there should be more difficulty in transferring £100,000 of landed property than there was in the transfer of £100,000 invested in the funds or in railways. Well, in the Bill which he brought forward in 1853, he claimed to be the originator of a new system which was adapted, in his opinion, to supply that want, and which had formed the basis of the plans since submitted to Parliament. He proposed that it should be open to the landowner to have his land brought under the operation of the Act, and submit his title to a preliminary investigation. If the Court were satisfied that a prima facie right to the land had been made out, a full investigation of the title might be ordered, and if that were satisfactory the owner obtained a declaration of indefeasible title, good against the whole world. The title would be registered, a certificate of his indefeasible title would be given, and then the land would be transferable, like money in the funds or railway shares, by entry in the books of the office, or of the tribunal constituted for the purpose of carrying out the new system. The Bill was read a second time in 1853, and Lord Cranworth's Bill for the Registration of Assurances having come down from the Lords, both were referred to a Select Committee. That Committee could not go into all the details of the matter; but it distinctly condemned the proposal to register deeds, and recommended that a Commission should be appointed to inquire into the subject of registration of title. A Commission was accordingly appointed in January, 1854. Several plans were laid before the Commissioners, who sent out questions to leading members of the legal profession in this country and Ireland; but the Commission was not commissioned to frame any measure itself. There were three courses, any one of which might be adopted. First, the Government might bring in a Bill on their own responsibility; and if they undertook to do so he should leave the question in their hands. But he saw no likelihood of that. On the contrary, it seemed certain that they did not intend to introduce any measure on the subject, during that Session at least. The second course which might be adopted was that of bringing in a Bill himself. He did not, however, think that any measure emanating from a private Member would be likely to be adopted. It might be read a first and second time, and referred to a Select Committee. But could a Select Committee grapple with the details, and do the business in such a manner as to secure for the country a simple and useful measure? He feared not. There were hon. Members in the House fully competent to deal with the question in all its details; but could such men as the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns) and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside) afford the time necessary for the discharge of such a task in the middle of the Session of Parliament? Besides, by having a Select Committee they would exclude a number of very eminent men who were authoritative on the subject—the Irish Master of the Rolls, Mr. Napier, and Judges Longfield and Hargreave, for instance. The third course was the appointment of a Commission. What would a new Commission have to do? A very respectable amount of work. A good deal of experience had been acquired since the last Commission concluded its labours; and that Commission did not examine into the foreign systems of registration. The Commission might very well inquire into the foreign systems of registration, and before the next Session, by means of questions circulated through our diplomatic agents, they might obtain all the information necessary on that part of the subject. The Commissioners might also go through the different Bills which had been brought forward, some of which had passed into law, and some of which had not. They might examine into the legislation of 1862, and see how far it was applicable for Ireland. The secretary of the Commission might be directed, under the superintendence of the Commissioners, to frame a Bill. He would probably do it as efficiently as any ordinary draughtsman, and the expense would be no greater. The House was perhaps not aware of the large number of Bills which had been passed on the subject [the hon. Gentleman exhibited a large packet of them]; but they were far too numerous for a Select Committee to deal with. A Commission alone could go through them effectively, selecting from each what was good in it, and framing a comprehensive measure. An important point for the consideration of the Commission—if it should be appointed—was how to combine complete facility of transfer with due protection against fraud, for he was quite ready to admit that, unless at least as much security were given as was now afforded, this country would not be prepared to adopt a system which would make land easily transferable, however desirable that system might be in itself. The Commissioners, however, who some years ago inquired into the subject, were of opinion that adequate protection could be provided, while he himself was of opinion that it could be better attained by other means than those which they had pointed out. It had, he might add, been said that there was no precedent for the issue of a Commission to prepare a Bill, but the mere fact of novelty was no argument. If a thing was right to be done, it ought to be done, whether the particular method was a novelty or not. But there was a precedent for his proposal in the Report of a Commission which had been appointed, on the recommendation of a second Commission on the subject, to prepare a body of law for India. He might quote many other eminent authorities in Ireland, but as most of them had given evidence before the Commission which inquired into the subject, he would not trouble the House with any further reference to their opinions. A movement had lately been set on foot in Ireland similar to that which commenced in the year 1851. Many large landed proprietors and eminent merchants took a great interest in the subject, and a short time ago a meeting was held in Dublin, which was largely attended, at which resolutions were passed declaring the necessity of the adoption of an improved system of conveyancing, and expressing approval of what was called the “Torrens system” of registration, which it was stated had succeeded very well in Australia. For his own part, he did not entirely approve that system, but thought that with certain improvements it might be made the basis of a good system of registration. At the time that the measure for which he was himself responsible was in preparation he issued a pamphlet—a copy of which was still available for any Member taking an interest in the subject, and among the replies which it elicited was one from an authority, if possible, higher than any he had referred to. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in acknowledging the receipt of the pamphlet on Free Trade in Land, said, that on his own limited scale he had every reason to desire a thorough reform and simplification of our system as to the transfer of real property, while, on public grounds, he felt the question to be not only ripe, but urgent. Justice towards the land demanded a change, and, as far as he was able to lend a helping hand in a matter beyond his immediate Department, assistance on his part should be freely and zealously rendered. He was quite sure that some day or other the question would pass into the hands of the right hon. Gentleman, and he looked with confidence for the fulfilment of that pledge. In the meantime, all he asked for was the appointment of a Royal Commission, which would investigate the different schemes, and report in favour of that which they thought most desirable. The Government would not be bound by their decision, but it would show the country that there was a disposition to give effect to its wishes, and he did not believe that any branch of the legal profession in Ireland would stand in the way. Objections might be urged to any scheme; if there were 100 clauses in a Bill, there would no doubt be 100 misunderstandings of them. But that was the true way to settle the question, and he cheerfully relinquished any preference he might entertain for his own measure, to which he had given years of thought and labour, besides submitting it to the most competent men. He had no personal interest in the matter, except as an Irish landowner anxious to improve the value of property. As regarded land debentures he did not ask the Government to bring in a Bill on that subject. But no measure for the simplification of title would be complete unless attention at least were given to the subject of charges on land. A step in the right direction had been made during the Session, when a Bill for the investment of securities was passed through that House and sent to the Lords, but Lord Redesdale stopped it, and very properly turned it into a public Bill. In conversation with his Lordship he suggested that the advantages of that measure ought not to be confined to companies. It was well known that men of great authority in Ireland had pronounced in favour of some such plan as he had suggested, and the Commission of 1854, although they did not recommend a system of land debentures, yet they pointed out that there were facilities for trying such a system in Ireland, where strong opinions had been expressed in its favour. The House would remember that in 1862 two Bills for the creation of transferable debentures upon land in Ireland were brought in, one by himself and the other by the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin. Both those Bills had relation to the subject which he had now brought under the consideration of the House, and they were read a second time and were then referred to a Select Committee, but, owing to some unfortunate fatality, that Committee never sat. It was most important at the present time to inquire into the systems of land registration and of land debentures, and therefore he trusted the Government would consent to his Motion in its exact terms.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to issue a Commission to inquire and report as to the best system for Registering Titles to Land in Ireland, and to frame a measure for that purpose; also to consider and report as to the creation of transferable Debentures upon Land in Ireland,"—(Mr. Scully),

—instead thereof.

MR. O'HAGAN (THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND) said, it was quite impossible to exaggerate the importance of the subject which had been so ably brought before the House by the hon. and learned Member. He thought, too, that the subject was properly brought forward by the hon. and learned Member, who had distinguished himself by his zealous and persevering efforts in support of a principle which at one time did not seem likely to obtain much support. He did not intend to follow his hon. and learned Friend through all the details of his speech, but he might say that there was scarcely a principle laid down, or a position taken up by the hon. and learned Gentleman in which he (Mr. O'Hagan) did not agree. He believed that the establishment of a system of land transfer in Ireland, making the conveyance of land simple, speedy, and cheap, was a great necessity. There might be differences of opinion as to the effects of free trade upon Ireland, but one thing was certain, that that country was entitled to the benefit of free trade in land. There existed in Ireland a strong feeling upon the subject. The corporations of Dublin and other towns were united upon it, and the landed gentry, with the Duke of Leinster at their head, had also discussed it. He might further point out that there existed in Ireland special facilities for trying an experiment such as that recommended by his hon. and learned Friend. There was there a Landed Estates Court, presided over by Judges as enlightened and as able as any in the world. That Court had worked effectively and well for the people of Ireland, and it had laid the foundation, and had supplied the machinery for working a system of cheap and speedy transfer of land. That being so, and the principle being generally accepted, all they had to do was to see whether the principle could be carried out safely and without injury to any interest of the country. The proposed system would produce a great social revolution as far as landed property was concerned, and it would change the relations of different classes in the country. It might be expected that one result would be that the capital which was dammed up in Ireland might be let loose, and that through the instrumentality of a system of cheap transfer of land, a class might be created which Ireland sorely needed—a class of yeomen having an interest in the soil. There were a variety of projects to be considered. There was the plan of Mr. Torrens, which had undoubtedly succeeded in Australia. But then it must be remembered that there was a great difference between the simple relations of property in a new country and the complicated relations of an old country. It was, therefore, necessary to observe great caution in applying the principle to Ireland. He did not say that Mr. Torrens's system was not applicable to Ireland, but that great care should be exercised in dealing with the subject. Then, again, there had been a Bill introduced which contemplated the creation of a new machinery, a recording court and officers. The Government must consider whether there did not exist already in Ireland machinery adapted to the purpose. The question which the Government had to consider was, whether it was absolutely necessary that a new Commission should be appointed. A Commission, composed of extremely able men, had applied their full attention to the subject for a series of years within a recent period. He did not think they could constitute a Commission of more enlightened men, or that a Report could be obtained from those more deserving the confidence of Parliament and the country, than that they were already in possession of. It was the less necessary that they should go into any new inquiry, because measures had since been introduced in England by men of the highest ability, and they had an opportunity of seeing how these measures had worked. The matter then stood thus—a deputation had waited on the Lord Lieutenant for the purpose of impressing on his Excellency and the Government the necessity of considering the subject, and especially in connection with the scheme of Mr. Torrens. His Excellency had referred the memorial to the Law Officers of Ireland, and accordingly, along with his learned Friend the Solicitor General, he had been applying his mind as diligently as he could to the subject, and he was inclined to think it was quite possible to frame a measure with the information they already possessed, which might be satisfactory to the House and to the country. Perhaps, too, it would be more becoming, more according to precedent and principle, that such a measure, involving such large interests and consequences to the community, should be introduced on the responsibility of the Law Officers and of the Government itself. They had the matter under consideration; already a measure was more or less in progress, and he trusted, either before the end of that Session or at the beginning of the next, he should be able to introduce a measure at all events worthy of the consideration of the House. He had already enough of legal matters before him for the present, and it was manifest they could not reasonably entertain the hope of successful action that Session. It would be quite competent for the House to say when they saw the Bill, whether on the face of it there appeared any necessity for further inquiry. They would apply their minds to the subject as best they could, and submit their measure to the consideration of the House.

MR. MONSELL said, he entirely approved every portion of his right hon. and learned Friend's speech, except the last few sentences, which seemed to doubt the possibility of introducing a measure during the Session. The question had excited the highest interest not only of the legal profession, but also among the landed proprietors of Ireland, and considering the enormous importance of some measure for simplifying and cheapening the transfer of land, looking especially to the frightful emigration going on in Ireland, and the distrust and anxiety which pervaded the mind of everybody connected with land in that country, the subject ought to be taken up with as little delay as possible, to see if some means could not be suggested for increasing employment and developing the resources of Ireland. If his right hon. and learned Friend had, as he understood, the skeleton of a measure prepared, why should he not at once lay it on the table, with a view, after it was read a second time, to refer it to a Select Committee—not for the purpose of taking evidence, but to go through its various clauses and render it as perfect a measure as possible? A Royal Commission, he thought, would be the best mode of shelving the question.

MR. BUTT said, he regretted that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should consider it necessary to oppose the issuing of a Commission. The question was one of the first importance, and any measure would require the greatest care and attention on the part of the framers of it. He wished, at the same time, to bear testimony to the great ability with which his hon. Friend had introduced the subject. He had himself been instructed by his hon. Friend in the true principles which ought to regulate their legislation on the subject. He had, many years ago, laid a Bill on the table which he was perfectly ready to submit again, and there was little necessity to make any changes in it, notwithstanding all the improvements which Mr. Torrens had suggested. He did not see why a Royal Commission should not be appointed, which might inquire into the subject and report long before the next Session, and then a Select Committee could be appointed to proceed with the inquiries, and perfect any Bill that might be introduced in that House.

MR. BRADY said, it would be highly satisfactory to the public in Ireland if the Government would that Session lay on the table a Bill on the subject. He quite agreed that the thanks of the House and the country were due to his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Cork for his exposition of the subject. He trusted the hon. and learned Attorney General would lay a Bill on the table during the Session that it might be considered during the recess. In the county with which he was connected there was hardly a landlord with whom he had had any communication who had not urged him to support any measure that would lead to a proper registration of titles to land.

MR. O'HAGAN said, he had not stated that he would not lay a Bill on the table during that Session. On the contrary, he hoped to be able to do so; but he did not think there was any chance of the Bill being passed in the present Session.

MR. HASSARD said, he trusted that the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland would consider the subject well before bringing in any measure upon it. The real difficulty in relation to the conveyance and transfer of land arose from the length of time over which the search had to be made. A great deal of confusion arose from a misapprehension of the parties who wished to have a rapid transfer of land. Persons who wished to raise money upon land by way of mortgage no doubt liked to have a rapid title deduced; but it was impossible to have great rapidity and equal security at the same time. Another purpose for which a rapid transfer of land was required was for small purchases and in investments of trust funds upon land. He thought all these legitimate purposes might be attained by making it compulsory that at short recurring periods the land should pass through some tribunal like the Landed Estates Court, so that the point from which the title had to be deduced should not be remote. After an indefeasible Parliamentary title was obtained, all subsequent encumbrances on the property must be put upon the register. He did not think it was possible to make the transfer of land for permanent objects so rapid and easy as the hon. Member for Cork desired, nor could he bind himself to that hon. Gentleman's views as to the creation of land debentures. In the nature of things land could not be treated like bank-notes or railway shares. Duties attached to the ownership of land which did not exist in regard to movable chattels; and those landowners who desired to enjoy all the prestige of territorial proprietorship, and at the same time to be able to transfer their property with the same facility as railway stock, resembled persons who wished to eat their cake and have it at the same time. He hoped that before any Bill was introduced on this question, a Commission would be appointed to inquire into the best mode of registering titles; and he thought that the inquiry might be advantageously extended to England as well as Ireland, as under recent legislation the systems of the two countries were very much analogous. He would suggest that a Royal Commission should be issued, which might investigate the system of registering deeds in England, and upon their report there would be no difficulty in drawing a Bill which would meet all the requirements of the landed interests in Ireland.

MR. SCULLY said, he was willing to withdraw his Amendment on the understanding that the right hon. and learned Attorney General would bring in his Bill as soon as possible.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the purchase by the Law Life Assurance Company of large estates in Ireland, and the results attending this acquisition of property, and to move an Address to the Crown on the subject. Some apology was due to the House for his Motion, because, as a general rule, it was not thought right for a Member of that House to avail himself of his position to call attention to the conduct of private individuals in the management of their property. It was, however, on grounds of a public character that he was now induced to bring the subject under the notice of the House, as the case to which he wished to call attention was one of those in which the power of the House to address the Crown might be usefully invoked. The conduct pursued by the Law Life Assurance Company with reference to the particular property had been productive of great misery through a large portion of the West of Ireland. The region to which he wished to direct the attention of the House was the romantic wilds of Connemara. It was a district which was formerly much more prosperous than at present it could be pronounced to be under a body of English gentlemen of high respectability and position. He did not know whether there was any Gentleman in the House connected with this Society, but if there should be he hoped it would be understood that he (Mr. Longfield) was desirous to avoid giving any personal offence in any observations he might have to offer. He wished to deal with this altogether as an impersonal matter, but at the same time, in referring to the proceedings of the Society in question, he could not help considering that they had purchased a large property improperly, and that they had abused their rights. Some years ago a gentleman of great humanity, and also of some eccentricity of character, who might be remembered by many hon. members—Mr. Richard Martin—was the owner of a very large estate in Connemara. The estate was deeply involved when he inherited it, and he was much embarrassed; but a kinder-hearted gentleman than Martin of Ballynahinch never lived. A few years since there appeared in the Daily News a very interesting series of letters from a writer who was sent out to report on the agricultural prospects of the country. He gave a very interesting account of this district of Connemara. He described that after riding a distance of forty miles through this property, formerly all belonging to one family, he arrived at Ballynahinch, the residence of the late lord, or rather lady of the domain. The lady owned the greatest number of acres possessed by any one subject of the Crown, and now there was not a single rood of property to which a descendant of the family could lay claim. The late Mr. Martin, however, had ever been a most kind and liberal landlord, beloved by his tenantry. In the year 1824 the Law Life Assurance Society was founded, composed principally of lawyers, and governed by some leading legal authorities. These great estates gradually passed into the hands of this Society; and although they were not, technically and legally speaking, mortgagees in possession, they yet contrived to enter into receipt of the rents and profits under the clauses of their deed by means of an agent. They thus became the virtual owners of the property, and were morally, if not legally, responsible for what had taken place. They had taken the whole of the proceeds, depriving Mrs. Martin even of her jointure. In this he could not blame them; they were actuated by no personal feelings; they were an impersonal company, without feelings, merely trying to do the best they could for their shareholders. Probably the principle on which they had acted had been merely to invest their capital to the best advantage. They next proceeded to prepare the estate for sale, and the first thing they did was to serve a number of ejectments on the tenants, a policy which they pursued with very little consideration. It must be admitted that the tenants were not of a very desirable class. They were

for the most part without capital, though he believed that if favour had been extended to them, many of the tenants would have become useful and profitable servants to their landlords. The estate was prepared for sale, and it was purchased in 1852. It consisted of about 200,000 acres of land, and the number of tenants was 827. He was not aware that the estate was ever offered for sale publicly in Ireland. It was bought in by the Law Life Society under a private contract by means of trustees for something like £1 per acre, for a sum which was said to be due to the Society. Having placed the Society in possession of the property, he would proceed to trace their management of it during the twelve years which they had been the owners of it; and he would show that from year to year the property had been most fearfully mismanaged; that the number of evictions had been enormous; that no encouragement whatever had been given to the tenants; and that the result had been that the acquisition of land by this wealthy Society had been a curse to that part of the country. What made the matter worse was that the Society had not the slightest right to become the purchasers of estates in Ireland. They were a society or fraternity having perpetual succession, but they had not the slightest right to become possessors of estates. From the earliest times the acquisition of property by corporations, or those who possessed a corporate succession, had been discouraged by the Legislature. The Statutes of Mortmain prohibited the acquisition of estates by religious bodies, and an Act passed in the reign of Richard II. extended the prohibition to purchases made for guilds, fraternities, and other societies of a similar description. He held that the Law Life Society having become purchasers of the Martin property by an evasion of the law, the Crown might seize upon the land and confiscate it. Not many years ago the Crown seized upon property acquired by another Insurance Company, and it might pursue the same course in the present instance. It would readily be believed that the purchase of the Martin estates by the Law Life Society had proved most injurious to the country, for of all absentee landlords a body of persons animated by a corporate spirit, never visiting the property, but merely receiving the rents, and managing the estate by a solicitor in London and an agent in Ireland, was by far the worst. Feeling that they had acted contrary to law, the Law Life Society in 1854 sought to obtain an Act to facilitate their dealing with the estate. Power was given to them to lend and advance money on the security of freehold, leasehold and other property in Great Britain and Ireland. He need hardly point out, however, that power to lend money upon security did not enable the Company to purchase property. Again, in 1863, after the mismanagement of the estate had become notorious, after several attempts had been made to compel a sale, after it was well known that the Society were owners of land contrary to law, another Act was got enabling them to sue and defend all actions in their own name, instead of the names of trustees, and to have them properly vested successively in trustees whenever nominated, without payment of stamp or succession duties. That Act gave them extraordinary powers and privileges—powers and privileges not possessed by private owners—but it did not really enable them to purchase land; so that, according both to the old Acts and to the new, they were not the legal owners of the Martin property. He had already hinted at the manner in which they had performed the duties of proprietors. Since 1852, as appeared from a Return recently laid before the House, they had prosecuted in the Civil Bill Court alone no fewer than 191 ejectments, affecting about a fourth or a third of all the tenants on the estate. The total number of defendants was 735. This Society, numbering amongst its members some of the highest lawyers in the land, having contrived to escape the ordinary burdens on property, had endeavoured to avoid all local charges. As managers of the property they had winked at the tenants falling into arrears with their county rates, and when they purchased the estate it was found that the arrears amounted to about £1,000 for county rates, and that most liberal Company sought to place the debts due from their tenants upon the county at large. They traversed the presentment which was made. The grand jury considered it unjust that the rest of the county of Galway should pay the arrears of the tenants of the Law Life Company's estate after they had evicted tenants who were able to pay—although, perhaps, not very willing. The Law Life Society again attempted to evade the obligation, but the county was successful, and the Society were unable to get the county to pay their rates. It was clear that the Society was as much disposed to evade its local obligations as the succession and stamp duties. These, however, were but minor matters. With an enormous territory under their control, they had disregarded their duties as owners of land, and set an evil example to other owners. From a Return which the House ordered to be printed on the 26th April, 1864, it would be seen that they were utterly unfitted to manage their property, and it would be a great blessing to the country if they could be compelled to part with it. Dr. Brodie, the Poor Law Inspector to the Commissioners, in his Report, dated the 21st November, 1861, said—

“About a mile and a half from Clifden, in the townland of Derrygimla, on the Law Life property, I remarked some fences or embankments partially raised; and seeing no men at work I inquired the reason, and was informed by one of the men who had been employed on the work that he and five others were engaged at it at so much per perch (1s. 6d.), and that having worked eight days, they received 15s. for their labour, or at the rate of 8½d. per day for each man; and that they were compelled to give up the work. In the Bunowen division I saw some men employed in making fences; they informed me they were receiving 10d. per day, and spoke in the highest terms of their landlord and employer, Mr. Lyons. The poorer tenants require indulgence from their landlords in the payment of the rents. There is a fine field for doing good, for the exercise of benevolence, and for establishing a high claim to public and private gratitude, in the drainage and improvement of the land. With good management the outlay will prove remunerative. The Law Life Assurance Company own property to the extent of over one-fourth the whole valuation of the Clifden union, and it is estimated that they received a rental of £7,000 a year. Much is expected from this body. The Company is expected to set an example of judicious liberality and enlightened philanthropy to the other property owners in the district. Let us hope that they will no longer delay doing so.”

In the same Return he found the following most extraordinary resolution, which was passed at a meeting presided over by the agent of the society. At that meeting a letter from Mr. Lyons, a landed proprietor, was read, suggesting that some means should be taken for providing the poor with a better supply of fuel. That letter was highly approved of, and the following resolution was passed:—

“That the agent of the Law Life Assurance Company be communicated with on the subject, sending him a copy of Mr. Lyons's admirable letter, with the view of ascertaining what amount that company, being the chief proprietors of the locality, would undertake to subscribe towards the purchase of fuel as proposed.”

He now came to two letters which did credit to the writers. The first of them was from the Poor Law Commissioners to Sir Robert Peel, and the other from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department. On the 22nd November the chief clerk to the Poor Law Commissioners wrote as follows:—

"The expectation that an example will be promptly given by the Law Life Assurance Company, who possess a great part of the property of the Clifden Union, it is to be hoped will not be disappointed. Mr. Robinson, the agent, who manages the property on behalf of the company, is chairman of the Board of Guardians of the Clifden Union, and must be well acquainted with the circumstances of the district. This is the same gentleman who transmitted a memorial for assistance from the Government, which appeared in the newspapers a few days since."

To that letter the following reply was sent by direction of the Home Secretary:—

"Sir,—I am directed by Secretary Sir George Grey to request that you will, at the earliest opportunity, bring under the notice of the managing direction of the Law Life Assurance Company the enclosed copy of a letter addressed by the Poor Law Board in Ireland to the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. Sir George Grey has received several private communications from Ireland, which he does not feel he should be authorized in transmitting to you as official documents, but which concur in the expression of opinion that the resident agent of the Law Life Assurance Company has not shown the disposition which might have been expected from a gentleman representing a company possessed of an estate of vast extent in Galway, to take an active part in promoting local efforts for the relief of the poor in that district, while he appears to have taken a prominent part in appealing to the Government for assistance. Without entering on the question of whether such assistance may, or may not, hereafter become necessary, it must be obvious that it is of the greatest importance that the first and chief reliance should be placed on local efforts; and it is gratifying to be assured that many of the landed proprietors in the West of Ireland are exerting themselves honourably and successfully in adopting measures to avert, or mitigate, the apprehended distress. Sir George Grey is far from assuming, from the facts already before him, that the conduct of Mr. Robinson may not be susceptible of satisfactory explanation; but he cannot doubt that the managing direction will share the anxiety which he himself feels, that no suspicion should exist as to their desire that their agent should be one of the foremost in promoting every practicable scheme of local benevolence, and should heartily co-operate with other landowners in the exertions which they are making; and he entertains the fullest confidence that this subject will receive the prompt and serious attention of the directors.—I am, &c.,

"To D. S. Bockett, Esq.,

"Law Life Assurance Company."

The demand for relief at that time was very urgent, and, owing to the pressure from the Home Secretary, the Society could no longer avoid coming forward. On the 20th December Mr. Bockett wrote to Mr. Waddington, stating that the Law Life Society had put £200 at the disposal of Mr. Robinson, to be applied in the purchase of fuel for distribution amongst the poor of the districts in which their estates were situated, either gratuitously or at reduced prices, as he should deem best, except that out of the above £200 they had directed that £20 be paid to the Clifden Fuel Committee, and £20 to the Oughterard Committee. He believed—and to the credit of Ireland be it spoken—that this wealthy Society were the only landlords in Ireland to whom the Secretary of State was compelled to address a remonstrance and to complain of their tardiness, in comparison with the other landlords in that district, in adopting measures for the relief of the distress. Having shown from public documents what was the character of the management of the Society's estate, he would now refer to other testimony to the same effect. He held in his hand two private communications. Those documents emanated from tenants on the land, who were thoroughly acquainted with the subject on which they were speaking. For obvious reasons he would not give their names to the House, but he was prepared to guarantee their respectability and their integrity. In one of those documents was a list of forty-three tenants who had, within the last ten days, emigrated from the district. There were many more whose passages to America were paid, but who could not as yet leave the country. The cause assigned for that emigration was the severity and persecution of both agent and landlords. The document went on to say that the tenants received no relief except a few pounds of turnip seed, for which they were charged double price in six months afterwards—that a vast number of houses had been thrown down during the last year—that no such things as leases were given; but that every year a fresh agreement was signed by each tenant, who paid 2s. 6d. for signing the paper. It was impossible to deny that such a district did not offer a very promising field for tenants. A tenant from year to year had a tenure of an uncertain duration. Still that tenure might last for a long time, but the tenants of the Law Life Assurance Company were obliged to sign a fresh agreement every year. What, he would ask, could the House expect from a society of lawyers, placed as landlords under such circumstances? He was prepared to prove the facts he had stated before a Committee of the House. Another gentleman, writing on the 12th of May, 1861, stated—

"There is so much poverty and misery in this country that I hardly know where to begin to describe it to you. For many years past the tenants on the Law Life property have had some stock to pay their rents with; now they have none. Since I came to this country, now nearly five years, I have seen in the fair of Roundstone, on the 25th of March, as many as 300 cattle on the fair green, but on the 25th of March last, I do not think there were more than thirty. To show you still more, the Law Life has had two large townlands in their own hands close by me ever since I came here; Letterdiffe and Roserow, more than 3,000 acres which they let out for grazing; and other years at this time they had about 200 cattle taken into graze, and this year I am certain they have not thirty. The houses are of loose stones, put together without clay or mortar. I have often said to the tenants on the Law Life property, 'Why do you not make your houses more warm and comfortable, and make a few fields round your houses, in which to grow carrots, parsnips, turnips, and cabbages for your families in the winter, when you find that this oft-cultivated land still continues to rot your potatoes?' Their answer was, 'And if I done that same, perhaps I would only have it one year, for either my "rint" would be raised, or some one else would fancy it, and I would be put out.' There are no cow-houses or pig-houses, or stables; in Connemara those who are fortunate to possess a few beasts, cattle, pigs, or sheep, during the whole of the winter keep all in the same cabin with their family, and in the same apartment, but were I to write for a week, I could not tell you of half the misery of this country. If the Law Life goes on a little longer as it is doing now, no one will be able to live in this country. The small tenants are going fast, and those that are a little better off, must soon follow. Since the Ballinabinch estate became the property of the Law Life Society, they have had as many as 1,000 ejectments tried at one quarter sessions at Oughterard. The farm I now hold, Toombeola, was formerly let for £27 a year. I took it in the year 1860 at a rent of £40, including all rates and taxes. The first year I held it, I laid out £150 upon it, between houses and land, and since that time I have laid out upon improvements (permanent improvements) more than £30 a year; and now Messrs. Bockett and Robinson have offered me a lease at £70 a year, and I to pay all rates and taxes, which would make my rent something like £75 or £76 a year; my last rates were £4 4s. 4d. Before I took my farm it had been waste, and in the hands of the Society for some eight or nine years, consequently it was in a dreadful state when I got it, just one sheet of dirt and water and bog holes. Whenever any lands or houses fall into the hands of the Society they never do anything to keep them up or improve them. I must tell you that all the money they allowed me for all I have laid out on my house and land was £30. I have no road over which I can drive a car, and they will not allow 1s. to make one—fences that the agent promised to make three years ago between me and the adjoining village or townland, have never been touched yet. There are petty sessions held at Roundstone and Carna once every fortnight, and sometimes in the summer there will be as many as thirty to forty summonses tried at each, and all, nearly all, for trespass. You might see poor creatures travelling some five, some ten, and some fifteen miles to these sessions to prove or defend their cases, and that is where the swearing goes on, and a little resident magistrate telling the poor things that he does not believe one word they are swearing. It was only the other day (last Monday) that I told the agent that it was unjust to think of giving me a lease at £70 a year for twenty-one years, and I to pay all rates and taxes, and the country coming down at such a rate. 'Well,' said he, 'don't take it.' But you perceive that I cannot go on improving without a lease, and I hardly know what to do. I wish I had never come to this country. The Law Life will not give a lease at a fair price. I have not time to say more now, but I have not told you of half the misery of this country."

All this showed a state of things really lamentable—the result of twelve years' management of an Irish estate under a wealthy English Society, who had been permitted to acquire the land in contravention of the law. They had abused the power which they possessed, and the estate, so far from improving, had been becoming worse. Such being the state of things it would be in the power of the Crown to do what it did in 1833 under similar circumstances. At that time the University Life Assurance Society, contrary to the provisions under which they were allowed to lend money, purchased lands in Staffordshire, and letters patent were issued to Commissioners to investigate the matter, and if the society had purchased the lands then to seize them. That Commission was actually executed. He had no desire to see matters carried to such a length in the present instance, and he hoped that the effect of the discussion in that House would be to cause the Law Life Society to see that they could not be permitted to retain any longer the proprietorship of this estate. He believed that the moral pressure, which had induced them to give £200 for the relief of the distress, would also induce them to surrender up the estate for sale in a reasonable time, and all that he was anxious for was that the property should pass away from persons who had acquired it improperly. He concluded by moving an address to the Crown on the subject to which he had called the attention of the House.

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, he would not express any opinion as to the legal authority of the Law Life Assurance Company over the estates in question, but would merely observe that if they were acting illegally either the Government or any private individual might call them to account without the intervention of that House. Neither would he go into the general question, whether it was desirable that any large English company should hold property in Ireland; but he would explain the exact circumstances of the case which had been brought under the notice of the House. Some years before the famine the Law Life Assurance Company lent large sums of money as a first charge on these estates—for there were two estates; other parties lent money as a second charge; the interest of the second charges was not duly paid, and those who had the second charge put the estates into Chancery. From the moment they got into Chancery things went from bad to worse, and it became unavoidable that the estates should be sold in the Incumbered Estates Court. But it was not the Law Life Assurance Company which either put the estates into Chancery or brought them into the Incumbered Estates Court, but those who had the second charge. In that state of affairs, the condition of Ireland being so bad, it soon became apparent that no one would buy the estates. At that time estates were sold in Ireland for a mere song. He recollected one property, the Ordnance value of which was from £260 to £270 a year, which was put up for sale over and over again without finding a bidder, and at last was sold for £1,000, or less than four years' purchase. Now, there was a sum of £282,000 due to the Law Life Society at that time upon the two estates, and it was probable, had the estates been then put up for sale, they would not have realized more than one-fourth of that amount, and it was not to be supposed that any society would be justified in making such a sacrifice as three-fourths of the money due. But since that time the Company had been always willing to sell the estates either together or in lots to suit purchasers. The best proof that the price asked was not absolutely prohibitory, and that the Company really desired to sell, was that they had already sold £80,000 worth of the property, and but for some bad seasons of late they would have sold a much larger portion. Then the character of the Company as landlords had been attacked. Now he had every opportunity of seeing and hearing how the Mayo estate, a property of about £3,000 a year, was managed, and he believed that very few properties in Ireland belonging to absentees were better managed. Moreover, he knew the agent, Mr. Robinson well. He was not an Englishman as had been alleged, but an Irishman. He belonged to an old Sligo family, and was an energetic, straightforward, just, and kindhearted man, who was popular among the tenants. It had been said that the rents had been raised, and that the property was now let above its real value. Probably the rents had been increased, for this had been the case on every estate as better times had come. But he had authority for stating that the rental of the estate in his county was not so high as it stood before the famine, while the Company paid all the rates and taxes. As an instance, a farm formerly let at £37 a year, the tenant paying a portion of the taxes, was now let for £30, the Company paying all the taxes. Besides this the Company had gone largely into drainage, road making, building of walls, fences and works of that description, not so much for the purpose of improvement as for giving employment. During the distress twenty tons of meal were given away or sold to the tenantry at reduced prices; coal was supplied at half its cost; and subscriptions had been made to the relief committees. So much for the Mayo property. He knew but little of that in Galway, but during the last five years the sum of £7,000 had been spent in relief works of various descriptions, and he challenged the hon. Members for Galway and Mallow to point out an instance in which a landed proprietor, with estates of the same size, had spent as large a sum upon similar works. Then in support of the charge against the Company, an ejectment return had been relied on; but what should have been asked was not how many such notices had been served, but how many had been actually carried out by the removal of the parties off the estate. The notices entered furnished no criterion of the number actually enforced. In Galway the rundale system of holding was very much in use—a piece of mountain ground being let to a number of persons as joint tenants. These persons paid their rent separately, and if it was desired to get rid of one, it was necessary to go through the form of proceeding against the whole. The system was a bad one, but it accounted for a large proportion of the ejectment notices. In the county Mayo, it appeared that the total number of ejectments entered on an estate of £3,000 per annum, during a period of between twelve and thirteen years, only amounted to twenty-four. Of that number no further proceedings were taken in five cases. In six the decree was taken out but not acted upon; and one was in duplicate—which reduced it to twelve. Of that number one was the case of a man who was ejected, but immediately restored, and was still in possession of the property. Nine were in arrears for rent, in one case to the extent of £111; and one who held a joint tenancy with his father was ejected for assaulting the agent for remonstrating with him for having done something against the rules of the estate, but his father had ever since retained possession of it; and the other was the case of a man who prevented the tenants from repairing the Clare Island Pier, which was ordered for the purpose of giving employment. When Dr. Brodie visited the estate in Galway, on the 21st November, he declared there was no distress, and food was plentiful and selling at reasonable prices; but he anticipated great distress for want of fuel, unless immediate steps were taken by the parties locally interested to obtain a supply of coal to be sold at reasonable prices. It, however, appeared that at that time a cargo of coal was expected. On the previous day, the 20th November, there was an ordinary meeting of the Clifden Board of Guardians, and after they had disposed of the ordinary business of the Board they formed themselves into a Committee to consider the question, and the charge against Mr. Robinson was that though he had signed the memorial to the Government agreed to by the meeting of which he was the chairman, some time previously, asking for public assistance, he absented himself from a meeting which proposed that local efforts should be made for the same object. He did not understand the sneers that had been cast against him for asking for public assistance. It was not the first time it had been done in Ireland, and he should like to know how many Members, English, Irish, and Scotch, had not done the same thing in order to get their respective constituents relieved in some shape or other in the remission of some tax, which was pretty much the same thing. As the hon. Member for Galway, who moved for the Return, did not intend to found such a charge against Mr. Robinson, it was not necessary for him further to enter into it. The insinuation that Mr. Robinson purposely absented himself from that meeting was most unjust. The correspondence showed that the meeting referred to was an impromptu meeting, and there was no intention of holding it but for Dr. Brodie's visit. Moreover Mr. Robinson could not by possibility have known of the meeting, and it should be borne in mind that at that very time Mr. Robinson was engaged in a similar object on Clare Island, he having gone there to inquire into the condition of the people, and to make arrangements for employing them and supplying them with fuel during the winter. Now, what had been done by those in the locality who had brought these charges against Mr. Robinson? Only one-fourth of Clifden Union belonged to the Law Life Assurance Company, and what, he asked, had been done by the owners of the remaining three-fourths of the Union? If they subscribed anything they had hid their light under a bushel, and had taken care not to let the public or Mr. Robinson know what they had done. All he could see of a subscription on the occasion was what was contained in a letter from Dr. Lyons of Dublin. Dr. Lyons suggested that £100 or £150 should be raised, and he expressed his readiness to contribute his share, or even above it, but it appeared that the Committee abstained from putting their hands into their own pockets because they were waiting for the Society to come forward and to set an example of "judicious liberality and enlightened philanthropy" to others in the district. All, however, they did was to direct the clerk to write a letter to the Company, informing them of the resolution that had been agreed to, and calling upon them to supply the necessary funds, amounting to £200, with which to enable the committee to carry out their good intentions. The Company had only a small property in that part of the Union, and it was but natural they should expect others to make an effort with them. The Company objected to their money being spent on the whole of the Union, but they handed over the amount named to Mr. Robinson to be divided in the proportion they named. For some time before this the Company had been in communication with Mr. Robinson on the best mode of meeting the contemplated distress, and relief works had been begun before anything was said about it. Dr. Brodie, in his Report, said he saw some of the works partially executed; and it was right the House should know why it was the works were stopped, and how it was the men earned but 3½d. per day, and it would have been better if he had written to

Mr. Robinson for an explanation before he embodied it in his Report. Mr. Robinson was anxious to employ the people as much as possible on their own holdings, and he set them at task work at the ordinary rate of remuneration; but the people objected to task work, and insisted on day work. They were then in a position to stand out if they did not get their own terms, because, as Dr. Brodie stated, the distress had not then begun. He hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Galway would favour the House with the amount of money subscribed by the other owners of property. He did not mean with the amount received by the Clifden committee, for no doubt they had received subscriptions from many sources, including that estimable body the Society of Friends, who never failed to send money to any part of Ireland in which there was great distress. The Law Life Society expended £200 for fuel alone, independently of the employment which they gave; and if the other proprietors had subscribed in the same proportion they would have given £600. The Secretary of State, in a communication to Mr. Bookett, said he had received private letters commenting on the conduct of Mr. Robinson. If the right hon. Gentleman considered those letters to be private he ought to have kept them private; but as they were mentioned in the Parliamentary papers, he ought to publish them, in order to give Mr. Robinson an opportunity of showing up the mendacity of his secret assailants. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mallow said he had the greatest confidence in his correspondents, who were tenants on the property, and who had written to him, but whose names he did not like to state; but the Parliamentary Return from which the hon. and learned Gentleman had quoted showed the extraordinary inaccuracy of his correspondent's statement on the subject of the thousand ejectments at one session, for by the Return it appeared that since the Law Life Society became owners of the estate there had been only 191 ejectments against 700 people. [Mr. GREGORY: The one thousand ejectments occurred in a year not included in the Return.] If these ejectments occurred in 1851 they occurred before the Law Life Society got possession of the estate. [Mr. GREGORY: They were mortgagees in possession.] He contended that no charge could be justly laid against the Law Life Society, except that of their being absentee proprietors in company with the owners of a large portion of the land of Ireland, including much of his own county. No doubt absenteeism was one of the great evils of Ireland. There was no greater. It was the chief cause of the misery and the backward condition of that country. He believed it would be better to have a very indifferent resident landlord than the best absentee proprietor; but that was a matter which the House of Commons could not deal with. In this free country we could not say that a man must live in a particular place; and he believed the inevitable result of the forced sale of those estates which the hon. and learned Member suggested would be that they would fall into the hands of other absentee proprietors, who would not manage them half as well as the Law Life Society did. In consequence of the successive bad seasons which had been experienced in Ireland, the present would be a bad time to force a sale of land in that country, and he had heard that on those portions of the estates which the Law Life Society had sold the rents had been nearly doubled, in addition to the tenants being obliged to pay the poor rates and cess. If the remaining portions of the estates were sold now they would be bought by land speculators, by land jobbers or land sharks, as they were called, who would double the rents and sell their purchases to other capitalists, who would be loth to reduce the rental on what they had bought. Under such circumstances, the condition of the tenants would be very much worse than it was under the Law Life Society.

Mr. MURRAY said, that as a director of the Law Life Society, he wished to express his regret that instead of attacks being made in that House, founded on information furnished by correspondents whose names were not mentioned, it would have been much better to have communicated the facts to the Directors, and in the first instance to have ascertained their correctness. The Society desired to do everything in its power to improve the condition of its tenants. The Society had already spent thousands in constructing roads, in aiding charities, and in erecting a church on their property; it had done everything a resident landlord could do, and a great many things which no absentee proprietor did to make their tenantry happy. The Directors had never received any complaint from any tenant, and if there had been any complaint instead of these anonymous letters—

MR. LONGFIELD said, that the letters were not anonymous; the writers had all signed their names; and though he had not read them to the House he had made himself responsible for the respectability and trustworthiness of the writers.

MR. MURRAY said, the letters were anonymous as far as the House was concerned. When the hon. Gentleman read an extract from Dr. Brodie's report, it would have been but candid if he had read the whole of Mr. Bockett's letter in reply, and which was considered satisfactory by the Secretary of State in 1861. About the same time the Clifton Fuel Fund Society sent a vote of thanks to the Law Life Association for their assistance: when the next season of distress came, in May, 1863, the Society's solicitor had written to the local agent, some days before the communication from the Home Secretary had been received, directing the agent to provide employment for the tenants in order to alleviate the distress. From that time to the present no complaint had ever reached the Society so far as he was aware. It had been said, "Sell the estates;" but it was not so easy. If the hon. and learned Member for Mallow would find a buyer, he for one should be thankful. The hon. Gentleman, no doubt, knew that joint-stock companies were beginning to look after landed estates in Ireland, and knowing this and seeing repeated notices in the paper, from February last to the present time against the Law Life Society, he began to think they had something to do with the idea of a joint-stock company wishing to buy these estates. The Society had no disposition to retain the estates, they had been an annoyance and not a pleasure, and if any of the hon. Gentleman's friends were willing to become purchasers, the estates were for sale at a fair valuation.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he had had no communication directly or indirectly with any persons anxious to purchase property in Ireland, and he had brought the subject under the notice of the House without the smallest reference to any such object.

MR. GREGORY said, when the notice of his hon. Friend was put upon the paper, he had put himself in communication with gentlemen upon the spot for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was any foundation for the complaints made of the oppressive conduct of the Law Life Assurance Company in the management of their Irish property. He had no desire to join in a cry against the owners of any estate. He should be very glad to have received favourable reports of the management of the Society; but he was bound to say that he had received a great number of letters from landowners and others of the highest position, and not one of them was favourable to the management of the Society. The accounts in question proceeded from landowners who were as high Conservatives as any Members of that House, and it was impossible that he could disregard them. So far from there being the ideal paradise in Mayo which the noble Lord the Member for Mayo had depicted, one gentleman wrote that in the summer, when the Society was said to have behaved with so much munificence, he was himself obliged to feed many of their tenants. He had also obtained a Return from the Clerk of the Peace of Galway, which showed that since the Law Life Society had had to deal with the management of the estates in Galway, there had been 3,158 ejectments. In reply to the noble Lord, who said that persons purchasing land from the Company generally raised the rents, he might further state that he had received a letter from a gentleman of undoubted veracity, in which he said that those persons who had purchased from the Company had not, as was alleged, raised the rents of the tenants save in rare instances; whereas the Society, instead of having simply raised their own rents somewhat above the low ebb at which they stood at the time of the famine, had, as he was informed, increased them in many instances to more than double the rate of the Ordnance valuation, which afforded a good test of what land was really worth, rents in general varying some 25 per cent over that valuation. Now, as to the liberality of the Society which had been so praised. On the 24th October, 1861, a meeting was held, over which Mr. Robinson, the agent of the Law Life Assurance Society, presided, at which a resolution was agreed to setting forth the great destitution which existed in the western districts of Galway. Mr. Robinson wrote that famine, with all its concomitant horrors, was inevitable. On the 21st November Dr. Brodie was sent down to see what was going on in the way of relief in that part of the world, and he reported at that time, one month after it had been declared that famine was inevitable, that nothing was doing by the Law Life Assurance Society. The agent was authorized, they say, to give employment; but how does Dr. Brodie describe that employment and its remuneration. He says the men were employed in making ditches, at that inclement season of the year, badly clad, with no fuel or food to return to, at 3½d. per day. It was not till the 20th of December the solicitor of the Law Life Assurance Society said that they had put £200 at the disposal of Mr. Robinson for the purchase of fuel, and made arrangements for the employment of useful labourers at 1s. 1½d. a day, and that was only done by the pressure and remonstrance of the Home Secretary. He remembered the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland saying to him in that lobby that their conduct was atrocious. He remembered it well. He, for one, trusted that the Law Life Assurance Society would fulfil their intention of selling their land as soon as possible. It was said it would be a satisfaction to themselves, and he was sure that it would be a satisfaction to that part of the world, from which he trusted they would soon be severed.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that as he had been so pointedly alluded to by the hon. Member for Galway, he felt bound to say a few words on the subject, although after the able statement of his noble Friend the Member for Mayo (Lord John Browne), it was hardly necessary that he should do so. It was true that in 1861 he had to pass through the county in which the property alluded to was situated, and he upon that occasion heard that the estates of the Society were very badly managed. The statements on the subject came, he believed, principally from his hon. Friend the Member for Galway, who told him that the tenants on those estates had a standing notice to quit always hanging over their heads; that was to say, that they were not only yearly tenants, but that, at the expiration of each year, they might be called upon to quit without further notice. [Mr. GREGORY: I never heard that until the other day, and I never spoke about it to the right hon. Gentleman in my life.] Now, that statement he believed to be wholly unfounded. The tenants of the Society certainly were yearly tenants, but they were entitled to have six months' notice, and that would be the case with any property in the hands of a company or association desirous of selling their property. There could, he understood, be no doubt that the Law Life Society held the property against their will, and that they were all through anxious to meet with a purchaser for it. He believed that it could not but have struck hon. Members that a more irregular discussion had never been brought before the House. His hon. Friend the Member for Galway had referred to a variety of letters which he had received. He would not term them anonymous, but the hon. Member had only distinctly referred to one, and that was the instance of a shopkeeper in Galway, who took a portion of the property from the Law Life Assurance Company at a rental of £12 a year, and who was deprived of the land at the end of three years without obtaining any advantage from the money which he had expended upon the land during his occupation. No one could give better evidence upon the question as to the management of property in Mayo than his noble Friend the Member for the county, and his noble Friend had completely replied to the arguments of the hon. Member for Mallow. He believed he was right in stating that, out of the very large property held by the Law Life Assurance Company, they had sold land to the value of about £80,000. He believed, also, that in every instance the rental of the land disposed of had been more than doubled. The tenants of the property which had been sold had actually come to Mr. Robinson, the agent of the Company, or had written to the Committee in London, and had urged the Company not to sell the property, because the value of their tenancy would become very much deteriorated by a change of landlords. He desired to allude to another point, and that was the question of ejectment. The House was in possession of Returns upon the subject, moved for by the hon. Member for Galway himself; but the hon. Member had not taken his figures from those Returns, but had referred to ejectments which had taken place two years anterior, and the House was consequently deprived of the opportunity of testing the accuracy of his figures. In the Return which was before the House, they would find that the ejectments entered and the number of defendants at the suit of the Law Life Assurance Company were remarkably few as compared with the number throughout the whole of Ireland. He believed that in the whole of Ireland the ejectments had perhaps exceeded 6,000 in number, but in 1863 the defendants in cases of ejection at the suit of the Law Life Assurance Company only numbered thirty-five. To properly appreciate the difference it was necessary for the House to bear in mind that the property of the Law Life Assurance Company in Ireland exceeded 130,000 acres, and that it was situated in a very remote and impoverished district. In 1861 he had received very serious accounts of the distress—he might almost say famine—which existed in the western parts of Ireland, and with the full concurrence of the noble Viscount at the head of the Government he paid a visit to that district for the purpose of ascertaining the real state of affairs. On that occasion he traversed a good portion of the property of the Law Life Assurance Company, and his impression was that the distress existing among the tenants on that property was greater than elsewhere. On returning to Dublin he did not hesitate to write to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, by whom a letter was written to the Law Life Assurance Company. The result was that the Company not only sent out instructions to their local agent to obtain immediate employment for the labourers upon the estates, but also sent £200 to be expended in the purchase of fuel, and to be devoted to the benefit of the poor. He believed that the Law Life Assurance Company acted on that occasion as liberally and as generously as could be expected of them, and that their conduct during that period of severe pressure and want would bare comparison with the behaviour of any of the other landlords in that part of the country. He would appeal to the hon. Baronet the Member for Galway in confirmation of that opinion. He must say that he believed that the discussion had been brought forward in an unusual manner, for the purpose of creating dissatisfaction and a feeling of hostility against a Society which held a vast quantity of land in Galway and Mayo against their own will, and who were prepared to sell the land at the present moment if any persons would come forward and offer them an amount at all adequate to its value. He understood that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mallow did not intend to take any further steps with regard to the matter, but that he was content with the discussion which had already been elicited; but he did hope that when the hon. Gentleman took part in any future discussions of a similar nature he would abstain from indulging in criticisms upon the conduct of individuals or companies unless they were based on a better foundation than could be claimed for his remarks that evening. He confessed that at first his opinion had been similar to that entertained by the hon. Member for Galway, but on a fuller examination he became convinced that his opinion was unfounded, and that the Company were prepared to do everything which was consistent with their duties as landlords.

SIR THOMAS BURKE said, he wished to bear testimony to the exceedingly good management of the property held by the Law Life Assurance Company, and to express his regret very much that the discussion had been brought forward. He had had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Robinson some years ago, and although that Gentleman was politically opposed to him, he believed his management of the property with which he had been intrusted was entitled to the highest credit.

MR. MAGUIRE looked upon the discussion as one possessing great interest, but still most bewildering in its contradictions. The right hon. Baronet, in reference to the conduct of the Law Life Assurance Company, had used language which would hardly have been Parliamentary if spoken on the floor of the House, but which, spoken in the lobby, did honour to the generous impulse of his feelings. On that occasion he designated the conduct of the Law Life Assurance Company as "atrocious," and he now gave it the highest possible praise. [SIR ROBERT PEEL: No. I deny having said so.] I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Galway must have been suffering from some strange defect of memory. [SIR ROBERT PEEL: Hear, hear!] It was, however, certain that his hon. Friend still laboured under the impression that the word had been used by the right hon. Baronet. [MR. GREGORY: Hear, hear!] For his own part, he must say that if the description of the property given by his hon. Friend were correct, he should be fully inclined to endorse the opinion attributed to the right hon. Baronet on the occasion referred to. Regarding it from the most favourable point of view, it did not present a very pleasing aspect. There was much boasting of the lavish employment given by this great and generous Company; but it turned out that the splendid wages of 3*d.* per day were earned by the fortunate people on the estate. The last speaker (Mr. Murray) took credit for the Company for having just ordered £100 of additional work—£100 of work spread over a property of forty miles in extent! Certainly that was a noble instance of liberality. But the real truth was, that the state of things described as existing on the property in question was not as exceptional as it was stated to be; for it had been proved not long since before a Committee upstairs, that it was the custom in a certain district in Donegal to serve notice to quit every year upon the wretched tenants, thus holding them utterly at the mercy of the landlords, who used that terrible power as a screw for raising the rents upon their helpless victims. Nor was the reason given by the tenants of the Law Life Assurance Company for not improving their dwellings limited to their case; it was common to a vast number of properties in Ireland, on which the tenants, holding by the most uncertain and precarious tenure—from year to year—were liable to have their rents raised in case they improved their farms or dwellings, or to have the fruits of their industry given to others. The discussion was of this value, that it enabled the House to obtain glimpses of many of the causes of that misery which Englishmen found it so difficult to account for and understand. For instance, the noble Lord the Member for Mayo (Lord John Browne) asserted, and no doubt truly, that the Mayo property of the Company was quite as well managed as the other absentee properties in his county. If so, what a picture of the evils of absenteeism—of the misery and wretchedness which it brought upon Ireland! Englishmen were constantly asking what were the causes of the misery and wretchedness of the Irish people. In the triumphant vindication of the Company might be traced one cause; for it was confidently asserted that this property was no worse managed than that of other absentee proprietors. He believed in his soul that absenteeism was one of the most hideous of the curses that afflicted Ireland; and, until Parliament had the courage to grapple with it, as well as with the land question, they could not get at the root of the evil, and certainly could not restore peace or prosperity to that country. He did not say that absentees should be deprived of their property—of course, no such notion could enter his mind; but he did say that absentees should have a special tax placed upon them—that they should be taxed to a larger amount than other proprietors—that they should be made to pay some compensation for the injuries they inflicted, and for the loss which those from whom they derived their incomes suffered in having everything drained from the land and the people. The wealth of the country was spent in splendour and luxury in England, or on the Continent, while those from whom that wealth was raised were left to the mercy of an agent, good or bad—were left without encouragement or guidance, deprived of all protection or support. It and the land question were no doubt questions of grave difficulty; but until statesmen at both sides of the House and men of all parties resolved on dealing with such questions in a bold and energetic spirit, the country would continue to be filled with misery and discontent, and the people would fly from its shores in despair. This was a grave and solemn question—not a trumpery question about Yeomanry cavalry—but one which concerned the very existence of the Irish people. And until Englishmen had the courage to deal with it, they would be held responsible by the civilized world for the unhappiness and misery of Ireland; for they could not free themselves from that responsibility, inasmuch as the affairs of Ireland were managed by an English Parliament. Ireland was still, and would for years continue to be, an agricultural country; and, until manufactures were spread over the south and west of that country, the prosperity or poverty of its people would altogether depend upon the chance of a good or a bad harvest; and, therefore, the necessity of giving protection to the tenant for the fruits of his industry, and thus alone could he be induced to put forth those energies which would increase the productive power of the soil, and fill the land with plenty and content. He did not desire to make any special accusation against this special proprietary; he was quite content to allow the House to form its own judgment from the conflicting statements it had heard. Enough had been said to show that great and grievous evils existed in Ireland, and that it was the duty of Parliament to grapple with them without delay, so as, if possible, to afford that poor country some gleam of sunshine—some glimpse of a brighter and better state of things—after the long years of sorrow and misery it had passed through.

COLONEL EDWARDS said, that he could not conceive why the hon. Member for

Dungarvan, to whose remarks he had listened with attention and interest, should have dragged him into this discussion by referring to the question of the Yeomanry.

MR. MAGUIRE said, that he was under the impression that the hon. and gallant Gentleman had made some sneering remark upon something which he said.

COLONEL EDWARDS: I never spoke a word.

MR. MAGUIRE: Then, Sir, I beg to apologise.

MR. SCULLY said, he doubted very much whether any company could hold land except for its corporate purposes. He was at a loss for a cause to which to attribute the extraordinary Parliamentary indecency of which the Chief Secretary had been guilty in coming forward to defend this company, and treating the hon. Member for Galway scarcely with courtesy.

MR. SPEAKER said, he had to remind the hon. Member that he had already addressed the House.

MR. SCULLY said, that he was under the impression that, according to the new rule, a Member could on Friday evening speak on every subject that was introduced.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member for Mallow had moved no Amendment, and therefore the Question before the House was the same as that upon which the hon. Member for Cork had already spoken.

PUBLIC MEETINGS IN THE PARKS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to call attention to the instructions issued to the Police Commissioners, as to the suppression of public meetings in the parks, and to the powers assumed by subordinate members of the Force in suppressing the meeting at Primrose Hill. One reason for his soliciting attention to the matter was, that he had last Session moved for some Returns, and introduced a Bill in reference to the police. He did not intend to discuss the questions connected with the Garibaldi meetings held in 1862 and the present year, or with the right exercised from time immemorial of discussing public matters in the public parks. But it certainly was an unfortunate coincidence that that gentleman, Garibaldi, with whom the inhabitants of London and the people of this country

generally felt so deep a sympathy, should have been the cause, unwittingly, of the greatest injury which the inhabitants of the metropolis had sustained for years past. With the question as to the authority of the Government or of the Ranger of the parks to say in what way the parks should be used by the public he would not deal, because that question more properly belonged to the representatives of the metropolis. But what he did venture to refer to was the position assumed by the Chief Commissioner of Police, which rendered it immaterial whether the public enjoyed the right of meeting in the parks or not, for his instructions rendered it impossible that in the parks they could any longer enjoy the right of free discussion. If the instructions contained in these Returns were tacitly sanctioned, he ventured to say that no police force on the Continent would more arbitrarily set itself above the law or act in more direct antagonism to the public interests than that commanded by Sir Richard Mayne. He should justify that statement by a reference to the Return which had been made in pursuance of his Motion. The House would recollect that in answer to a Question put by the hon. Member for Marylebone as to the recent suppression of a meeting on Primrose Hill relating to Garibaldi, the right hon. Gentleman said, the police had stopped that meeting because they supposed the order issued two years ago by Sir Richard Mayne as to riotous assemblages in the parks justified them in doing so. Now, the Returns to which he had alluded contained two papers only; one a printed notice addressed to the public, and the other a private order addressed to the police in furtherance of that notice. In the printed notice, which was dated October 9, 1862, Sir Richard Mayne said—

He had looked through all the Police Acts relating to the metropolis, and had not found anything authorizing Sir Richard Mayne to use those words, or to sit in judgment as to what were “popular and exciting topics.” The notice went on to say—

“And whereas such meetings are inconsistent with the purposes for which the parks are thrown open to, and used by, the public,”

—that statement was made without a particle of authority—

“and the excitement occasioned by such discussions at such meetings has frequently led to tumults and disorders so as to endanger the public peace; and on last Sunday and the Sunday before large numbers of persons assembled in Hyde Park for the purposes assigned, and when so assembled conducted themselves in a disorderly and riotous manner, so as to endanger the public peace, and by the use of sticks and throwing stones and other missiles, committed many violent assaults upon persons quietly passing along the parks, and interrupted the thoroughfares.”

That portion of the notice was wholly at variance with the facts. It was perfectly well known that the persons assembled to discuss the subject of Garibaldi brought neither sticks or stones, but came for a perfectly legitimate purpose. Those, on the contrary, who came, he believed, from Connemara in some instances to prevent discussion, were the persons who brought these weapons with them. It would be well that the Chief Commissioner for Works, or some other Member of the Government, having had his attention directed to that misstatement, should offer some explanation on the point. In the police order dated the 11th of October, the members of the force were told that—

“Meetings for the purpose of delivering or hearing speeches, or for the public discussion of popular and exciting topics, are not to be allowed on Sundays in any of the Parks.

The House would observe that the order was limited to Sundays, and yet the police, professedly acting in obedience to the order, put down the last meeting, which was held on Saturday. The terms of the order moreover allowed individual constables to put such a construction upon them as they thought likely to be gratifying to their superiors. He trusted that the House would agree that the Chief Commissioner of Police, intrusted with the duty of carrying out the laws for the benefit of the subject, had set an example of the most glaring and flagrant illegality. The right hon. Gentleman had said that if any person was aggrieved he had the remedy in his own hands, as he could prosecute the police-constable for assault, but that proceeding had been anticipated and provided against by Sir Richard Mayne. The 10th paragraph of instructions ran thus—

whole paragraph.] He had read the whole paragraph. He wanted to know what business Sir Richard Mayne had to interfere with any person unless he took him into custody, and thus gave him an opportunity of questioning the legality of the act. The other paragraphs of that remarkable order of Sir Richard Mayne were directed to the instruction of the police how to prevent public meetings, and that it was which gave significance to the tenth paragraph, which prevented any person aggrieved from testing the legality of the acts of the police. By the last paragraph, the police were

Thus Sir Richard Mayne was pleased to say that any person not committing an illegal act was to be treated with forbearance. It was well to recollect who were the persons to whom the carrying out of these orders was intrusted. He could speak from his own personal knowledge, being connected with a society comprising Members of the other House of Parliament, whose attention had been attracted to the conduct of the police, and he could say that their conduct was not satisfactory. But he would cite better authority. Mr. Selfe, a well-known metropolitan magistrate, referring to a case which came before him, said the police sergeant had been too officious. He had seen so many cases of similar misconduct that he intended to keep a record of all such cases, and upon another occasion the same magistrate said that, speaking generally, it would be well if constables were not so officious, and were to refrain from ill using persons. And yet these were the constables who were justified by the right hon. Gentleman for applying an order made to prevent meetings on Sundays to a meeting held on a Saturday. Mr. Yardley, also a magistrate, said, day after day persons were brought before him who ought never to have been taken into custody. A still higher authority, Mr. Baron Bramwell, said, in relation to a case tried before him, that the police were a stupid set of men. In conclusion, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give some explanation how it was that he justified orders which indicated an assumption of authority on the part of the police which was dangerous to the liberty of the subject, and was calculated to bring the law and the administration of justice into contempt.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the inconvenience which was caused to the people of the metropolis by the course he, on behalf of the Government, had pursued upon the Question. His hon. Friend who had called attention to the subject had done so, perhaps, not in a very lucid manner, so that its real importance might not be apparent to hon. Gentlemen. It really was a serious Question, what were the precise rights of the people in the parks of this metropolis, as great inconvenience had resulted from the people being left by the Government under a misconception upon that point. It was the duty of the Government upon a Question of the kind to state clearly and distinctly what were their views, so that the people ought to be under no misapprehension as to their rights in the parks. It was not for him to suggest what those rights were, but for the Government to state what authority they claimed over the parks and over the people who went into them for any purpose. Would the right hon. Baronet explain whether the public had a right to go into the parks and to assemble there to discuss any public question. It could not be allowed that it should be left to Sir Richard Mayne or to any subordinate person to say that people should assemble for one purpose but not for another—that 50,000 persons might assemble on Primrose Hill to plant a tree in honour of Shakespeare, but that they should not assemble there to express an opinion about Garibaldi. There must be some principle governing all meetings, but if there was to be a discretion, it must be intrusted to some other authority than Sir Richard Mayne. He wanted to know in whom that discretion was vested. Was it in the Home Secretary or in the Chief Commissioner of Works? A capricious application of the rule made for Sunday meetings to Saturday meetings left the Question in a position which involved danger to the peace of the metropolis.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, I am glad to have an opportunity of stating what I believe to be the right of the people to the parks. Before I do so, however, I wish to advert to what has fallen from the hon. Member for Peterborough. He has raised two questions—the right of the public generally to assemble in the parks for all purposes, and he has questioned the expediency, and even the legality, of the notice issued in 1862 upon that subject, and the instructions given by the Chief Commissioner for the guidance of the police. He has also raised what I may call a minor question, as to the expediency or legality of interfering with the meeting which was recently held on Primrose Hill. The hon. Gentleman says he has looked through the Police Acts, and in vain endeavoured to find the authority under which Sir Richard Mayne interferes, as he has done, with the people in the parks. But the authority is not contained in the Police Acts at all. The order was issued in October, 1862, and was caused by the riotous assemblies which had then recently taken place in the parks. The Police Acts confer no such authority as the hon. Gentleman referred to on Sir Richard Mayne. But the parks are Royal parks. They are the property of the Crown; and through the liberality and munificence of the Crown, with the desire that the public shall have the enjoyment of the parks, they have been dedicated to the public use—to the use of all classes in the metropolis, and of persons coming to visit the metropolis, subject to certain restrictions and conditions, which are essential to the objects for which the parks have thus been thrown open. The Crown, therefore, has the right to issue regulations with regard to the manner in which the parks are to be used by the public, and the enforcement of these regulations is not left to the mere discretion of the police, but to the Commissioner of Police and the force under his command, acting under the instructions of the Secretary of State. [Mr. WHALLEY: That is not stated in the order.] That is true, but it is not necessary for the validity of such an order that the authority under which it is made should be stated in it. Really I was not aware that any doubt existed on the subject. I thought it was universally known that the parks were Crown property. Intimations to that effect may be seen constantly exhibited on the park gates, giving notice to all the world that there are certain regulations under which the parks are to be used. The notice issued in October, 1862, although signed by Sir Richard Mayne, was given by the direct authority of myself, as Secretary of State, consequent upon the riotous proceedings which took place at that time, and which were the subject of very general and very just complaint. I am entirely responsible for it. The order referred to Sunday meetings, and distinctly stated that they could not be allowed, because they were utterly inconsistent with the objects for which the parks had been dedicated to the use of the public. The hon. Gentleman said there was a gross mistake in that notice. He said that the persons who came there were peaceably disposed, but others came not so disposed, and actual conflict took place in the park on two or three successive Sundays. Persons came there armed with sticks and stones, and it was absolutely necessary for public order and for the sake of those who used the parks, that such riotous proceedings should be put a stop to, and Sir Richard Mayne gave instructions to the police to give effect to the terms of that notice. These meetings had been held on Sunday, and he limited his instructions to Sunday because on Sunday only had the objectionable proceedings arisen; but the terms of the notice were general, warning the public against such meetings at any time. The hon. Member complains of the terms in which the order was issued, and he is extremely indignant that constables are told not to take people into custody or take notice of any offensive language, but to show great forbearance, because by such conduct persons are deprived of any ground of complaint before a magistrate. Then he complains of the conduct of the police, and quotes remarks made by magistrates with reference to individual cases brought before them, and not with reference to the general conduct of the force. I am very glad to find the hon. Gentleman has no new complaint to make of the conduct of the police since last year, for the passages he has read from Mr. Selfe and other magistrates were all published and circulated last year by the society with which the hon. Gentleman says he is connected. I have already answered the question as to the authority under which public meetings are prohibited in the parks. As to the expediency of that prohibition, I will not now enter into any argument; I will only say that I believe it to be conducive to the public interests, and the enjoyment of all persons making use of the parks, that they should not be used for holding such meetings. With regard to Primrose Hill, although not specially alluded to, I may say that it does not stand on the same footing as the other Royal parks, but it is placed by Act of Parliament, under the express authority of the Chief Commissioner of Public Works, and under special directions it also is dedicated to the public. It became necessary, therefore, when a tree was to be planted to the memory of Shakespeare, to make application to my right hon. Friend for leave to assemble a large body of people there. On that occasion leave was readily conceded. Then I come to the other case—namely, the meeting to discuss the departure of General Garibaldi. The hon. Gentleman says I justified it with reference to the instructions given in October, 1862. Neither the Secretary of State, nor the Commissioner of Works, nor the Chief Commissioner of Police, gave any directions to the police to interfere with that meeting. I regretted that interference, but I said I believed the Superintendent of Police on the spot conceived that he was acting in the spirit of the notice of October, 1862, prohibiting meetings of an exciting character in the parks. So far from justifying interference, I expressed my regret, and the Chief Commissioner of Police himself intimated to the superintendent on duty there that he had exceeded his duty in interfering with that meeting, and that he ought not to have done so without special instructions. No injury was inflicted on any person, and it is not likely, after the notice Sir Richard Mayne had taken of the proceedings, that any such interference will again occur. I have, I think, answered the question of the hon. Gentleman—Sir Richard Mayne has no authority on these matters. It is the Secretary of State and the Chief Commissioner of Works who have the authority, and we are entirely responsible for what we have done.

MR. NEATE said, he wished to know, if it were desired to hold a peaceful meeting on Primrose Hill, to take into consideration the rejection of the £6 franchise by that House, whether permission would be given for such a purpose?

SIR GEORGE GREY: The best answer I can give to that question is to state, that when a request was made subsequently to my right hon. Friend to hold a meeting on Primrose Hill, anticipating that it would be a peaceful meeting—and it turned out a very small as well as a peaceful one—permission was given.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he would venture to suggest if another meeting should be held to discuss the departure of Garibaldi it should be held before Sutherland House.

MR. F. S. POWELL observed, that it was the custom of the Government to make a statement on introducing the Army and Navy Estimates, but not the Miscellaneous, or Civil Service, or Supplemental Votes. He wished, therefore, to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he was prepared to make a statement with reference to the plans of the National Gallery and the result of the negotiations with the Royal Academy, and whether he would allow full time for consideration after the statement so made, before the House was asked to vote money in pursuance of it?

PUBLIC AND REFRESHMENT HOUSES (METROPOLIS) BILL—[BILL 92.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir George Grey.)

SIR GEORGE GREY, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, the measure proposed that the class of houses to which it referred should be closed during the hours between one and four o'clock in the morning. Since the Bill had been printed and circulated, the licensed victuallers of the metropolis, whom it chiefly concerned, had held a meeting, and passed resolutions entirely concurring in its object, believing it would be conducive to public morality and not prejudicial to their interests. They and the refreshment house-keepers had made some suggestions as to certain exceptions being made in the case of houses which were licensed for musical and other entertainments. It was desired that there should be a power of granting an occasional licence for such places to be kept open beyond one o'clock; and he should endeavour to prepare a clause for that purpose. He wished also to amend the Bill by including the City of London within its operation, because, though geographically within the metropolitan district, the City was not technically within it.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>, and committed for Monday, 6th June.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON presented a Bill for annexing certain Conditions to the Appointment of Persons to offices in the governing Bodies of certain Public Schools and Colleges.

EARL STANHOPE said, it was quite proper that no new vested interests should be created until Parliament had expressed its opinion; but his object in rising was to state that it would be desirable to renew the discussion respecting public schools upon the second reading of the Bill now introduced, inasmuch as the discussion on Friday evening was arrested by the indisposition of a noble Lord who had intended to take part in it.

VACCINATION.—QUESTION.

LORD LYTTTELTON wished to ask the President of the Council a Question of which he had given him private notice, respecting the intentions of the Government in order to secure the more effectual enforcement of vaccination. The Returns of the Registrar General showed a large amount of preventible disease and of deaths from small-pox, and it was very desirable that something should be done.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, the subject was one which eminently deserved the consideration of the Government. He would beg to read to their Lordships an extract from the report of the Epidemiological Society—

"3,240 persons die, on an average, every year in England from small-pox. In the metropolis alone the average annual mortality from this disease exceeds 700. At epidemic periods the mortality assumes much higher proportions, and in the epidemic which ravaged London last year and has not yet quite ended, nearly 2,500 lives have already been sacrificed. . . . Nothing can be more certain than that, if all were thoroughly well vaccinated in early infancy, small-pox might be nearly banished from our death registers. But it should be emphatically stated that this cannot be accomplished by the mere extension of vaccination, unless means be taken at the same time to secure the more complete and effectual performance of the operation. . . . It appears to the Committee very inexpedient that the control of public vaccination should be vested in two distinct Government Boards, and they are of opinion that the powers now exercised by the Poor Law Board should be transferred to the Privy Council."

EARL GRANVILLE stated, that the matter had been under the consideration of the Government. There were only two ways of effecting the object, either by the adoption of more compulsory means, or by higher payments in some shape or other. Her Majesty's Government had come to the conclusion that the first alternative was not desirable, and he believed that this was also the opinion of the Epidemiological Society. There was hardly sufficient information to justify the Government in paying more of the public money without further inquiry. He (Earl Granville) suggested that Lord Lyttelton should bring in a Bill, and that that Bill should be referred to a Select Committee of the House.

NEW ZEALAND.—QUESTION.

LORD LYTTTELTON, in rising to ask the intention of Her Majesty's Government with respect to a loan for which the New Zealand Government had requested the guarantee of this country, and to call the attention of the House to the present state of the Native question in New Zealand, said, that he should also include in his Motion a question upon the Suppression of Rebellion Bill, an important Act which had been passed by the New Zealand Legislature. He believed that it could not be said that since he brought the latter subject before the House a year ago, or since it was introduced three years ago by his noble Friend on the cross-benches (Earl Grey), just before Governor Sir George Grey had undertaken the management of the colony for the second time, any improvement had taken place in the condition of the Native population of New Zealand. So far from that being the case, the Natives had, on the contrary, deteriorated, numerically, socially, and religiously. It was to be very much doubted if they were half as numerous at the present time as they were some years ago, or if their number now exceeded 50,000, and this, too, had occurred in spite of the cessation of internal warfare. In a blue-book published on the affairs of New Zealand, he found the following description of the social state of the Native population by Mr. Gorst, then resident among the Waikato Tribes:—

"Persons long resident in this district inform me that the Natives have steadily grown poorer since the 'King movement' commenced. However this may be, the fact and the cause of their present poverty are plain enough. A great many of the European traders have either left the district or ceased to trade; those who remain are unanimous in declaring that for £100 they took formerly they do not take £10 now. The Natives in this neighbourhood, once the greatest wheat-growing district in the Waikato, are now planting scarcely any wheat; they have sold nearly all their horses and cattle, and most of their pigs; their houses have fallen into ruin; their clothes are ragged; their mills, ploughs, and thrashing machines are left to go to decay, while the owners are travelling about to 'huis' and 'tangis,' or spending their days in sitting watching a boundary line that they may pounce upon stray cattle. In the coming winter there will probably be serious scarcity of food. At Peria, in November last, William Thompson and his tribe were living exclusively on fern root; they are the most generous and hospitable of Natives, but at that time they had not a pig or a potato either for themselves or their guests."

that it was possible at some far distant time that the proudest memorial of this country might be found in the Christian empire of New Zealand, and since that time greater success had in that country attended missionary efforts than in probably any other part of our dominions. But now, he regretted to find that in a letter published in The Times not long ago, Bishop Selwyn had stated that the Natives were decaying both in morality and religion. His noble Friend upon the cross-benches (Earl Grey) when he brought forward this subject upon a former occasion made two recommendations. One of those recommendations was to take back the power of control over native affairs from the Colonists into the hands of the Crown. The noble Lord (Lord Lyveden) opposed that proposition, which indeed he (Lord Lyttelton) did not think would have been justified by the circumstances of the case; nor did he believe that his noble Friend would now venture seriously to propose such a course. Whatever misfortunes had occurred, they were not owing, he believed, to the establishment of a constitutional Government in New Zealand. And it was at all events impossible that such a course could be adopted; there was no instance where self-government once conferred upon a colony had been taken away. The other suggestion of his noble Friend was adopted, and Sir George Grey, who had distinguished himself as a colonial Governor in South Australia and New Zealand, had been again sent to New Zealand as Governor. For his own part he had never been able to participate in the sanguine hopes entertained as to the results of that appointment, and certainly not much had been done as yet to justify the expectation. A mere change of Government in itself produced a bad effect upon the minds of the Natives, as anything like vacillation or hesitation excited an unsatisfactory state of feeling among them. It was true that it was hard to say what more than he had done, Sir George Grey could do, but even the noble Earl must admit that as yet but little benefit had accrued from the change of Governors. Indeed, as to the proximate cause of the last war, Sir George Grey had admitted that it must be traced to an error of his own, and if the Governor had restored to the Natives some land which had been taken from them, simultaneously with the re-occupation of some land of ours, it was very possible that the war would have been for a time averted. But he did not blame the Government for that not having been done, because whatever might have been the cause of the war, it was impossible in the then excited state of the Native mind that an outbreak could long have been delayed. With respect to the manner in which the war had been carried on he should not trouble the House with many remarks, as he believed that upon the whole the war had been conducted in a proper spirit. He had some doubts about the propriety of some proceedings, especially as to the eviction from some villages near Auckland of a number of infirm and aged Natives; but there was at the time a feeling of alarm for the safety of Auckland which explained that proceeding. The cause of the war was very simple. We had not governed the Natives in any way as we were solemnly bound to do. It was said that the Natives now in arms against us were rebels; and no doubt they were so—but the term rebel must be applied to them with considerable leniency. The chiefs of New Zealand were originally independent. If the Treaty of Waitangi had been signed by a majority of the chiefs of the Northern Island the opposition of the minority could have been passed over; but of the great tribe of the Waikatos hardly one chief signed the treaty. What we had undertaken to do for the Natives was briefly stated by Sir William Martin—

“It is plain that the framers of the treaty desired to bring all the Natives into the position of subjects of the Crown; but it is not to be conceived that they contemplated the introduction at once among the New Zealanders of the minute and technical terms of English law; they regarded only the substance of the law—the substantial fruits of settled Government—legal protection for life, legal protection for property.”

That we had not given them. The papers before the House proved that Governor Browne, too much supported in that view by the Home Government, took no cognizance of local disputes or quarrels among the Natives themselves. We had destroyed the kind of local administration which they had possessed, and we had given them nothing in its place. What was chiefly wanted was a good system of police. Unless there was an efficient system of police to administer the law, whatever the law might be it would be ineffectual. With reference to the Colonial Department at home, the papers before the House contained a despatch from the noble Duke who lately held the seals of the

Colonial Office—and he could not mention his name without expressing the regret which every Member of their Lordships' House felt for, he feared, the more than temporary loss which the public service of the country had sustained in him. No one could be treated with more kindness and courtesy than he had received from his noble Friend, on which account he felt bound to say this. Yet he could not but regret that the long report which had been forwarded to him had been acknowledged without any suggestions whatever, contrary to his own views as stated in a recent speech, that the chief function now of the Colonial Office was to give advice. He could not help repeating the suggestion he had formerly made, that they should throw on the colony of New Zealand the cost of their wars. The present war would cost a great deal more than £1,000,000, which was to be allowed by the Government; and it was a monstrous thing that the people of a colony should be able to carry on unlimited wars in a great measure at the expense of the mother country. To the outlying settlers in the wild regions around Auckland this war was no doubt a very serious calamity; but the shopkeepers and contractors of that town, so long as they had British troops to defend them, paid for by this country, had the most direct interest in its continuance. In fact, the Commissariat expenses in Auckland were the main support of the business of that place. Adverting to the despatch which had been sent out by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State (Mr. Cardwell), he must say for himself that he thought the Government were right in promising to see the colonists through this war if they applied themselves fairly to bring it to a conclusion; but he did think that a day ought to be fixed beyond which not a single farthing of expense should be thrown on this country, for the purpose of carrying on the internal wars of New Zealand. He did not go so far as to say that we ought not to furnish them with any troops, but he was clearly of opinion that we ought not to pay for their support. With regard to the measures which had been sent home for confirmation by the Government, there was, first of all, the Suppression of the Rebellion Act. That was a very serious measure. It was unlimited in its operations, and might place under martial law even his own colony of Canterbury. He should be glad to know what notice the Government had taken of that Bill, and whether they had given it their sanction. There was another Act, commonly called the Confiscation Act, under which the lands of Natives having been engaged in any act of rebellion since January 1, 1863, were to be confiscated. The Secretary of State appeared to think there were legal doubts as to the power of the colonial Parliament to pass that measure, and he should be glad to know whether that point had been settled by reference to the Law Advisers of the Crown. There were, certainly, objections to the Act, many of which were well pointed out by the Secretary of State. As to the disaffected Natives, would not the depriving them of all their lands drive them to despair? And, with regard to the friendly Natives, did not the Treaty of Waitangi give them absolute power over their own lands, declaring that no authority should interfere with their land without their consent? Besides, the project of inviting no less than 20,000 new settlers into the northern province of New Zealand was more than questionable; English emigration could not be carried on to that extent, and it was to be feared the effect would be to introduce an inferior population from Australia and elsewhere. It would also have the effect of disturbing the political proportions of the provinces, unless the seat of Government were to be removed from the northern extremity to a more central part of the colony. He confessed he should not regret if the Government had come to the determination to disallow the Confiscation Act altogether. The making of military roads through the disturbed districts, though a slower, would in the long run be as effectual a proceeding as the other measure, and would not be attended with such inconveniences. That measure, coupled after the cessation of the war with a policy of justice and fairness towards the Natives, would, he believed, give hope of a better state of things for the future. At the same time, he was not prepared to condemn what had been done by the Government; and if the present hostilities could be brought to a termination, and if the expense of future wars of that kind were thrown upon the colony of New Zealand itself, that, together with the adoption of an improved policy towards the Natives, would, he trusted, prevent the recurrence of the evils which they had lately had to deplore. He now wished to ask Her Majesty's Government,

What they had done with regard to the Suppression of the Rebellion Bill, and whether they thought the passing of that and the accompanying Bill was within the competence of the New Zealand Legislature? With regard to the Loan Bill, he was glad to see that the Government had not consented to the guarantee, as far as concerned the proposed confiscation.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the Question to which the noble Lord had called attention was one of the greatest importance, and also one of the greatest difficulty. Indeed, the best mode of conducting relations with the aborigines was one of the most difficult problems of Colonial Government, and there could be no doubt that our relations with the Natives of New Zealand were in a most unsatisfactory state. With respect to the commencement of the present war, there was no doubt that, whatever course might have then been taken, the minds of the Natives were in such a state that it would have been impossible to avert the outbreak, and that outbreak had been commenced by a violent outrage on the part of the Natives. He thought that, under the trying circumstances of the war, the government of Sir George Grey was entitled to the highest praise, and he was sure that the House would admit that, as far as the exertions both of our naval and military forces in New Zealand were concerned, nothing could have been more decisive and satisfactory, or at the same time more humane, than the manner in which the operations had been carried on. He agreed with the noble Lord to a great extent in what he had said as to calling upon the colonial community to pay the expenses resulting from their own policy, and to defray the cost of wars that were not Imperial but colonial in their character. With respect to the establishment of a European police in the Native districts, the practical difficulty arose from the anomalous position of the Native chiefs, who were undoubtedly subjects of the Queen, and yet retained some portion of their own forms of Government. Some further action on the part of the Government might be desirable, but the matter was one requiring great consideration before a decision was come to upon it. As to the formation of military roads, that was no doubt a suggestion which deserved attention. But it was quite clear that at the present moment the great thing to be desired was to put an end to the war, completely to assert our authority over the Maories, and then immediately to set to work upon the adoption of a healing policy, conceived in a spirit of fairness towards the English colonists, and also of justice and forbearance towards the Natives. The noble Lord asked what course the Government had taken with regard to the Suppression of the Rebellion Bill. When the Bill reached this country it was referred to the Law Officers of the Crown, who gave their opinion that it was not ultra vires. With respect to the grant of a general amnesty, it was most undesirable to take any step which might weaken the authority of the Colonial Government, or interfere with its responsibility.

that the Natives had lost all confidence in the English authorities, and no longer put faith in their promises. How were things to be set right? He was afraid that the extermination of the Natives would be the ultimate result. Such had been the case wherever the Anglo-Saxons had been brought into contact with savage races. Such had been the result in Australia, and the same result was in course of accomplishment in New Zealand, where, however, they were a more intelligent and active race; and this being so, our object should be to soften the fate of the Natives as much as possible. It could not be expected that the Natives should have any kindly feeling towards the colonists—they had dispossessed them of their land, and they would never forgive them. Their position had been well likened by Sir William Martin to that of the native Irish, and to the Native races of other conquered countries—the conquered race never forgot or forgave their conquerors, and maintained a traditional and determined hostility towards them. His own impression was that, as matters now stood, there were only two courses open to us. One was to allow the Natives to establish a kingdom of their own in some part of New Zealand and to set aside the sovereignty of the Queen; and the other was to confiscate all the remaining land in their possession. The latter was the object of the Bill for which the Royal Assent was now sought. He approved the suggestion of the Colonial Secretary that the operation of the Act should be limited to two years; but, at the same time, he felt quite certain that it would be continued beyond that period. Some resolute action should at once be taken on the part of the Colonial Office to prevent the mother country becoming responsible for the cost of future wars. As long as the settlers imagined that the Imperial purse was open to them, they would readily engage in war with the aborigines. He trusted, therefore, that the Colonial Secretary would not carry into effect any scheme for guaranteeing a loan for the colony. The difference to the colonists of a guarantee would not be more than 1 per cent; but, on the other hand, a guarantee would induce them to believe that we intended to support and favour them in every possible way, and there would be no end to wars with the Natives. New Zealand possessed representative institutions, and it ought to defray its own charges. Further aid and encouragement from the mother country, while doing no good to the Natives, but rather hastening their destruction, would eventually prove injurious to the colonists themselves.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY: My Lords. I have listened with much interest to the speech of the noble Lord who commenced this discussion, and to what has fallen from the noble Lords that followed him, and I concur with them in deploring the state of things that now exists in New Zealand. It is plain that the policy that has been pursued towards the Natives has rendered the question of the manner in which the future Government of that colony is to be conducted one of great difficulty. I had not the advantage of hearing clearly the speech of the noble Earl the President of the Council, in consequence of the low and colloquial tone in which he addressed himself rather to the noble Lord whom he was answering than to the House; but I presume the views of the Secretary of State for the Colonial Department, so ably expressed in his despatch of the 26th of April, as to the impolicy of one of the Bills sent hither for the Royal Assent, entitled the New Zealand Settlement Act, 1863, may be considered as the views of the Government upon the subject. In the objections Mr. Cardwell has pointed out as condemnatory of the policy proposed to be pursued under that Act, I most fully concur; but I regret, that in the face of those objections he should have concluded his despatch by conveying the sanction of the Government to the passing of the Bill. The Governor, Sir George Grey, is indeed recommended to act upon it with great caution and forbearance, and great confidence is placed in his judgment and discretion. But, however humanely and wisely the Act may be administered, it will, if it becomes the law of New Zealand, remain for ever as a damning record of confiscation and injustice towards the Natives. The Bill proposes among other things that neutral and even loyal men shall be dispossessed of their property, if others of the same tribe have taken up arms against the Government. Would such a proposition be tolerated for a moment in England as that an estate, held in co-partnership, should be wholly confiscated, because one or more of the proprietors had been guilty of high treason? Certainly not; and yet the case is exactly analogous. What hope could we have then that the New Zealanders, whose views of right and wrong are quite as clear as our own, should ever become reconciled to a Government so regardless of justice? It is, moreover, very questionable whether those that have been, and may still be, in arms against the Colonial Government, can properly be designated as rebels; they are, I believe, more correctly noticed in Mr. Cardwell's despatch as insurgents, for whatever outrages may be laid to their charge they have ever been in retaliation for wrong, they have never been the aggressors in any war; and in the present case they have risen in insurrection against what they, with some reason, regarded as an invasion of their just rights, the tribal rights that had been secured to them. If the rights of Englishmen had been similarly assailed, our past history warrants me in saying they would have been similarly defended; and is it any wonder that a brave, though a savage nation, should take up arms in their own defence? Subjects of the Crown they could hardly be considered when, as testified by Sir William Martin, late Chief Justice of New Zealand, in his very interesting and instructive paper on the relation of the Government to the Native population, the Queen's authority has never at any time been established over them, or exercised, except for the protection of the settlers; and it is totally contrary to the principle of constitutional Government to expect that the Natives should have respect for laws passed by a Legislature in which the settlers alone are represented. The grasping and unscrupulous spirit of the New Zealand Government, so constituted, may be gathered from the Bills now sent over for approval. What hope, I would ask, can there be of ever attaching the New Zealanders to British rule, if the proposed Act for territorial confiscation be carried into effect? The consequence of it must be a perpetual conflict between the settlers and Natives until the latter are exterminated. I hope that the disgrace of sanctioning such a policy may not be incurred. If the power of England is to be exercised for the civilization and improvement of the savage races, it must ever be directed by a strict regard for justice and good faith, for thus only can a beneficial influence be established. This rule, unhappily, has not been followed, and it will be difficult to restore confidence between Natives and settlers and to repair the mischiefs of mis-government. I do not

say that the Islands have derived no benefits under the Sovereignty of the British Crown. Through the enterprise of the colonists many substantial improvements have been made; European seeds and animals of various kinds, and farming implements have been sent out, whereby the value of the land has been greatly enhanced and its capabilities exhibited; but all this must of necessity have increased the reluctance of the Natives to part with it. It is true also that, through the agency of English missionaries, the inestimable boon of Christianity has been extended to the New Zealander; but this has only rendered it the more incumbent on the Colonial Government, in all its relations with the Native population, to exemplify the spirit of Christianity, and not to mar a good work by wrong or injustice. The papers that have been laid upon the table, especially the admirable and candid review by Sir William Martin of our past and present relations with New Zealand, are, unhappily, a confession that the conduct of the British settlers and of the Colonial Government towards the Natives has not been such as to gain their respect, or to warrant any claim to their confidence; but they are also suggestive of a course of policy by which disaffection may be subdued, the true interests of the Colony promoted, and the Queen's subjects of different races ultimately united. Even the Legislative Assembly of New Zealand, composed as it must be of persons little fitted by education to deal with the important interests confided to them, and many of them mere adventurers, unscrupulously eager to get possession of the lands in the hands of the Natives, yet includes some members who raised their voices against the Confiscation Act, now sent hither for the Royal Assent. Surely such men as have had the moral courage to remonstrate against the injustice and rapacity of the majority, and who, in their rejected resolutions, propounded a just and conciliatory policy, are well entitled to have their views considered by the Home Government at this important crisis in the affairs of the colony. It, in fact, depends upon the course of policy now to be determined on by Her Majesty's Government, whether the Natives of New Zealand shall have justice done to them and become incorporated with equal rights and privileges with the rest of the Queen's subjects, or whether a brave nation shall be doomed to extermination.

EARL GREY said, this was a very serious and painful question. Very disastrous events had taken place in New Zealand. One of its most flourishing settlements had been ruined, an immense amount of property had been destroyed; there had been a frightful expenditure of life and treasure, and a war, which promised to become one of extermination, was now raging between the original inhabitants and the settlers. It behoved their Lordships to consider how it was that the present state of things had arisen. Ten years ago the colony was enjoying the utmost prosperity. The Native inhabitants were then contented and loyal subjects of Her Majesty; education and religion had been widely spread among them, and were daily becoming more general. They were advancing in all the arts of civilization; and the settlers were becoming more and more intimately acquainted with them. Friendly relations subsisted between the two races; and through the united exertions of both the colony was making great progress. Now, to what was it that the lamentable change that had occurred was attributable? With the view of explaining the causes of the unhappy contrast presented by the present and the former state of things, he would briefly review some of the chief events in the history of New Zealand. It had been justly said that the colonization of that country had been begun in a most irregular manner. It was notorious that the Governments of a former day were extremely anxious to prevent British subjects from settling there, but that was found to be impossible; and during the Administration of Lord Melbourne the first steps were taken for establishing our authority in those Islands. But the difficulty which had from the first existed with regard to land soon grew to be serious, and ultimately a war broke out between the settlers and the Natives. At that critical time the noble Earl behind him (the Earl of Derby), then the Secretary of State, took the wise and certainly the most successful measure of sending out Sir George Grey, then the Governor of South Australia, who with the assistance of a not very large military force suppressed the rebellion. In August, 1847, the last sparks of the insurrection were extinguished, and tranquillity was restored. It had been intended to establish representative institutions in New Zealand, and an Act of Parliament had been passed for that purpose in 1846; but Sir George Grey was of opinion that this step had been prematurely taken, considering the excitement caused by the war, and he recommended that the proposed change in the form of government should be deferred. That advice was taken, and it was his (Earl Grey's) duty to submit to their Lordships a Bill suspending the measure for the adoption of representative government in New Zealand, which was passed in both Houses without opposition. That Bill vested considerable powers in the hands of the Governor; and it was to the fair and impartial exercise of those powers in regard both to Maories and settlers, that the happy state of the colony between 1847 and 1855 was due. The country was prosperous in almost every respect. Even the decrease of the Native population which had given rise to a good deal of anxiety ceased, and the natural increase seemed to be again beginning. Unfortunately, it was supposed that the welfare of the colony now rested on so secure a foundation that considerable changes might be made, without any danger, in the state of the Government. In 1852, by the advice of Sir George Grey, the design of conferring representative institutions on the colony was resumed, and might probably have been carried into effect with safety and advantage if the change had been made judiciously. Unfortunately, however, a clause was introduced into the Bill which virtually took the Executive power out of the hands of the Crown, by making the Superintendents, who were really Lieutenant Governors of the several provinces into which the colony was divided, elective, instead of being officers appointed by the Crown and removable by the Crown. The Governor could only act through these officers, over whom he could exercise no real control from the tenure by which they held their appointments. The Act of 1852 thus took the Executive power from the hands of the Government, and passed it to the nominees of the settlers. Even that would not, however, have been sufficient to produce the misfortunes which ensued, had it not been subsequently determined, under the Administration of Lord Aberdeen, to establish what was called a responsible Government in New Zealand, which meant that the Governor was to be controlled by Ministers who were responsible to the Colonial Legislature. In theory this form of Colonial Government might be the same as our own constitution, but it was different in practice. The Colonial Legislature was elected by a suffrage which was almost universal, and it was to a body thus constituted that, practically, the administration of the colony was transferred. There was no possibility of constituting in a colony a branch of the Legislature possessing anything like the weight or authority of the House of Lords, nor could the Governor be placed on a level with the Sovereign in this country. Hence generally in the colonies, responsible government meant party government in the hands of a complete democracy, and with no check whatever to any conceivable abuse of their authority by the party for the time being in power. He was persuaded that in the earlier stages, at all events, of colonies, this system would not be found to work well. This opinion was confirmed by all that had occurred in Australia. But in those colonies this system of Government was, at least, free from the objection of creating a tyranny in the hands of one part of the population over the other, as the Aborigines were there so few in number and so barbarous. But in New Zealand, the Natives were a considerable majority of the population, and were fully capable of understanding the injustice done to them, and yet they were excluded from all share or participation in the government. By an interpretation of the law, which in his own belief was erroneous, the Maories were excluded from sitting in the Assembly, and also from voting in the election of Members; for it was held that land held by a Native carried with it no vote; and therefore the Natives, though some of them were very wealthy, had no votes. Some of the missionaries (if he was correctly informed), suggested that this was unjust, and that provision ought to be made for giving some share in the representation to the Natives; but that proposition was deliberately rejected. The result of this system of government was to hand over the Native population to the unchecked dominion of the white population. What could they expect from such a system? They knew that what took place in Ireland when the Catholics were under the dominion of the Protestants was an opprobrium to our history; and in New Zealand it was worse, for there the evils of allowing a minority to govern the majority were aggravated by the contemptuous feeling which Englishmen, especially those of the less educated classes, habitually entertain towards the coloured races, whom they contumeliously describe as "niggers." The oppression of the inferior race was the inevitable result of what was done; and he conceived that the Government which allowed all power to be engrossed by the settlers over the Natives were responsible for the consequences which had ensued, and which were now witnessed. The papers which had been laid before Parliament contained the clearest evidence that the calamities of New Zealand were entirely due to the cause he had described. In 1854, and even so late as the beginning of 1855, the Governor represented the Natives as loyal and attached subjects of the Crown. But responsible Government came into operation in 1855, and towards the close of that year a change had already taken place. The Governor then described the Natives as becoming discontented, suspicious, and alarmed, as well they might be; for, looking at the manner in which they were governed, it was not difficult to find ample cause for distrust and alarm. In the first place, a stop was virtually put to all measures which had been contemplated for their benefit. There was no further extension of schools, or hospitals, or of those improvements which tended gradually to civilize a Native population, and to bring them under a European system of government. Moreover, the New Zealanders found that the persons in whom they confided were deprived of all situations of trust and power, and that other men, with very opposite sentiments, were put in their place. The Governor himself said, in one of his despatches, that there was among the settlers a perfect passion for land, which they were determined to obtain, by fair means, if possible, but, if not, then by foul. These sentiments were expressed by some of the colonial newspapers in terms most calculated to alarm the Maories, who were ready enough to perceive that the persons for whom these newspapers were written, and whose opinions they expressed, had become the virtual rulers of the country. Up to this time the Governor had been endeavouring gradually to extend the exercise of his authority over the Natives for the purpose of maintaining peace and order among them, and the institution of an effective police with this view had been contemplated. But after responsible Government was established, nothing more was done in this direction; and it was one of the just complaints of the Natives, that the Government made no attempt to guard

took credit for the Company for having just ordered £100 of additional work—£100 of work spread over a property of forty miles in extent! Certainly that was a noble instance of liberality. But the real truth was, that the state of things described as existing on the property in question was not as exceptional as it was stated to be; for it had been proved not long since before a Committee upstairs, that it was the custom in a certain district in Donegal to serve notice to quit every year upon the wretched tenants, thus holding them utterly at the mercy of the landlords, who used that terrible power as a screw for raising the rents upon their helpless victims. Nor was the reason given by the tenants of the Law Life Assurance Company for not improving their dwellings limited to their case; it was common to a vast number of properties in Ireland, on which the tenants, holding by the most uncertain and precarious tenure—from year to year—were liable to have their rent raised in case they improved their farms or dwellings, or to have the fruits of their industry given to others. The discussion was of this value, that it enabled the House to obtain glimpses of many of the causes of that misery which Englishmen found it so difficult to account for and understand. For instance, the noble Lord the Member for Mayo (Lord John Browne) asserted, and no doubt truly, that the Mayo property of the Company was quite as well managed as the other absentee properties in his county. If so, what a picture of the evils of absenteeism—of the misery and wretchedness which it brought upon Ireland! Englishmen were constantly asking what were the causes of the misery and wretchedness of the Irish people. In the triumphant vindication of the Company might be traced one cause; for it was confidently asserted that this property was no worse managed than that of other absentee proprietors. He believed in his soul that absenteeism was one of the most hideous of the curses that afflicted Ireland; and, until Parliament had the courage to grapple with it, as well as with the land question, they could not get at the root of the evil, and certainly could not restore peace or prosperity to that country. He did not say that absentees should be deprived of their property—of course, no such notion could enter his mind; but he did say that absentees should have a special tax placed upon them—that they should be taxed to a larger amount than other proprietors—that they should be made to pay some compensation for the injuries they inflicted, and for the loss which those from whom they derived their incomes suffered in having everything drained from the land and the people. The wealth of the country was spent in splendour and luxury in England, or on the Continent, while those from whom that wealth was raised were left to the mercy of an agent, good or bad—were left without encouragement or guidance, deprived of all protection or support. It and the land question were no doubt questions of grave difficulty; but until statesmen at both sides of the House and men of all parties resolved on dealing with such questions in a bold and energetic spirit, the country would continue to be filled with misery and discontent, and the people would fly from its shores in despair. This was a grave and solemn question—not a trumpery question about Yeomanry cavalry—but one which concerned the very existence of the Irish people. And until Englishmen had the courage to deal with it, they would be held responsible by the civilized world for the unhappiness and misery of Ireland; for they could not free themselves from that responsibility, inasmuch as the affairs of Ireland were managed by an English Parliament. Ireland was still, and would for years continue to be, an agricultural country; and, until manufactures were spread over the south and west of that country, the prosperity or poverty of its people would altogether depend upon the chance of a good or a bad harvest; and, therefore, the necessity of giving protection to the tenant for the fruits of his industry, and thus alone could he be induced to put forth those energies which would increase the productive power of the soil, and fill the land with plenty and content. He did not desire to make any special accusation against this special proprietary; he was quite content to allow the House to form its own judgment from the conflicting statements it had heard. Enough had been said to show that great and grievous evils existed in Ireland, and that it was the duty of Parliament to grapple with them without delay, so as, if possible, to afford that poor country some gleam of sunshine—some glimpse of a brighter and better state of things—after the long years of sorrow and misery it had passed through.

COLONEL EDWARDS said, that he could not conceive why the hon. Member for

Dungarvan, to whose remarks he had listened with attention and interest, should have dragged him into this discussion by referring to the question of the Yeomanry.

MR. MAGUIRE said, that he was under the impression that the hon. and gallant Gentleman had made some sneering remark upon something which he said.

COLONEL EDWARDS: I never spoke a word.

MR. MAGUIRE: Then, Sir, I beg to apologize.

MR. SCULLY said, he doubted very much whether any company could hold land except for its corporate purposes. He was at a loss for a cause to which to attribute the extraordinary Parliamentary indecency of which the Chief Secretary had been guilty in coming forward to defend this company, and treating the hon. Member for Galway scarcely with courtesy.

MR. SPEAKER said, he had to remind the hon. Member that he had already addressed the House.

MR. SCULLY said, that he was under the impression that, according to the new rule, a Member could on Friday evening speak on every subject that was introduced.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member for Mallow had moved no Amendment, and therefore the Question before the House was the same as that upon which the hon. Member for Cork had already spoken.

PUBLIC MEETINGS IN THE PARKS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to call attention to the instructions issued to the Police Commissioners, as to the suppression of public meetings in the parks, and to the powers assumed by subordinate members of the Force in suppressing the meeting at Primrose Hill. One reason for his soliciting attention to the matter was, that he had last Session moved for some Returns, and introduced a Bill in reference to the police. He did not intend to discuss the questions connected with the Garibaldi meetings held in 1862 and the present year, or with the right exercised from time immemorial of discussing public matters in the public parks. But it certainly was an unfortunate coincidence that that gentleman, Garibaldi, with whom the inhabitants of London and the people of this country

generally felt so deep a sympathy, should have been the cause, unwittingly, of the greatest injury which the inhabitants of the metropolis had sustained for years past. With the question as to the authority of the Government or of the Ranger of the parks to say in what way the parks should be used by the public he would not deal, because that question more properly belonged to the representatives of the metropolis. But what he did venture to refer to was the position assumed by the Chief Commissioner of Police, which rendered it immaterial whether the public enjoyed the right of meeting in the parks or not, for his instructions rendered it impossible that in the parks they could any longer enjoy the right of free discussion. If the instructions contained in these Returns were tacitly sanctioned, he ventured to say that no police force on the Continent would more arbitrarily set itself above the law or act in more direct antagonism to the public interests than that commanded by Sir Richard Mayne. He should justify that statement by a reference to the Return which had been made in pursuance of his Motion. The House would recollect that in answer to a Question put by the hon. Member for Marylebone as to the recent suppression of a meeting on Primrose Hill relating to Garibaldi, the right hon. Gentleman said, the police had stopped that meeting because they supposed the order issued two years ago by Sir Richard Mayne as to riotous assemblages in the parks justified them in doing so. Now, the Returns to which he had alluded contained two papers only; one a printed notice addressed to the public, and the other a private order addressed to the police in furtherance of that notice. In the printed notice, which was dated October 9, 1862, Sir Richard Mayne said—

He had looked through all the Police Acts relating to the metropolis, and had not found anything authorizing Sir Richard Mayne to use those words, or to sit in judgment as to what were “popular and exciting topics.” The notice went on to say—

“and the excitement occasioned by such discussions at such meetings has frequently led to tumults and disorders so as to endanger the public peace; and on last Sunday and the Sunday before large numbers of persons assembled in Hyde Park for the purposes assigned, and when so assembled conducted themselves in a disorderly and riotous manner, so as to endanger the public peace, and by the use of sticks and throwing stones and other missiles, committed many violent assaults upon persons quietly passing along the parks, and interrupted the thoroughfares.”

That portion of the notice was wholly at variance with the facts. It was perfectly well known that the persons assembled to discuss the subject of Garibaldi brought neither sticks or stones, but came for a perfectly legitimate purpose. Those, on the contrary, who came, he believed, from Connemara in some instances to prevent discussion, were the persons who brought these weapons with them. It would be well that the Chief Commissioner for Works, or some other Member of the Government, having had his attention directed to that misstatement, should offer some explanation on the point. In the police order dated the 11th of October, the members of the force were told that—

The House would observe that the order was limited to Sundays, and yet the police, professedly acting in obedience to the order, put down the last meeting, which was held on Saturday. The terms of the order moreover allowed individual constables to put such a construction upon them as they thought likely to be gratifying to their superiors. He trusted that the House would agree that the Chief Commissioner of Police, intrusted with the duty of carrying out the laws for the benefit of the subject, had set an example of the most glaring and flagrant illegality. The right hon. Gentleman had said that if any person was aggrieved he had the remedy in his own hands, as he could prosecute the police-constable for assault, but that proceeding had been anticipated and provided against by Sir Richard Mayne. The 10th paragraph of instructions ran thus—

whole paragraph.] He had read the whole paragraph. He wanted to know what business Sir Richard Mayne had to interfere with any person unless he took him into custody, and thus gave him an opportunity of questioning the legality of the act. The other paragraphs of that remarkable order of Sir Richard Mayne were directed to the instruction of the police how to prevent public meetings, and that it was which gave significance to the tenth paragraph, which prevented any person aggrieved from testing the legality of the acts of the police. By the last paragraph, the police were

Thus Sir Richard Mayne was pleased to say that any person not committing an illegal act was to be treated with forbearance. It was well to recollect who were the persons to whom the carrying out of these orders was intrusted. He could speak from his own personal knowledge, being connected with a society comprising Members of the other House of Parliament, whose attention had been attracted to the conduct of the police, and he could say that their conduct was not satisfactory. But he would cite better authority. Mr. Selfe, a well-known metropolitan magistrate, referring to a case which came before him, said the police sergeant had been too officious. He had seen so many cases of similar misconduct that he intended to keep a record of all such cases, and upon another occasion the same magistrate said that, speaking generally, it would be well if constables were not so officious, and were to refrain from ill using persons. And yet these were the constables who were justified by the right hon. Gentleman for applying an order made to prevent meetings on Sundays to a meeting held on a Saturday. Mr. Yardley, also a magistrate, said, day after day persons were brought before him who ought never to have been taken into custody. A still higher authority, Mr. Baron Bramwell, said, in relation to a case tried before him, that the police were a stupid set of men. In conclusion, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give some explanation how it was that he justified orders which indicated an assumption of authority on the part of the police

which was dangerous to the liberty of the subject, and was calculated to bring the law and the administration of justice into contempt.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the inconvenience which was caused to the people of the metropolis by the course he, on behalf of the Government, had pursued upon the Question. His hon. Friend who had called attention to the subject had done so, perhaps, not in a very lucid manner, so that its real importance might not be apparent to hon. Gentlemen. It really was a serious Question, what were the precise rights of the people in the parks of this metropolis, as great inconvenience had resulted from the people being left by the Government under a misconception upon that point. It was the duty of the Government upon a Question of the kind to state clearly and distinctly what were their views, so that the people ought to be under no misapprehension as to their rights in the parks. It was not for him to suggest what those rights were, but for the Government to state what authority they claimed over the parks and over the people who went into them for any purpose. Would the right hon. Baronet explain whether the public had a right to go into the parks and to assemble there to discuss any public question. It could not be allowed that it should be left to Sir Richard Mayne or to any subordinate person to say that people should assemble for one purpose but not for another—that 50,000 persons might assemble on Primrose Hill to plant a tree in honour of Shakespeare, but that they should not assemble there to express an opinion about Garibaldi. There must be some principle governing all meetings, but if there was to be a discretion, it must be intrusted to some other authority than Sir Richard Mayne. He wanted to know in whom that discretion was vested. Was it in the Home Secretary or in the Chief Commissioner of Works? A capricious application of the rule made for Sunday meetings to Saturday meetings left the Question in a position which involved danger to the peace of the metropolis.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, I am glad to have an opportunity of stating what I believe to be the right of the people to the parks. Before I do so, however, I wish to advert to what has fallen from the hon. Member for Peterborough. He has raised two questions—the right of the public generally to assemble in the parks for all purposes, and he has questioned the expediency, and even the legality, of the notice issued in 1862 upon that subject, and the instructions given by the Chief Commissioner for the guidance of the police. He has also raised what I may call a minor question, as to the expediency or legality of interfering with the meeting which was recently held on Primrose Hill. The hon. Gentleman says he has looked through the Police Acts, and in vain endeavoured to find the authority under which Sir Richard Mayne interferes, as he has done, with the people in the parks. But the authority is not contained in the Police Acts at all. The order was issued in October, 1862, and was caused by the riotous assemblies which had then recently taken place in the parks. The Police Acts confer no such authority as the hon. Gentleman referred to on Sir Richard Mayne. But the parks are Royal parks. They are the property of the Crown; and through the liberality and munificence of the Crown, with the desire that the public shall have the enjoyment of the parks, they have been dedicated to the public use—to the use of all classes in the metropolis, and of persons coming to visit the metropolis, subject to certain restrictions and conditions, which are essential to the objects for which the parks have thus been thrown open. The Crown, therefore, has the right to issue regulations with regard to the manner in which the parks are to be used by the public, and the enforcement of these regulations is not left to the mere discretion of the police, but to the Commissioner of Police and the force under his command, acting under the instructions of the Secretary of State. [MR. WHALLEY: That is not stated in the order.] That is true, but it is not necessary for the validity of such an order that the authority under which it is made should be stated in it. Really I was not aware that any doubt existed on the subject. I thought it was universally known that the parks were Crown property. Intimations to that effect may be seen constantly exhibited on the park gates, giving notice to all the world that there are certain regulations under which the parks are to be used. The notice issued in October, 1862, although signed by Sir Richard Mayne, was given by the direct authority of myself, as Secretary of State, consequent upon the riotous proceedings which took place at that time, and which were the subject of very general and very just complaint. I am entirely responsible for it. The order referred to Sunday meetings, and distinctly stated that they could not be allowed, because they were utterly inconsistent with the objects for which the parks had been dedicated to the use of the public. The hon. Gentleman said there was a gross mistake in that notice. He said that the persons who came there were peaceably disposed, but others came not so disposed, and actual conflict took place in the park on two or three successive Sundays. Persons came there armed with sticks and stones, and it was absolutely necessary for public order and for the sake of those who used the parks, that such riotous proceedings should be put a stop to, and Sir Richard Mayne gave instructions to the police to give effect to the terms of that notice. These meetings had been held on Sunday, and he limited his instructions to Sunday because on Sunday only had the objectionable proceedings arisen; but the terms of the notice were general, warning the public against such meetings at any time. The hon. Member complains of the terms in which the order was issued, and he is extremely indignant that constables are told not to take people into custody or take notice of any offensive language, but to show great forbearance, because by such conduct persons are deprived of any ground of complaint before a magistrate. Then he complains of the conduct of the police, and quotes remarks made by magistrates with reference to individual cases brought before them, and not with reference to the general conduct of the force. I am very glad to find the hon. Gentleman has no new complaint to make of the conduct of the police since last year, for the passages he has read from Mr. Selfe and other magistrates were all published and circulated last year by the society with which the hon. Gentleman says he is connected. I have already answered the question as to the authority under which public meetings are prohibited in the parks. As to the expediency of that prohibition, I will not now enter into any argument; I will only say that I believe it to be conducive to the public interests, and the enjoyment of all persons making use of the parks, that they should not be used for holding such meetings. With regard to Primrose Hill, although not specially alluded to, I may say that it does not stand on the same footing as the other Royal parks, but it is placed by Act of Parliament, under the express authority of the Chief Commissioner of Public Works, and under special directions it also is dedicated to the public. It became necessary, therefore, when a tree was to be planted to the memory of Shakespeare, to make application to my right hon. Friend for leave to assemble a large body of people there. On that occasion leave was readily conceded. Then I come to the other case—namely, the meeting to discuss the departure of General Garibaldi. The hon. Gentleman says I justified it with reference to the instructions given in October, 1862. Neither the Secretary of State, nor the Commissioner of Works, nor the Chief Commissioner of Police, gave any directions to the police to interfere with that meeting. I regretted that interference, but I said I believed the Superintendent of Police on the spot conceived that he was acting in the spirit of the notice of October, 1862, prohibiting meetings of an exciting character in the parks. So far from justifying interference, I expressed my regret, and the Chief Commissioner of Police himself intimated to the superintendent on duty there that he had exceeded his duty in interfering with that meeting, and that he ought not to have done so without special instructions. No injury was inflicted on any person, and it is not likely, after the notice Sir Richard Mayne had taken of the proceedings, that any such interference will again occur. I have, I think, answered the question of the hon. Gentleman—Sir Richard Mayne has no authority on these matters. It is the Secretary of State and the Chief Commissioner of Works who have the authority, and we are entirely responsible for what we have done.

MR. NEATE said, he wished to know, if it were desired to hold a peaceful meeting on Primrose Hill, to take into consideration the rejection of the £6 franchise by that House, whether permission would be given for such a purpose?

SIR GEORGE GREY: The best answer I can give to that question is to state, that when a request was made subsequently to my right hon. Friend to hold a meeting on Primrose Hill, anticipating that it would be a peaceful meeting—and it turned out a very small as well as a peaceful one—permission was given.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he would venture to suggest if another meeting should be held to discuss the departure of Garibaldi.

baldi it should be held before Sutherland House.

MR. F. S. POWELL observed, that it was the custom of the Government to make a statement on introducing the Army and Navy Estimates, but not the Miscellaneous, or Civil Service, or Supplemental Votes. He wished, therefore, to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he was prepared to make a statement with reference to the plans of the National Gallery and the result of the negotiations with the Royal Academy, and whether he would allow full time for consideration after the statement so made, before the House was asked to vote money in pursuance of it?

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir George Grey.)

SIR GEORGE GREY, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, the measure proposed that the class of houses to which it referred should be closed during the hours between one and four o'clock in the morning. Since the Bill had been printed and circulated, the licensed victuallers of the metropolis, whom it chiefly concerned, had held a meeting, and passed resolutions entirely concurring in its object, believing it would be conducive to public morality and not prejudicial to their interests. They and the refreshment house-keepers had made some suggestions as to certain exceptions being made in the case of houses which were licensed for musical and other entertainments. It was desired that there should be a power of granting an occasional licence for such places to be kept open beyond one o'clock; and he should endeavour to prepare a clause for that purpose. He wished also to amend the Bill by including the City of London within its operation, because, though geographically within the metropolitan district, the City was not technically within it.

EARL STANHOPE said, it was quite proper that no new vested interests should be created until Parliament had expressed its opinion; but his object in rising was to state that it would be desirable to renew the discussion respecting public schools upon the second reading of the Bill now introduced, inasmuch as the discussion on Friday evening was arrested by the indisposition of a noble Lord who had intended to take part in it.

VACCINATION.—QUESTION.

LORD LYTTTELTON wished to ask the President of the Council a Question of which he had given him private notice, respecting the intentions of the Government in order to secure the more effectual enforcement of vaccination. The Returns of the Registrar General showed a large amount of preventible disease and of deaths from small-pox, and it was very desirable that something should be done.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, the subject was one which eminently deserved the consideration of the Government. He would beg to read to their Lordships an extract from the report of the Epidemiological Society—

EARL GRANVILLE stated, that the matter had been under the consideration of the Government. There were only two ways of effecting the object, either by the adoption of more compulsory means, or by higher payments in some shape or other. Her Majesty's Government had come to the conclusion that the first alternative was not desirable, and he believed that this was also the opinion of the Epidemiological Society. There was hardly sufficient information to justify the Government in paying more of the public money without further inquiry. He (Earl Granville) suggested that Lord Lyttelton should bring in a Bill, and that that Bill should be referred to a Select Committee of the House.

NEW ZEALAND.—QUESTION.

LORD LYTTTELTON, in rising to ask the intention of Her Majesty's Government with respect to a loan for which the New Zealand Government had requested the guarantee of this country, and to call the attention of the House to the present state of the Native question in New Zealand, said, that he should also include in his Motion a question upon the Suppression of Rebellion Bill, an important Act which had been passed by the New Zealand Legislature. He believed that it could not be said that since he brought the latter subject before the House a year ago, or since it was introduced three years ago by his noble Friend on the cross-benches (Earl Grey), just before Governor Sir George Grey had undertaken the management of the colony for the second time, any improvement had taken place in the condition of the Native population of New Zealand. So far from that being the case, the Natives had, on the contrary, deteriorated, numerically, socially, and religiously. It was to be very much doubted if they were half as numerous at the present time as they were some years ago, or if their number now exceeded 50,000, and this, too, had occurred in spite of the cessation of internal warfare. In a blue-book published on the affairs of New Zealand, he found the following description of the social state of the Native population by Mr. Gorst, then resident among the Waikato Tribes:—

“Persons long resident in this district inform me that the Natives have steadily grown poorer since the ‘King movement’ commenced. However this may be, the fact and the cause of their present poverty are plain enough. A great many of the European traders have either left the district or ceased to trade; those who remain are unanimous in declaring that for £100 they took formerly they do not take £10 now. The Natives in this neighbourhood, once the greatest wheat-growing district in the Waikato, are now planting scarcely any wheat; they have sold nearly all their horses and cattle, and most of their pigs; their houses have fallen into ruin; their clothes are ragged; their mills, ploughs, and thrashing machines are left to go to decay, while the owners are travelling about to ‘huis’ and ‘tangis,’ or spending their days in sitting watching a boundary line that they may pounce upon stray cattle. In the coming winter there will probably be serious scarcity of food. At Peria, in November last, William Thompson and his tribe were living exclusively on fern root; they are the most generous and hospitable of Natives, but at that time they had not a pig or a potato either for themselves or their guests.”

that it was possible at some far distant time that the proudest memorial of this country might be found in the Christian empire of New Zealand, and since that time greater success had in that country attended missionary efforts than in probably any other part of our dominions. But now, he regretted to find that in a letter published in The Times not long ago, Bishop Selwyn had stated that the Natives were decaying both in morality and religion. His noble Friend upon the cross-benches (Earl Grey) when he brought forward this subject upon a former occasion made two recommendations. One of those recommendations was to take back the power of control over native affairs from the Colonists into the hands of the Crown. The noble Lord (Lord Lyveden) opposed that proposition, which indeed he (Lord Lyttelton) did not think would have been justified by the circumstances of the case; nor did he believe that his noble Friend would now venture seriously to propose such a course. Whatever misfortunes had occurred, they were not owing, he believed, to the establishment of a constitutional Government in New Zealand. And it was at all events impossible that such a course could be adopted; there was no instance where self-government once conferred upon a colony had been taken away. The other suggestion of his noble Friend was adopted, and Sir George Grey, who had distinguished himself as a colonial Governor in South Australia and New Zealand, had been again sent to New Zealand as Governor. For his own part he had never been able to participate in the sanguine hopes entertained as to the results of that appointment, and certainly not much had been done as yet to justify the expectation. A mere change of Government in itself produced a bad effect upon the minds of the Natives, as anything like vacillation or hesitation excited an unsatisfactory state of feeling among them. It was true that it was hard to say what more than he had done, Sir George Grey could do, but even the noble Earl must admit that as yet but little benefit had accrued from the change of Governors. Indeed, as to the proximate cause of the last war, Sir George Grey had admitted that it must be traced to an error of his own, and if the Governor had restored to the Natives some land which had been taken from them, simultaneously with the re-occupation of some land of ours, it was very possible that the war would have been for a time averted. But he did not blame the Government for that not having been done, because whatever might have been the cause of the war, it was impossible in the then excited state of the Native mind that an outbreak could long have been delayed. With respect to the manner in which the war had been carried on he should not trouble the House with many remarks, as he believed that upon the whole the war had been conducted in a proper spirit. He had some doubts about the propriety of some proceedings, especially as to the eviction from some villages near Auckland of a number of infirm and aged Natives; but there was at the time a feeling of alarm for the safety of Auckland which explained that proceeding. The cause of the war was very simple. We had not governed the Natives in any way as we were solemnly bound to do. It was said that the Natives now in arms against us were rebels; and no doubt they were so—but the term rebel must be applied to them with considerable leniency. The chiefs of New Zealand were originally independent. If the Treaty of Waitangi had been signed by a majority of the chiefs of the Northern Island the opposition of the minority could have been passed over; but of the great tribe of the Waikatos hardly one chief signed the treaty. What we had undertaken to do for the Natives was briefly stated by Sir William Martin—

“It is plain that the framers of the treaty desired to bring all the Natives into the position of subjects of the Crown; but it is not to be conceived that they contemplated the introduction at once among the New Zealanders of the minute and technical terms of English law; they regarded only the substance of the law—the substantial fruits of settled Government—legal protection for life, legal protection for property.”

That we had not given them. The papers before the House proved that Governor Browne, too much supported in that view by the Home Government, took no cognizance of local disputes or quarrels among the Natives themselves. We had destroyed the kind of local administration which they had possessed, and we had given them nothing in its place. What was chiefly wanted was a good system of police. Unless there was an efficient system of police to administer the law, whatever the law might be it would be ineffectual. With reference to the Colonial Department at home, the papers before the House contained a despatch from the noble Duke who lately held the seals of the

Colonial Office—and he could not mention his name without expressing the regret which every Member of their Lordships' House felt for, he feared, the more than temporary loss which the public service of the country had sustained in him. No one could be treated with more kindness and courtesy than he had received from his noble Friend, on which account he felt bound to say this. Yet he could not but regret that the long report which had been forwarded to him had been acknowledged without any suggestions whatever, contrary to his own views as stated in a recent speech, that the chief function now of the Colonial Office was to give advice. He could not help repeating the suggestion he had formerly made, that they should throw on the colony of New Zealand the cost of their wars. The present war would cost a great deal more than £1,000,000, which was to be allowed by the Government; and it was a monstrous thing that the people of a colony should be able to carry on unlimited wars in a great measure at the expense of the mother country. To the outlying settlers in the wild regions around Auckland this war was no doubt a very serious calamity; but the shopkeepers and contractors of that town, so long as they had British troops to defend them, paid for by this country, had the most direct interest in its continuance. In fact, the Commissariat expenses in Auckland were the main support of the business of that place. Adverting to the despatch which had been sent out by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State (Mr. Cardwell), he must say for himself that he thought the Government were right in promising to see the colonists through this war if they applied themselves fairly to bring it to a conclusion; but he did think that a day ought to be fixed beyond which not a single farthing of expense should be thrown on this country, for the purpose of carrying on the internal wars of New Zealand. He did not go so far as to say that we ought not to furnish them with any troops, but he was clearly of opinion that we ought not to pay for their support. With regard to the measures which had been sent home for confirmation by the Government, there was, first of all, the Suppression of the Rebellion Act. That was a very serious measure. It was unlimited in its operations, and might place under martial law even his own colony of Canterbury. He should be glad to know what notice the Government had taken of that Bill, and whether they had given it their sanction. There was another Act, commonly called the Confiscation Act, under which the lands of Natives having been engaged in any act of rebellion since January 1, 1863, were to be confiscated. The Secretary of State appeared to think there were legal doubts as to the power of the colonial Parliament to pass that measure, and he should be glad to know whether that point had been settled by reference to the Law Advisers of the Crown. There were, certainly, objections to the Act, many of which were well pointed out by the Secretary of State. As to the disaffected Natives, would not the depriving them of all their lands drive them to despair? And, with regard to the friendly Natives, did not the Treaty of Waitangi give them absolute power over their own lands, declaring that no authority should interfere with their land without their consent? Besides, the project of inviting no less than 20,000 new settlers into the northern province of New Zealand was more than questionable; English emigration could not be carried on to that extent, and it was to be feared the effect would be to introduce an inferior population from Australia and elsewhere. It would also have the effect of disturbing the political proportions of the provinces, unless the seat of Government were to be removed from the northern extremity to a more central part of the colony. He confessed he should not regret if the Government had come to the determination to disallow the Confiscation Act altogether. The making of military roads through the disturbed districts, though a slower, would in the long run be as effectual a proceeding as the other measure, and would not be attended with such inconveniences. That measure, coupled after the cessation of the war with a policy of justice and fairness towards the Natives, would, he believed, give hope of a better state of things for the future. At the same time, he was not prepared to condemn what had been done by the Government; and if the present hostilities could be brought to a termination, and if the expense of future wars of that kind were thrown upon the colony of New Zealand itself, that, together with the adoption of an improved policy towards the Natives, would, he trusted, prevent the recurrence of the evils which they had lately had to deplore. He now wished to ask Her Majesty's Government,

What they had done with regard to the Suppression of the Rebellion Bill, and whether they thought the passing of that and the accompanying Bill was within the competence of the New Zealand Legislature? With regard to the Loan Bill, he was glad to see that the Government had not consented to the guarantee, as far as concerned the proposed confiscation.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that the Question to which the noble Lord had called attention was one of the greatest importance, and also one of the greatest difficulty. Indeed, the best mode of conducting relations with the aborigines was one of the most difficult problems of Colonial Government, and there could be no doubt that our relations with the Natives of New Zealand were in a most unsatisfactory state. With respect to the commencement of the present war, there was no doubt that, whatever course might have then been taken, the minds of the Natives were in such a state that it would have been impossible to avert the outbreak, and that outbreak had been commenced by a violent outrage on the part of the Natives. He thought that, under the trying circumstances of the war, the government of Sir George Grey was entitled to the highest praise, and he was sure that the House would admit that, as far as the exertions both of our naval and military forces in New Zealand were concerned, nothing could have been more decisive and satisfactory, or at the same time more humane, than the manner in which the operations had been carried on. He agreed with the noble Lord to a great extent in what he had said as to calling upon the colonial community to pay the expenses resulting from their own policy, and to defray the cost of wars that were not Imperial but colonial in their character. With respect to the establishment of a European police in the Native districts, the practical difficulty arose from the anomalous position of the Native chiefs, who were undoubtedly subjects of the Queen, and yet retained some portion of their own forms of Government. Some further action on the part of the Government might be desirable, but the matter was one requiring great consideration before a decision was come to upon it. As to the formation of military roads, that was no doubt a suggestion which deserved attention. But it was quite clear that at the present moment the great thing to be desired was to put an end to the war, completely to assert our authority over the Maories, and then immediately to set to work upon the adoption of a healing policy, conceived in a spirit of fairness towards the English colonists, and also of justice and forbearance towards the Natives. The noble Lord asked what course the Government had taken with regard to the Suppression of the Rebellion Bill. When the Bill reached this country it was referred to the Law Officers of the Crown, who gave their opinion that it was not ultra vires. With respect to the grant of a general amnesty, it was most undesirable to take any step which might weaken the authority of the Colonial Government, or interfere with its responsibility.

that the Natives had lost all confidence in the English authorities, and no longer put faith in their promises. How were things to be set right? He was afraid that the extermination of the Natives would be the ultimate result. Such had been the case wherever the Anglo-Saxons had been brought into contact with savage races. Such had been the result in Australia, and the same result was in course of accomplishment in New Zealand, where, however, they were a more intelligent and active race; and this being so, our object should be to soften the fate of the Natives as much as possible. It could not be expected that the Natives should have any kindly feeling towards the colonists—they had dispossessed them of their land, and they would never forgive them. Their position had been well likened by Sir William Martin to that of the native Irish, and to the Native races of other conquered countries—the conquered race never forgot or forgave their conquerors, and maintained a traditional and determined hostility towards them. His own impression was that, as matters now stood, there were only two courses open to us. One was to allow the Natives to establish a kingdom of their own in some part of New Zealand and to set aside the sovereignty of the Queen; and the other was to confiscate all the remaining land in their possession. The latter was the object of the Bill for which the Royal Assent was now sought. He approved the suggestion of the Colonial Secretary that the operation of the Act should be limited to two years; but, at the same time, he felt quite certain that it would be continued beyond that period. Some resolute action should at once be taken on the part of the Colonial Office to prevent the mother country becoming responsible for the cost of future wars. As long as the settlers imagined that the Imperial purse was open to them, they would readily engage in war with the aborigines. He trusted, therefore, that the Colonial Secretary would not carry into effect any scheme for guaranteeing a loan for the colony. The difference to the colonists of a guarantee would not be more than 1 per cent; but, on the other hand, a guarantee would induce them to believe that we intended to support and favour them in every possible way, and there would be no end to wars with the Natives. New Zealand possessed representative institutions, and it ought to defray its own charges. Further aid and encouragement from the mother country, while doing no good to the Natives, but rather hastening their destruction, would eventually prove injurious to the colonists themselves.

THE EARL OF CLANCARTY: My Lords. I have listened with much interest to the speech of the noble Lord who commenced this discussion, and to what has fallen from the noble Lords that followed him, and I concur with them in deploring the state of things that now exists in New Zealand. It is plain that the policy that has been pursued towards the Natives has rendered the question of the manner in which the future Government of that colony is to be conducted one of great difficulty. I had not the advantage of hearing clearly the speech of the noble Earl the President of the Council, in consequence of the low and colloquial tone in which he addressed himself rather to the noble Lord whom he was answering than to the House; but I presume the views of the Secretary of State for the Colonial Department, so ably expressed in his despatch of the 26th of April, as to the impolicy of one of the Bills sent hither for the Royal Assent, entitled the New Zealand Settlement Act, 1863, may be considered as the views of the Government upon the subject. In the objections Mr. Cardwell has pointed out as condemnatory of the policy proposed to be pursued under that Act, I most fully concur; but I regret, that in the face of those objections he should have concluded his despatch by conveying the sanction of the Government to the passing of the Bill. The Governor, Sir George Grey, is indeed recommended to act upon it with great caution and forbearance, and great confidence is placed in his judgment and discretion. But, however humanely and wisely the Act may be administered, it will, if it becomes the law of New Zealand, remain for ever as a damning record of confiscation and injustice towards the Natives. The Bill proposes among other things that neutral and even loyal men shall be dispossessed of their property, if others of the same tribe have taken up arms against the Government. Would such a proposition be tolerated for a moment in England as that an estate, held in co-partnership, should be wholly confiscated, because one or more of the proprietors had been guilty of high treason? Certainly not; and yet the case is exactly analogous. What hope could we have then that the New Zealanders, whose views of right and wrong are quite as clear as our own, should ever become reconciled to a Government so regardless of justice? It is, moreover, very questionable whether those that have been, and may still be, in arms against the Colonial Government, can properly be designated as rebels; they are, I believe, more correctly noticed in Mr. Cardwell's despatch as insurgents, for whatever outrages may be laid to their charge they have ever been in retaliation for wrong, they have never been the aggressors in any war; and in the present case they have risen in insurrection against what they, with some reason, regarded as an invasion of their just rights, the tribal rights that had been secured to them. If the rights of Englishmen had been similarly assailed, our past history warrants me in saying they would have been similarly defended; and is it any wonder that a brave, though a savage nation, should take up arms in their own defence? Subjects of the Crown they could hardly be considered when, as testified by Sir William Martin, late Chief Justice of New Zealand, in his very interesting and instructive paper on the relation of the Government to the Native population, the Queen's authority has never at any time been established over them, or exercised, except for the protection of the settlers; and it is totally contrary to the principle of constitutional Government to expect that the Natives should have respect for laws passed by a Legislature in which the settlers alone are represented. The grasping and unscrupulous spirit of the New Zealand Government, so constituted, may be gathered from the Bills now sent over for approval. What hope, I would ask, can there be of ever attaching the New Zealanders to British rule, if the proposed Act for territorial confiscation be carried into effect? The consequence of it must be a perpetual conflict between the settlers and Natives until the latter are exterminated. I hope that the disgrace of sanctioning such a policy may not be incurred. If the power of England is to be exercised for the civilization and improvement of the savage races, it must ever be directed by a strict regard for justice and good faith, for thus only can a beneficial influence be established. This rule, unhappily, has not been followed, and it will be difficult to restore confidence between Natives and settlers and to repair the mischiefs of mis-government. I do not

say that the Islands have derived no benefits under the Sovereignty of the British Crown. Through the enterprise of the colonists many substantial improvements have been made; European seeds and animals of various kinds, and farming implements have been sent out, whereby the value of the land has been greatly enhanced and its capabilities exhibited; but all this must of necessity have increased the reluctance of the Natives to part with it. It is true also that, through the agency of English missionaries, the inestimable boon of Christianity has been extended to the New Zealander; but this has only rendered it the more incumbent on the Colonial Government, in all its relations with the Native population, to exemplify the spirit of Christianity, and not to mar a good work by wrong or injustice. The papers that have been laid upon the table, especially the admirable and candid review by Sir William Martin of our past and present relations with New Zealand, are, unhappily, a confession that the conduct of the British settlers and of the Colonial Government towards the Natives has not been such as to gain their respect, or to warrant any claim to their confidence; but they are also suggestive of a course of policy by which disaffection may be subdued, the true interests of the Colony promoted, and the Queen's subjects of different races ultimately united. Even the Legislative Assembly of New Zealand, composed as it must be of persons little fitted by education to deal with the important interests confided to them, and many of them mere adventurers, unscrupulously eager to get possession of the lands in the hands of the Natives, yet includes some members who raised their voices against the Confiscation Act, now sent hither for the Royal Assent. Surely such men as have had the moral courage to remonstrate against the injustice and rapacity of the majority, and who, in their rejected resolutions, propounded a just and conciliatory policy, are well entitled to have their views considered by the Home Government at this important crisis in the affairs of the colony. It, in fact, depends upon the course of policy now to be determined on by Her Majesty's Government, whether the Natives of New Zealand shall have justice done to them and become incorporated with equal rights and privileges with the rest of the Queen's subjects, or whether a brave nation shall be doomed to extermination.

EARL GREY said, this was a very serious and painful question. Very disastrous events had taken place in New Zealand. One of its most flourishing settlements had been ruined, an immense amount of property had been destroyed; there had been a frightful expenditure of life and treasure, and a war, which promised to become one of extermination, was now raging between the original inhabitants and the settlers. It behoved their Lordships to consider how it was that the present state of things had arisen. Ten years ago the colony was enjoying the utmost prosperity. The Native inhabitants were then contented and loyal subjects of Her Majesty; education and religion had been widely spread among them, and were daily becoming more general. They were advancing in all the arts of civilization; and the settlers were becoming more and more intimately acquainted with them. Friendly relations subsisted between the two races; and through the united exertions of both the colony was making great progress. Now, to what was it that the lamentable change that had occurred was attributable? With the view of explaining the causes of the unhappy contrast presented by the present and the former state of things, he would briefly review some of the chief events in the history of New Zealand. It had been justly said that the colonization of that country had been begun in a most irregular manner. It was notorious that the Governments of a former day were extremely anxious to prevent British subjects from settling there, but that was found to be impossible; and during the Administration of Lord Melbourne the first steps were taken for establishing our authority in those Islands. But the difficulty which had from the first existed with regard to land soon grew to be serious, and ultimately a war broke out between the settlers and the Natives. At that critical time the noble Earl behind him (the Earl of Derby), then the Secretary of State, took the wise and certainly the most successful measure of sending out Sir George Grey, then the Governor of South Australia, who with the assistance of a not very large military force suppressed the rebellion. In August, 1847, the last sparks of the insurrection were extinguished, and tranquillity was restored. It had been intended to establish representative institutions in New Zealand, and an Act of Parliament had been passed for that purpose in 1846; but Sir George Grey was of opi-

nion that this step had been prematurely taken, considering the excitement caused by the war, and he recommended that the proposed change in the form of government should be deferred. That advice was taken, and it was his (Earl Grey's) duty to submit to their Lordships a Bill suspending the measure for the adoption of representative government in New Zealand, which was passed in both Houses without opposition. That Bill vested considerable powers in the hands of the Governor; and it was to the fair and impartial exercise of those powers in regard both to Maories and settlers, that the happy state of the colony between 1847 and 1855 was due. The country was prosperous in almost every respect. Even the decrease of the Native population which had given rise to a good deal of anxiety ceased, and the natural increase seemed to be again beginning. Unfortunately, it was supposed that the welfare of the colony now rested on so secure a foundation that considerable changes might be made, without any danger, in the state of the Government. In 1852, by the advice of Sir George Grey, the design of conferring representative institutions on the colony was resumed, and might probably have been carried into effect with safety and advantage if the change had been made judiciously. Unfortunately, however, a clause was introduced into the Bill which virtually took the Executive power out of the hands of the Crown, by making the Superintendents, who were really Lieutenant Governors of the several provinces into which the colony was divided, elective, instead of being officers appointed by the Crown and removable by the Crown. The Governor could only act through these officers, over whom he could exercise no real control from the tenure by which they held their appointments. The Act of 1852 thus took the Executive power from the hands of the Government, and passed it to the nominees of the settlers. Even that would not, however, have been sufficient to produce the misfortunes which ensued, had it not been subsequently determined, under the Administration of Lord Aberdeen, to establish what was called a responsible Government in New Zealand, which meant that the Governor was to be controlled by Ministers who were responsible to the Colonial Legislature. In theory this form of Colonial Government might be the same as our own constitution, but it was different in practice. The Colonial Legislature was elected by a suffrage which was almost universal, and it was to a body thus constituted that, practically, the administration of the colony was transferred. There was no possibility of constituting in a colony a branch of the Legislature possessing anything like the weight or authority of the House of Lords, nor could the Governor be placed on a level with the Sovereign in this country. Hence generally in the colonies, responsible government meant party government in the hands of a complete democracy, and with no check whatever to any conceivable abuse of their authority by the party for the time being in power. He was persuaded that in the earlier stages, at all events, of colonies, this system would not be found to work well. This opinion was confirmed by all that had occurred in Australia. But in those colonies this system of Government was, at least, free from the objection of creating a tyranny in the hands of one part of the population over the other, as the Aborigines were there so few in number and so barbarous. But in New Zealand, the Natives were a considerable majority of the population, and were fully capable of understanding the injustice done to them, and yet they were excluded from all share or participation in the government. By an interpretation of the law, which in his own belief was erroneous, the Maories were excluded from sitting in the Assembly, and also from voting in the election of Members; for it was held that land held by a Native carried with it no vote; and therefore the Natives, though some of them were very wealthy, had no votes. Some of the missionaries (if he was correctly informed), suggested that this was unjust, and that provision ought to be made for giving some share in the representation to the Natives; but that proposition was deliberately rejected. The result of this system of government was to hand over the Native population to the unchecked dominion of the white population. What could they expect from such a system? They knew that what took place in Ireland when the Catholics were under the dominion of the Protestants was an opprobrium to our history; and in New Zealand it was worse, for there the evils of allowing a minority to govern the majority were aggravated by the contemptuous feeling which Englishmen, especially those of the less educated classes, habitually entertain towards the coloured races, whom

they contumeliously describe as "niggers." The oppression of the inferior race was the inevitable result of what was done; and he conceived that the Government which allowed all power to be engrossed by the settlers over the Natives were responsible for the consequences which had ensued, and which were now witnessed. The papers which had been laid before Parliament contained the clearest evidence that the calamities of New Zealand were entirely due to the cause he had described. In 1854, and even so late as the beginning of 1855, the Governor represented the Natives as loyal and attached subjects of the Crown. But responsible Government came into operation in 1855, and towards the close of that year a change had already taken place. The Governor then described the Natives as becoming discontented, suspicious, and alarmed, as well they might be; for, looking at the manner in which they were governed, it was not difficult to find ample cause for distrust and alarm. In the first place, a stop was virtually put to all measures which had been contemplated for their benefit. There was no further extension of schools, or hospitals, or of those improvements which tended gradually to civilize a Native population, and to bring them under a European system of government. Moreover, the New Zealanders found that the persons in whom they confided were deprived of all situations of trust and power, and that other men, with very opposite sentiments, were put in their place. The Governor himself said, in one of his despatches, that there was among the settlers a perfect passion for land, which they were determined to obtain, by fair means, if possible, but, if not, then by foul. These sentiments were expressed by some of the colonial newspapers in terms most calculated to alarm the Maories, who were ready enough to perceive that the persons for whom these newspapers were written, and whose opinions they expressed, had become the virtual rulers of the country. Up to this time the Governor had been endeavouring gradually to extend the exercise of his authority over the Natives for the purpose of maintaining peace and order among them, and the institution of an effective police with this view had been contemplated. But after responsible Government was established, nothing more was done in this direction; and it was one of the just complaints of the Natives, that the Government made no attempt to guard them from the evils of violence and wrong among themselves, and never interfered to prevent crimes, unless Europeans were murdered, or some outrage was committed against white men. Further than this, the misconduct of some European traders in their endeavours to introduce spirits was a great source of disorder. The Natives endeavoured to suppress that cause of evil, but the Ministers who held power under the system of responsible Government counteracted their efforts and prevented them from doing so. It was impossible but that this state of things should produce a very bad feeling, which, no doubt, contributed to cause what was called the "Native King movement." At first, however, there was nothing at all hostile to British rule in that movement: the object of the Natives was only to establish some means of preserving order among themselves, and to create some authority to perform those necessary functions which, so far as they were concerned, had been entirely neglected by the Colonial Government. So completely was this understood to be the real meaning of the movement, that at first it was rather encouraged than discouraged by the Colonial Government. While things were in this condition, the Colonial Legislature and Government repealed the wholesome law passed by Sir George Grey to restrain the importation of arms and gunpowder for the Natives. Those who had the chief influence in the Assembly carried this measure for the sake of the gain to be made by the trade in arms and ammunition, and this at the very time they were provoking the Maories to war. For the measures of the new Administration soon caused again that jealousy of the Maories on the subject of land, which in the early days of the colony had been the source of so much difficulty. After the war of 1846 the policy of the Government had been successful in appeasing their fears on this subject, and so long as the Natives saw that their interests were really attended to—so long as not only the words but the acts of the Government showed that the Queen's subjects of both races were considered equally entitled to her protection—so long as the Natives were assured that the lands sold by them would be held by the Crown as trustees for the common good of both races, they parted with them without reluctance. Though there might be a difficulty in buying some particular portions of lands, which for particular reasons the Natives were unwill-

ling to dispose of, there was no difficulty in purchasing for almost a nominal price a far larger extent of land than the settlers could possibly occupy with any advantage to themselves. But when nothing was done for their benefit, and they were told that their land would be taken from them by force if they did not part with it willingly—when they came to regard the Government not as their protector, but as pursuing a grasping policy, and caring only for the interests of the colonists—no wonder the feelings of the Natives became changed, and the difficulties in the purchase of land increased. Then the colonial newspapers were found full of insulting expressions towards the Maories for their refusal to sell land, and they were told that, if they did not sell it, it would be taken from them by force. Angry passions were aroused on both sides; and at this point a question arose respecting the sale of a particular block of land, the validity of which was disputed. Among all well-informed and impartial persons there was an unanimous opinion that, to take forcible possession of this land would be an act of the greatest impolicy, as well as injustice; and the present Governor has by further inquiry been so satisfied of the invalidity of the purchase made by his predecessor, that he had by formal proclamation disclaimed the purchase and abandoned the land to the Natives. Doubtful, however, as was the validity of the transaction at the time, it was determined to take forcible possession of the land. The Natives did not proceed to any act of violence, but merely remained in a state of passive resistance in occupation of the land. But, notwithstanding this, the troops were ordered out, and, before a single act of violence was committed by the Maories, a fire from Armstrong guns was opened upon the Native paha and villages, and possession was taken of the land. Such was the beginning of the war; while the Natives cautiously abstained from the use of arms, the British authorities were the first to employ them to enforce a claim which at the time was doubtful, and has since been admitted to be bad. When we had thus broken the peace he did not deny that, in the course of the war which followed, the Maories committed many acts of unjustifiable violence. Property was destroyed, settlers were murdered, and in some few cases women and children were killed. But, considering that these people had so lately risen from the condition of mere savages, that within a comparatively short period they had practised cannibalism, that their traditions pointed to wars carried on with unsparing ferocity, and considering also what provocation they had received, it was matter of surprise that the war had been carried on with so few atrocities. He feared too that on our side we were not guiltless in this matter. An article quoted from one of the New Zealand papers, The Southern Cross, described the surprise of a Native village by a party of irregular troops, who, guided by the sound of the bell which was summoning the Maories to Christian worship, crept up to the place where they were assembling, opened fire without any warning, and killed a considerable number of Natives. Great credit was taken for the fact that, though women and children were mixed up with the men, none were killed; and the spirit in which this article was written, the praise given to those who effected the surprise, for their success in inflicting so heavy a loss upon the Natives, spoke volumes as to the manner in which the war had been carried on. In the present war the British forces had been very much increased. There were 10,000 men of Her Majesty's regular army, with a force of seamen and marines landed by our ships of war, and a large number of colonial militia and volunteers, making fully 20,000 Europeans engaged in this war; while, on the other hand, the Native population had been greatly reduced. It must be admitted that, so far as could be judged from the accounts that had been published, the tactics of General Cameron seemed to have been very able, and that they had been admirably seconded by the force under his command; and by the latest advices it appeared that though the war is by no means over, the strength of the Natives had been broken. Our duty now is to consider what course we should pursue. Two courses were open for our adoption. We could either endeavour to conciliate the Maories, or we could destroy them. We could either take some step to mitigate the severity of the dominion to which the Native population was subjected, or we could leave the Natives to the unchecked control of the settlers—and we all knew how that control had been exercised. It appeared that practically the Government had determined on a policy of unmixed severity and coercion, for he could not discover that any single step had been taken to mitigate the animosity of the Natives. More than that, the New Zealand Legislature had passed three Acts, the very character of which afforded ample indication, if such were needed, of the manner in which the Natives were treated by the settlers. The objections to the Confiscation Act had been ably stated by the Colonial Secretary, who had pointed out the obvious injustice and impolicy of the measure; but it had not been disallowed—only a hope was expressed that Sir George Grey would see that it was carried out in as unobjectionable a manner as possible. Was it right that the Government should allow itself to become a party to such a measure, and that it should lend its soldiers and sailors to the carrying out of its provisions? Ought it not rather to disallow an act which it had pronounced to be so justly deserving of condemnation? The Government, however, preferred to sanction the measure, trusting to the Governor not to allow its provisions to be carried into effect. He maintained that such a course was not fair to Sir George Grey, because they required him to prevent the operation of the Act that had been passed by the New Zealand Legislature on the advice of his Ministers; they required him by his personal vigilance not to allow it to be put in force. They might anticipate the natural result of such a course. The very first time that Sir George Grey might decline to sanction any measure his Ministers proposed to adopt under this law, they would send in their resignation, and he would not find others to take their places. Sir George Grey would find himself absolutely powerless—a mere puppet, in fact, in their hands, for he could not by any possibility help himself. All this time the Government at home would be laying the flattering unction to their soul that they had in no way allowed themselves to become parties to the injustice contemplated by the Act. But, although they declined to assume the direct responsibility themselves, they were virtually intrusting the power to the hands of those by whom they knew it would be employed. With regard to the loan which was proposed, did anybody believe that, in the present state of affairs in New Zealand, the money could be repaid? This consideration would present itself more forcibly when they remembered that it would be employed mainly for the benefit of one portion of the colony—the northern part—to which the difficulties which had arisen were confined. In his opinion, nothing could be more improper than to encourage the colony at the present time in incurring large debts without having any means whatever to discharge them. They should remember that if they allowed a policy to be pursued which would incite the remaining Maori population of New Zealand to destroy the lives and property of the settlers, as far as they possibly could—and this result he regarded as certain to ensue from the sanctioning of this Act—it would be totally impossible for them to avoid protecting the British subjects in the colony. They had already had some experience of that fact. In 1861 he brought this same question before the House, and on that occasion he ventured to use the same arguments as he had employed to-night as to the cause of the war, and the manner in which it had been carried on. He then ventured to predict that unless some more decided policy were adopted, the war would be pursued until the final extinction of the Maories had been nearly or completely effected at the cost of this country. He then recommended that the representative institutions of the colony should be suspended for a time, and that the Government should be vested in Sir George Grey, who should be authorized to treat with the Maories, in order that protection should be secured to the colonists without cruelty or injustice to the Natives. This, however, his noble Friend had declared to be impossible. He had brought forward no arguments to prove this impossibility, and against his mere assertion he (Lord Grey) would appeal to the fact that, in urgent cases, the course he had recommended had been taken by Parliament. In the case of Canada, when a time of difficulty presented itself, representative institutions were suspended, and all power was vested in the hands of the Governor. The extraordinary power vested in him was used by Lord Sydenham with such discretion, that the colony was completely tranquillized, and the Government re-organized in such a manner as to enable Parliament to restore to its representative Government under improved arrangements. He lamented that a similar course had not been followed with respect to New Zealand, for he believed that if similar powers had been intrusted to Sir George Grey a long series of misfortunes might have been prevented. It was quite certain that if the settlers of New Zealand had been made to understand that they could not expect to receive the aid of the Imperial Government unless that Government had the control of affairs, they would have raised no objection. Much of the present difficulty and misfortune had been caused by a too ready adoption of certain plausible theories. It had been said that the colonists ought to defend themselves, and that the Imperial Government ought not to interfere with them at all. The answer to that was simply that such a course was impossible. No Government, no Parliament, could leave British subjects to be destroyed in a contest with savages, and when British settlers and Native races were placed side by side within a limited territory, it was impossible to prevent struggles between them. In such a case, where the aboriginal race was brought into opposition to a highly civilized one, they might be quite assured that the result would be that the Native race would be trodden down and cast into absolute despair, and British soldiers and sailors might be called upon to discharge a duty most repugnant to them—that of assisting in the extermination of a noble and brave people. The Governor ought to be made responsible for the administration of affairs, and he should be assisted by men who should virtually hold their offices during good behaviour, and who should not be liable to lose their places at any moment of popular caprice. He thought this question should be seriously considered by Parliament at once. If Parliament did nothing, but allowed the Acts which had been passed by the Colonial Legislature to come into force, and if British troops were allowed to remain upon a vague assurance that some time or other the burden would cease, the result would be that the Natives would be driven to desperation, and it would be impossible to withdraw our troops from the colony. He thought that Parliament had a just right to complain of the manner in which this subject had been dealt with by the Government. If Her Majesty's Government had been resolved to pursue a policy so full of danger and likely to lead to such serious consequences, it was their duty in some way or other to have submitted the question to the judgment of Parliament. The papers had only been placed in the hands of Members of that House on Saturday last, and no opportunity had been given them to consider the policy of the Government. It was not right that it should be left to an independent Member to submit a Motion in order to elicit the opinion of Parliament on so important a question. It was the duty of the Government to have consulted Parliament, and that might have been done by bringing in at once the Bill which it appeared was to be proposed with a view of guaranteeing a portion of the loan to be raised for New Zealand. The question whether that Bill should be agreed to would raise the whole question of the policy of the Government. It was not reasonable that a measure of such importance should be deferred until the end of the Session. If the Bill were not brought into the House of Commons until June, it could not reach their Lordships' House until the month of July, a period when there was such a pressure of business that they would have no time properly to consider the measure. In conclusion, he would only refer to a recommendation which he had made upon a former occasion, and which had been alluded to by his noble Friend who originated the discussion—namely, that Sir George Grey should be re-appointed as Governor of New Zealand; but at the time he expressly remarked, that to send him there with the limited power with which it was proposed to invest him would be utterly useless, and he would not have the means of doing good.

NAVY—THE "RESEARCH."

QUESTION.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether he has received from the

VOL. CLXXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

Naval Commander-in-Chief at Devonport any official Report of the damage done to the Research in the late experiment; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay it upon the table of the House; and, if he has not received such Report, is it the intention to call for it?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in reply, said, he had received a Return of the damage done to the Research on the occasion referred to, and, without troubling the House with details, he might state that the repairs of that damage would cost the public £19 in labour and £5 in materials, in all £24. If the hon. Baronet wished to see the details, he should be glad to lay the Return on the table.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said, he wished to know, whether the vessel had not since been taken into dock.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the report was that the vessel was ready to proceed anywhere, and he believed there had been no necessity for taking her into dock.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, he would give notice that on Thursday he should move that the Return be laid on the table.

MR. FERRAND said, the noble Lord had not answered the question. Would the Return be produced?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he saw no objection to its being laid on the table.

QUESTION.

MR. BAINES said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Mint are taking any measures to remedy the present deficiency in the supply of silver coin?

MR. PEEL said, in reply, that the Mint had lately been so much occupied by the demand for gold coinage, that some delay had been experienced in the silver coinage, but he hoped that in a very short time the supply of the silver coinage would be equal to the demand.

THE RUSSO-AMERICAN TELEGRAPH.

QUESTION.

MR. WATKINS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, If any application has been made to Her Majesty's Government, or to the local authorities, by or on behalf of Mr. Collins, the Concessionaire of the Russo-American line of Telegraph, intended to pass via Behring's Straits, for permission to carry a portion of such line through British Columbia; and, if so, whether such permission has been or is proposed to be given?

MR. CARDWELL said, in reply, that such an application had been made, but it was not only an application to pass through British Columbia, but it was an application for an exclusive privilege. An answer was returned favourable to the right of passage, but disapproving that part of the application which referred to an exclusive privilege.

UNION OF THE BRITISH AMERICAN PROVINCES.—QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, If a Union of the three Lower Provinces of North America—Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward's Island, is in contemplation; and, if so, what is to be the nature of that Union, Federal or Legislative? Also what steps, if any, have been taken by these Provinces towards the Union, and if they have received the approval of Her Majesty's Government?

MR. CARDWELL replied that the Colonies referred to had passed Resolutions requesting the appointment of delegates by the Governors to consider the expediency of uniting the Colonies referred to by the hon. Member, with the view of placing them under one Legislature and Government; but these delegates had not yet met, and, therefore, the time for the Imperial Government coming to any decision on the matter had not yet arrived.

OFFICIALS IN THE IONIAN ISLANDS. QUESTION.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies as to the conduct of the Government with respect to meeting the claims of the Officials in the Ionian Islands. He wished to know, Whether the Government is prepared to secure to those Officials the payment of their Pensions, or whether those Gentlemen are to be thrown helpless upon the tender mercies of a Government which has never yet performed any one of its treaty obligations?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, his hon. and learned Friend was well aware that these charges had long been paid by the Government of the Ionian Islands, and by the Convention they were made the next charge after the sum charged to the Civil List. The amount was to be paid in half yearly instalments to Her Majesty's Consul at Corfu, and the Government expected that the payments would be made in due course.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE STEAM RAMS.—QUESTION.

MR. HODGKINSON said, in reference to Mr. Solicitor General's statement in the Court of Exchequer on Thursday last, that the case of "The Attorney General v. Laird and Others," relating to the seizure of the Confederate Rams, had been arranged, he would beg to ask Mr. Attorney General, Whether the arrangement alluded to involved the purchase of those Vessels; and, if so, whether only at their fair value, or at some higher price; whether the inducement to the Crown to make such arrangement was a doubt as to the construction and application of the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act, with regard to equipping and arming Vessels; whether it was part of the terms of arrangement that the alleged misdemeanour under the seventh section of the Foreign Enlistment Act should be condoned by the Crown, and that no claim for compensation for the seizure should be made by the Defendants; and whether any legislation will be proposed in order to obviate in future the doubts and difficulties attending the construction and enforcing of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and thus prevent the arrangement of the recent case operating as a premium to Ship Builders to speculate on building Vessels of War for belligerents?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: In answer to the Question of the hon. Gentlemen, it will be necessary for me to make a short statement to the House. The House is probably aware that in the month of September last—some time before the seizure of these vessels—the Government applied to certain persons representing themselves to be the owners of these ships, expressing their willingness, if they were really in the hands of bond fide owners, to treat for the purchase of them. At that time the overture so made by the Government was entirely ineffectual, and the seizure afterwards took place. No overture of any kind was subsequently made by the Government; but, on the other hand, an offer was made to the Government some time ago, offering the ships in question to the Government at a price named, which in the opinion of the Government did not represent their fair value, but was, in fact, much above their value. That overture was simply and absolutely declined, and no further communications were made having any tendency to lead to an arrangement. The same party—and I may mention his name—M. Bravay—afterwards renewed the application in another form. He stated that as the sum formerly demanded had been deemed extravagant, he was desirous of knowing whether there were any pecuniary terms which the Government, on their part, would be willing to offer by means of which the matter might be brought to an end, it being understood that no admission was to be asked from the one party to the effect that a violation of the law had been committed, or from the other in the contrary sense. Upon that the Admiralty, by the assistance they were able to command, ascertained what in their opinion would be the fair value of the vessels. They named that value, stating that they were prepared, for the reasons assigned, to put an end to the matter on the terms of paying the fair value of the vessels, but not on the terms of paying any other or greater price. That value was very much less than the sum first asked, and very much less than the parties stated they would be able to obtain from other purchasers if they had the command of the vessels. They, however, closed with the offer made by the Government, and on that footing the arrangement was made. The hon. Gentleman further asks whether the inducement to the Crown to make such arrangement was a doubt as to the construction and application of the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act with regard to the equipping and arming of vessels. In answer to that question I may say, that the House is perfectly well able to judge what the doubts are which appertain to the subject; but I may, in reference to this particular case, add, that doubts as to the construction of the Act in regard to it had no considerable place in the motives which influenced the Crown to enter into the arrangement to which I have referred.

The motives of the advisers of the Crown were rather these—when the question before the Courts was one of fact as well as of law, it would not have been in accordance with the experience of those acquainted with the uncertainty attending the administration of justice to assume with a too absolute confidence that the verdict, however strong the Crown might feel in the goodness of its case, would necessarily be in its favour—more particularly in a matter in which, to say the least of it, political feeling might exercise some influence on the result. The Crown could not, therefore, take it for granted that they would, as a matter of course, be successful. But I am, at the same time, bound to say that it was not any doubt in the mind of the Law Officers of the Crown that they had a good case on which they might hope to succeed, which induced them on their side to enter into this arrangement. Besides the advantage of securing those public objects for which, and not for the sake of inflicting any loss or forfeiture upon individuals, the seizures had been made, these considerations operated on the minds of the advisers of the Crown. In the first place, there certainly had been prevailing considerable uncertainty in the public mind as to the extent to which a subject might go in the way of building or equipping ships for belligerents without infringing the law. It was well known that, before these seizures took place, opinions had been given by which individuals might have been encouraged to believe that they were safe in acting on a view of the law, contrary to that on which the Government might be advised to act. Consequently, there were some grounds for believing it to be possible that British subjects in this country had, or might have, offended against the law under a bona fide impression that they were not doing so. Then the advisers of the Crown had the case of the Pampero in Scotland in view, in which they had recently made arrangements upon the same—as I venture to think it—liberal principle. They had allowed the ship to remain in the hands of the owners, not insisting upon the forfeiture, but upon the terms that security should be given against its belligerent employment. In this particular case, the ships are good ships, which it is worth the while of the nation to possess at their fair and legitimate value. At the same time, it was felt that the possession of the ships by the nation would be more complete and satisfactory security against their employment for belligerent purposes than any other engagement into which it was possible for the parties concerned to be asked to enter. Under these circumstances, the Crown, not caring to make money out of the transaction, or to inflict pecuniary loss on the individuals concerned, its Law Advisers thought they were at liberty to deal with the defendants in this as they had done in the other case. Of course, the House will understand that these defendants throughout insisted, and still insist, that they were guilty of no violation of the law, and no arrangement was made with them which entitles any one to say that they have admitted themselves to be guilty of any such violation. With regard to the next question, my answer is, that no such condonation as that which it indicates was part of the terms of the arrangement. The Crown was not prosecuting for a misdemeanour; it was only proceeding against the ships. As regards the question of the claim for compensation for the seizure, I can only say that it is quite impossible that any such claim can be made, consistently with the footing on which the arrangement has proceeded. I may add, in reply to the last question, that I hope it will not be found necessary to propose any new legislation on the subject. The Government confidently trust that all parties will profit by what has taken place, and that there may be no occasion for further legislation or prosecutions. But, undoubtedly, the Government are as much prepared and determined as ever to maintain the law as they have understood, and as they still understand it to be, if any future infraction of it should be attempted. They do not, I may further observe, think that this arrangement will operate as a premium to shipbuilders to speculate in building vessels of war for belligerents; because the parties to the arrangement have represented, and the Government have no reason to doubt the bona fides of that representation, that if the ships were entirely under their own control, they would be able to bring them to a more profitable market, and to obtain for them a larger price than the Government have consented to give.

MR. HUNT said, he wished to know how payment for the purchase of the vessels in question was to be provided, and whether a supplementary Estimate for the purpose would be laid on the table?

MR. CHILDERS: If the hon. Gentleman asks the question to-morrow, I will answer it.

MR. HOPWOOD: What is the price of the ships?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: The price, as they stand, was fixed by the valuer for the Admiralty at £195,000; and for their completion in all respects a further sum of £25,000 will be required.

MR. HOPWOOD: What was the price originally asked?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: £300,000.

MR. LINDSAY said, he hoped the Government would place all the Correspondence before the House before any Vote was asked for.

QUESTION.

MAJOR KNOX said, he would beg to ask, Whether the Government have received any Return of the casualties which occurred at the Volunteer Review in Hyde Park on Saturday last; and also, whether the Report which had appeared in the papers is true, to the effect that Sir Richard Mayne had declined to provide any extra protection for the public on that occasion?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had received no such Return as that to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman referred; but he had ascertained that so far as the information of the police went only one accident had occurred, which was occasioned by the breaking of a bough of a tree up which some person had climbed. In reply to the second Question, he might observe that the police had done all that by previous arrangement they had undertaken to do. On the 23rd instant he received official intimation from the War Department to the effect that, as 22,000 Volunteers were expected to assemble in Hyde Park on the following Saturday, there might be great difficulty in getting the various corps into the Park, unless the different approaches to it could be kept clear by a body of police. He immediately, on the receipt of the letter, directed Sir Richard Mayne to place himself in communication with the officers of the War Department and the Horse Guards, who undertook that the duties within the Park should be performed by the military. It was not, he believed, known at the time that there was to be a reserved space fenced in by iron hurdles, for persons who were provided with tickets of admission; but he subsequently was applied to with the view of having instructions issued to the police to lend their aid in securing admission to the reserved space in question. The keeping of the approaches to the Park clear, however, involved the employment of a considerable body of men, who were for the purpose withdrawn from their ordinary occupation, and much dissatisfaction would naturally be created in other parts of the metropolis if they were drafted away in such numbers as to endanger the safety of property in those quarters. It was therefore arranged that this part should be guarded by the military. In addition to keeping the approaches to the Park, the police undertook to provide a sufficient number of men to secure access to the line of hurdles of the various corps until they came to the inclosure; and their duties in providing ingress and egress for the troops engaged in the review were so efficiently performed, that not the slightest interruption had, he believed, taken place.

MR. PAULL desired to ask the First Commissioner of Works, on what principle the distribution of tickets for the reserved space was made? It was stated that seats would be provided for ladies; but such accommodation was not afforded. It was also, as he understood, announced that tickets would be given to the Members of the two Houses of Parliament; but many persons were admitted who, he should say, were by no means closely connected with Members of either House.

MR. COWPER said, that the main object was to enable the friends of the Volunteers to see their evolutions, and 4,000 tickets were given to the commanding officers to be distributed as they pleased among the members of their corps. That, of course, led to the admission of very various classes and ranks of society. Besides this, tickets were sent to the Members of both Houses of Parliament and to official persons, to foreigners and others, who seemed entitled to a preference. It was stated on the cards that the first three rows of chairs were to be reserved for ladies; but he was sorry to say that many in the station of gentlemen disregarded this regulation, and were so discourteous to the ladies, that they took the front seats, and refused to give them up to ladies when asked to do so, and intercepted the view of those behind by standing upon the chairs. Although he could distribute the tickets, it was beyond his power to teach manners to those who had possession of them. It was a source of great regret to him that Englishmen should have disgraced themselves, as he thought they had done, on Saturday afternoon, by retaining seats while ladies were standing by.

THE SPIRIT DUTIES.

RESOLUTION.

MR. WHITESIDE rose, pursuant to notice, to move—

“That in the opinion of this House it is expedient that the existing Duties upon Spirits should be reduced.”

The subject of which he had given notice involved a question of considerable importance. In the commercial language of the country, he might say that as sugar was easy, and as tea was looking up, he thought that the article of spirits might fairly claim some consideration from the House. Let it not be supposed that he had risen to advocate a discriminating duty on behalf of Ireland. Although the question involved was one which deeply affected the interest of Ireland, it certainly was not his intention to ask for any discriminating duty. But the difference between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and himself, in point of argument, was this—that while it would be enough for him (Mr. Whiteside) to prove that the right hon. Gentleman's last experiment upon the spirit duties was inapplicable or had failed both as regarded Ireland and Scotland, on the Chancellor of the Exchequer lay the onus of establishing that his experiment was applicable to all parts of the United Kingdom. Now, he intended to quote the right hon. Gentleman's own opinions in favour of his view of the matter, and to prove that that was a reasonable and logical view. If the right hon. Gentleman intended to apply one duty to all parts of the Empire, it lay with him to prove that such duty was applicable to the condition of each branch of the United Kingdom. He (Mr. Whiteside) was in a condition to prove that the experiment of the right hon. Gentleman was wholly inapplicable to the condition of Ireland. In 1853 the spirit duties in England, Ireland, and Scotland varied very materially. The astute mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was then directed to the question of equalizing the duties in the three countries, and he then said that he had for a long time been considering whether a great object of financial policy could not be obtained by equalising the spirit duties in the three countries. The right hon. Gentleman then proceeded to state the nature of the task which he had undertaken. He observed—

“That is, however, a very difficult problem. It may be very doubtful whether it will ever be entirely obtained, but such an approximation to it as will stop smuggling, might, perhaps, at some time be reached. It is quite plain that such an equalization cannot be obtained without some reduction of the spirit duties in England. We must lower the English duties at a fitting time to some point up to which the others may be raised.”

The right hon. Gentleman then suggested an increase of duty “within reasonable bounds” for Scotland of 1*s.* a gallon, in addition to 2*s.* 8*d.* before. Making, then, an allowance for waste, the Chancellor of the Exchequer calculated a gain to the revenue from Scotland of £278,000. Now the House would see what he proposed to do for Ireland. He (Mr. Whiteside) confessed he always felt alarmed for his country when the right hon. Gentleman promised to extend the benefits of his measures to Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

“The Government have also anxiously considered this question as it regards Ireland. It is quite plain, I am afraid, that we can in no case stand as we are with regard to the Irish spirit duty, since an allowance for waste in bond will entail a diminution of revenue. At present the spirit duty in Ireland is extremely low in comparison with the duty in the two other countries. When an attempt was made to increase the tax in 1842 by 1*s.* per gallon, it was found most difficult to give effect to the increased duty, and we think it would not even now be safe to propose to levy an additional tax of 1*s.* a gallon upon home-made spirits in Ireland.”

The right hon. Gentleman then discussed certain changes contemplated in the revenue as essential to the levying of the duty on spirits. He said—

“We think we may fairly propose an additional duty of 8*d.* per gallon on Irish spirits, namely, an augmentation from 2*s.* 8*d.* to 3*s.* 4*d.* a gallon.”

The right hon. Gentleman exhibited great caution then in the measures he was taking for amending and reforming the system by which the additional tax was to be levied. At that time he (Mr. Whiteside) pointed out the difficulties attending the attainment of that object, which he thought could only be carried out by some reduction of the spirit duty in England; but he made no advance to the settlement of that difficult problem, nor was any step taken towards it until the year 1858, when his right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire, being then Chancellor of the Exchequer, undertook to deal with the Question. Nothing was more remarkable and nothing reflected more severely upon all financiers who had dealt with the spirit duties, except his right hon. Friend, than did the numerous alterations which had in the last few years been made in these duties. It was really surprising how any man would embark his capital in such a business, and it was not to be wondered at that so many skilful people left this country in order to avoid the legislation of a capricious Minister and a fickle assembly. He (Mr. Whiteside) could safely say that the grounds on which the distillers of Ireland were induced to give their assent to the proposition of his right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire were reasonable and just—namely, that a fixed, permanent, equitable, and uniform duty would be imposed upon all parts of the country, and that the markets of England and Scotland would be opened to the manufacture of Ireland, so that they might be compensated by the greater sale of the article manufactured for the increased duty which was to be placed upon it. It was a very serious thing to raise the duty in Ireland in that year from 6*s.* 2*d.* to 8*s.* a gallon; still it was effected on the understanding that the duty was to remain permanent. That was the converse of what was recommended by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1853, which was to reduce the standard in England to a figure to which the duties levied in Scotland and Ireland might reasonably be raised. The arrangement finally made was, to preserve the duty at the figure at which it stood in England, and to impose additional burdens on Scotland and Ireland. But it was understood at the time that that was to be a permanent settlement. The next thing that took place, however, was a China war. The noble Viscount saw a British flag, which was seen by no one else, floating upon the Lorch Arrow, and went to war with China. As a consequence he had a large bill to pay. No one denounced that war more eloquently or justly than did the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Having made that speech and defeated the noble Viscount, he ultimately became Chancellor of the Exchequer, and was called on to pay the bill—a very unpleasant predicament in which to place the right hon. Gentleman.

And accordingly, in July, 1860, when the Irish Members were taken at a disadvantage, being, as they often were, at the assizes, or else crossing the sea on their way back, the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought in a supplementary Budget, introducing it with all those expressions of regret and explanatory observations which, from experience, they knew the right hon. Gentleman to be capable of making, particularly when he was on the wrong side of the Question. He expressed his regret at the China war, which placed him in the painful predicament of providing the means for meeting the cost of that war; and he then proceeded to show how he proposed to raise the money. This was the hinge of the whole Question. If the right hon. Gentleman was right then, he was clearly right now; but if he was wrong, as experience showed him to have been, he presumed he would not be unwilling to reduce the duty upon spirits to the standard settled in 1858, levying an equal and uniform tax upon the three kingdoms. Friends of his in Ireland were anxious to have the duty reduced to the rate at which it stood previous to 1858, but he did not think they ought to separate themselves from the English and Scotch merchants, who made out a very strong case against the last addition of taxation. The right hon. Gentleman treated the Question with great candour, admitting that the whole affair was one of money. The question was often discussed as if it were one of morals; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer put it roundly on the short and distinct issue that he must have money, and the only question to be considered was how he was to get it. The right hon. Gentleman, then, in effect, said, "I will unsettle what was settled in 1858." In February, 1860, the differential customs duty on spirits was, in substance, abolished, and, in July, 1s. 11d. duty was laid upon foreign as well as on British spirits. The following was the Estimate made by the right hon. Gentleman. He said that the increase to 10s. upon British spirits would produce an augmentation of £2,252,000, independently of the revenue to be derived from foreign spirits; but, making every allowance for the diminution of consumption consequent upon the higher duty, he would only estimate the augmentation at £1,000,000. From foreign spirits the right hon. Gentleman was to receive £400,000. The Chancellor of the Exchequer carried the House so far with him that in July, 1860, they agreed to his Resolutions. What had been the fulfilment of that prophecy? The speeches of the right hon. Gentleman had been collected in a book; and he (Mr. Whiteside) could imagine an advice to be offered to them by an enraptured economist—namely, that they might burn the Orations of Cicero, provided they preserved the Speeches of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and made them their study. He should be happy to study the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman, but he should certainly object to the other suggestion. But did the Chancellor of the Exchequer recollect the admirable speeches which he had made in reference to those measures he had introduced? All those speeches, which he had read with infinite pleasure and satisfaction, were speeches in extenuation and mitigation of punishment. Not one of those speeches had been made with the view of showing that his figures had been realized, or that his predictions in regard to the revenue to be derived from spirits had been fulfilled. The fact was this—the Chancellor of the Exchequer had never got the money he anticipated from his financial experiments, and what was more, he never would get the money. Nay more, if the right hon. Gentleman had simply left the duty as it had been, he would have obtained infinitely more than he had ever got under his new disturbance of the former equitable adjustment of those duties. His (Mr. Whiteside's) proposition, therefore, was that the House should prefer the settlement of 1858 to the novelty introduced by the right hon. Gentleman in 1860. In 1861 the right hon. Gentleman made a speech upon the grievances of the distillers—he stated those grievances very clearly, but he gave them no relief. Now, five gentlemen, distillers from grain in this city, had done him the honour of communicating with him, one of whom stated that his firm alone paid £600,000 yearly to the State, and that the five together paid nearly £3,000,000. Five others from Scotland paid about £2,000,000; and those from Ireland, with whom he was acquainted, paid £2,250,000. But to refer to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman in 1861. He said—

"It is one of the main complaints of the distillers of spirits, than whom I never had the pleasure of meeting with a more intelligent body of British merchants and tradesmen, that they are taxed, as they think, most unfairly in proportion to beer. I admit from its nature that beer ought to be taxed more lightly than ardent spirits; but we have certainly pushed this principle as far as it can go."

He admitted from its nature that beer ought to be taxed more lightly than ardent spirits, and said that the Government had pursued that principle as far as possible—the alcohol in spirits was charged with a duty of 10s. 6d. a gallon, that on wine between 6s. and 7s. a gallon, and the alcohol in beer at only 1s. 10d. a gallon—that, in fact, while beer was taxed at the rate of 18 to 23 per cent ad valorem, and wine from 25 to 80 per cent, the tax upon spirits was upwards of 400 per cent. The right hon. Gentleman, however, declined to give the distillers any redress. Now, with respect to Ireland, he (Mr. Whiteside) considered it indispensable that the House should consider the condition of the distillers in that country. They belonged to a body of men who paid into the revenue about £10,000,000 a year. He had endeavoured to lay before the Committee the exact state of the facts. In 1861 the right hon. Gentleman not only failed to get the additional million from spirits which he had calculated upon as a moderate estimate, but his receipts from that source fell short by more than £500,000 of the amount received from the article in the previous year. That was to say, that they not only did not pay the additional revenue estimated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but the sum raised in the shape of duty fell short of that of the previous year by upwards of £500,000. The right hon. Gentleman, in admitting those facts, stated that—

"It was estimated, on the contrary, before and apart from any change of duty, that the tax would yield about £400,000 more than the duty had yielded in the year before."

So much for the estimate of the right hon. Gentleman. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed, then, to be fully convinced of the error of his figures—an error from which no figures of rhetoric could rescue them. Now, it was generally the practice of the right hon. Gentleman, when his figures were in his favour, to assume a triumphant tone, and when they were against him an explanatory one. Accordingly the right hon. Gentleman said it never was the case that in the first year after a fiscal change of this kind the Government had received all the money which was contemplated. Well, but why then did the Chancellor of the Exchequer say that he estimated the immediate increase from his new experiment at £1,000,000; and afterwards, when he found that his anticipations were lamentably disappointed, account for the enormous discrepancy by saying that the full and fruitful results of his experiments could not be expected in the first year after the increase of duty? And, referring to Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

"The country we naturally look to with misapprehension, and which may be called the peccant part of the United Kingdom. Illicit distillation was not increasing, as has been proved by the returns of the detections in Ireland; it was, in fact, reduced, and the police was effective in this regard."

Well, he (Mr. Whiteside) admitted that that was rather a strong representation of the right hon. Gentleman's case, but he did not intend to leave that point untouched. He had now shown that the right hon. Gentleman had utterly failed in his experiment of 1860. He would now show what was the case in 1862. If the Returns of the revenue were bad in 1861, they were worse in 1862, the second year after the new experiment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman, in reference to the spirits duties of that year, said—

"With respect to the spirit duty, that is a fiscal and likewise a social question of very great interest and importance. The figures were but partially satisfactory. I estimated with a liberal allowance the effect of the heightened price—that we should receive £10,000,000 of revenue from British spirits. We have only got about £9,800,000. It is true there is an increase of £359,000 upon the previous year, but even this is not so large an increase as we thought we should receive. Now, the serious question is, from what cause has the revenue fallen short? Is it from illicit distillation, or is it from an alteration in the public taste, or is it from a diminished power of consumption? It is certainly not from illicit distillation."

The right hon. Gentleman then entered into a dissertation upon public taste—a subject no one was more competent to discuss than himself. Those who thought that the taste of a nation could be altered had better go to Holland and see how the Dutch burgomasters and their friends swallowed the strong drinks there, although they had the sour wines of Germany which they never touch, and the light wines of France which they never taste. So in the damp climates of Scotland and Ireland. They might wish them to drink tea or coffee, but they persisted in drinking spirits; and that being so, the question was how they might be supplied at a high price without encouraging crime by illicit distillation. The right hon. Gentleman admitted the diminished consumption, but said that it did settled by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, the lamentable failure of which the duty was too evident to state that there was a large quantity of illicit distillation, as was done before the duty. The right hon. Member speaking of the consuming country and its expansive capacity quoted those persons when they were against him was to speak with confidence with the effect of the high duty of spirits and. The right hon. Gentleman in truth, decimated the distillers of country, the effect of his measure had been to reduce them from 100 to 10. They also troubled him with a memorandum in which they set out their case, and informed him that the effect of the high duty would be to throw the trade into dishonest hands, that demoralization would become prevalent, and that it would produce no increase to the revenue. They said that they submitted to the right hon. Gentleman had come to pass—that demoralization and illicit distillation had increased, with no gain to the Treasury, except the £179,000, which some gentlemen said would have been greater if the duty had not been increased. The right hon. Gentleman had appealed to the opinion of the distillers of Ireland, who were men of the highest respectability, such as Messrs. Jamieson, Sir J. Romer, Messrs. Roe, and others; now he must throw their opinion overboard. Beyond doubt the high rate of the duty had greatly increased illicit distillation in Ireland. He had received the following letter and Return, showing the extent to which illicit distillation was carried on in one part of the county of Tyrone:—

“Glenelly Rectory, Gortin, Newtownstewart,
“April 26, 1864.

“Dear Sir,—Observing that you have given notice of your intention to bring under the consideration of the House the subject of the reduction of the existing duties on spirits, I send you a Return, showing the extent to which, within a very limited district, illicit distillation has lately been carried on. The seizures have been made within less than four months by one party, consisting of a constable and three sub-constables, and within two miles of my glebe house. It is quite unnecessary for me to make any observation on the demoralizing tendency of the practice, as productive of drunkenness, and tending to further infractions of the law.

“I have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with you, but I have a very great pleasure in being one of your constituents.—Very truly yours,

“E. M. CLARKE, J. P.,

Ex-Schol.-Rector of the Parish of Upper Badoney.
“To the right hon. J. Whiteside,” &c.

The Return was as follows:—On January 7, 1864, at Glenerin, in Upper Badony, there were seized, 1 stillhouse, still, still-head and worm, 100 gallons of singlings, 80 gallons of wort, 100 gallons of potale, and 50 bushels of grains; on January 29, at Dunlogan, county Derry, in Ballinarine, stillhouse, still, 350 gallons wort, and two prisoners; on February 19, Canontrayhaugh, in Upper Badony, 1 barrel containing illicit matter; Keadycam, in Upper Bodony, 1 stillhouse, kieve 2 barrels, 2 stone of malt, and — bushels of grains; on March 1, at Strahull, in Upper Badony, stillhouse, still, kieve 3 barrels, 30 gallons of singlings, 2 stone of malt, and 4 bushels of grains; on March 29, at Garvagh, in Upper Badony, 1 stillhouse, for the purpose of carrying on illicit distillation; on April 4, at Goles, in Upper Badony, 1 stillhouse, 60 bushels of grains, and 200 gallons of potale; on April 12, at Leaghs, in Upper Badony, stillhouse, and 350 gallons of wort; on April 14, at Keodycam, in Upper Badony, stillhouse, 30 bushels of grains, and 100 gallons of potale. He begged the right hon. Gentleman to notice the distinction between the sales of spirits by publicans who are under some control and the illicit traders who were under no control. It was a perfectly legitimate Motion to propose to the House that public-houses should be shut up on the Sabbath Day, for you have the power and the right to do it if you think fit; but what law or control had you over those persons who were possessed of stills, and manufactured an article and disposed of it at one half the price legitimate dealers could sell it at. They committed not only a crime in manufacturing it, but they were the cause of crime in others. He had received some amusing letters in reference to it, and one which he would read, but the writer did not wish him to mention his name. It stated that it cost only a few shillings to set up a still beside a running water, whilst the facilities for disposing of the spirits were very great indeed. A dealer in Londonderry had written him as follows:—

man the Member for the City of London (Mr. Crawford), had presented a petition to the House from the rectifying distillers of England. They set forth in that petition the effect of the varying scales of duty which continued up to 1859, and the reason assigned in 1860 for the increase of the duty was the necessity to provide for the increased expenditure which the country had to meet on account of the war in China. They stated that the annual revenue from the duty on spirits amounted to somewhere about £10,000,000 sterling, and it appeared by the Returns presented to Parliament that—

“Since the high rate of duty of 10s. per gallon was imposed, not only has a very considerable decrease in quantity consumed taken place, but that a large deficit in the annual revenue derived from duty on spirits has resulted. Your petitioners refer to these statements for the purpose of declaring their conviction, not that the quantity of spirit actually made in the country is less, but that a very large quantity of what in all probability is actually consumed is derived from the increase of resort to illegal means for making and vending spirits; and one among the several proofs we have confirming this view is, that one of our body was recently offered spirits of wine 63 per cent over proof, at the rate of 500 gallons per week, at very little more than half the duty of 10s. per gallon, to be delivered in bulk in champagne cases, lined with tin, so as to make it appear they were filled with wine—an extremely easy process to introduce illicit spirits among dealers and retailers without fear of detection.”

Then they said that the quantity manufactured was, in 1859, 23,878,688 gallons, when duty was 8s. per gallon; 1860, 21,338,448 gallons, at 8s. to July, when raised to 10s.; 1861, 19,514,201, at 13s.; 1862, 18,836,187, at 10s.; and that if they were challenged they could show that consumption had not been diminished, the extra quantity being supplied by illicit distillation. The fine-grain distillers to whom he had alluded, who paid the enormous revenue of three millions, stated their views to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in a memorial to which they received a reply that the right hon. Gentleman could not adopt their views. The Scotch distillers had recently sent to him a document, in which they stated their belief that the duty should be uniform for Great Britain and Ireland at 8s. per gallon for British-spirits, and they proceeded to state—

“The lamentable failure of the measure by which the duty was raised in 1860 to 10s. per gallon is too evident to need much proof. It was passed to produce an annual increase of revenue of £1,835,000: it has only produced £197,165, or £1,137,835 less than estimate. Had it not been for the rise of duty there is no reason to believe that duty-paid spirits would not have shared the constant increase of consumption which has taken place with all other duty-paying articles. The increase in duty-paid British spirits, which it was estimated would be from 10 to 11 per cent, has reached the enormous amount of 20 per cent. We submit that the chief cause of this astounding diminution is the constant increase of illicit distillation, which bids fair to prevent any further expansion of the spirit duties.”

They said that the amount of distillation had been decreased 20 per cent, and the high rate of duty in addition prevented all expansion of the home trade, and they also stated their belief that it had had the effect of greatly increasing illicit distillation, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not have failed to observe. The last Report of the Commission of Inland Revenue was, perhaps, not so satisfactory on this point as the right hon. Gentleman could have wished. They said—

“We do not deny that in one point of view the revenue accounts since the spirit duties were raised to their present rate have disappointed us. The consumption has undoubtedly decreased in a greater degree than we had expected, and although in the past year there were obvious abnormal causes operating towards this result, we cannot but feel great hesitation in making an estimate for the future.”

He thought this admission of the Commissioners decisive. He would take now the case of the Scotch distillers, who had drawn up an able petition, which had been presented to the House. They stated that prior to 1823 the Spirit Duty had been for some years retained at a high point, the result of which was that smuggling had increased to such an extent that the Government of the day, having found it impossible either to collect the revenue or to prevent illicit trade, reduced the duty. They then stated that they had embarked a large capital in the trade, believing the duty to be settled, and they besought the House to do them that justice which had been done to the foreign producers of brandy and rum. The Chancellor of the Exchequer returned the same answer to the Scotch distillers as he had done to others—that their memorial would be considered; which meant, in fact, that it would never be looked at. He contended that the opinion of Scotland was not to be relied on as favourable to the right hon. Gentleman. Within the last few days he had received a letter from Scotland in which the writer said it was the opinion of the Scotch distillers that there should be a uniform duty imposed, such as that which was settled by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, and that the lamentable failure of the measure by which the duty was raised in 1860 to 10s. was too evident to be denied. It also stated that there was a constant increase of illicit distillation, because the same quantity of spirits was consumed now as was done before the increase of the duty. The right hon. Gentleman, in speaking of the consuming power of the country and its expansive energies, had quoted those persons when in his favour, and the least thing he could do now that they were against him was to give the same weight to their opinions. He could speak with confidence with regard to the effect of the high duty of spirits in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman had, in truth, decimated the distillers of that country, the effect of his measure having been to reduce them from 100 to 25. They also troubled him with a memorial, in which they set out their case, and informed him that the effect of the high duty would be to throw the trade into dishonest hands, that demoralization would become prevalent, and that it would produce no increase to the revenue. They said that all they submitted to the right hon. It stated that it cost only a few shillings to set up a still beside a running water, whilst the facilities for disposing of the spirits were very great indeed. A dealer in Londonderry had written him as follows:—

whisky of real 'Innishowin,' so can any spirit retailer in this city. In fact, it is hawked about by sample during the day, and a delivery made at once if a bargain is made. The number of seizures or convictions for illicit distillation is no criterion by which to judge of the extent to which the traffic is at present carried on. The 'po-teen' is sold from 7s. 6d. to 11s. per gallon, according to quality and strength."

So they saw how successfully the illicit distiller could compete with the honest tradesman. A learned Judge in charging the grand jury at the late assizes, Donegal, referred to the fact of there being between twenty and thirty persons confined in the gaol for summary convictions against the revenue laws. No other county presented such a picture, the learned Judge observed, as the result of illicit distillation. The grand jury stated that the duty on spirits was so high, it now became impossible to put down illicit distillation. The learned Judge to whom he had alluded further stated that Ribbonism and agrarian outrage always accompanied illicit distillation, and wherever the spirit-stills abounded there arose a plentiful crop of crime. The result of all this was that there had been laid upon the table of the House a Return which completely refuted all the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer with respect to the anticipated increase of legitimate distillation. The Return had been summarized in a morning paper in this way—That in the year ended March, 1864, there were 2,743 detections and 411 convictions for offences against the Excise laws. Taking the last three months only, namely, the first three months of 1864, and comparing them with the corresponding months of 1863, he found that while in January, 1863, there had been in the county of Donegal 74 detections, the number in January, 1864, had increased to 140, with only 17 convictions. In February, 1863, the number of detections was 98, the convictions 23; this year the numbers were 148 and 38. In March of the present year the detections had been 129 in that one county. It was, then, impossible to maintain the duty at so high a figure that it led to increased illicit distillation and crime, and drove out of the trade the highly respectable and honourable men who found that they could not carry on the trade under the present duties—gentlemen to whose opinion the right hon. Gentleman referred when they were in favour of his views, but which he rejected when their opinions were opposed to his own. The manufacture of spirits in Ireland was a very important trade. It was intimately connected with the agricultural interest, with the farming class, with those who fattened cattle and kept dairies; and if the right hon. Gentleman persevered in crushing these interests by the weight of the duties, he did an irreparable injury, and brought himself within the criticism of the Edinburgh Review, the organ of the old Whig party with which he was now so inseparably connected, that the current of his fiscal legislation of late had been altogether detrimental to the interests of Ireland. In 1853, and again in 1858, the right hon. Gentleman stated to the House that he was sure of obtaining as large an amount of money by a diminution of duty as with the higher rate. But, thinking it desirable to check drunkenness, he raised the duty. The consequence had been an increase of illicit distillation, and an increase of drunkenness. This being so, was it not a fair appeal that he now made to the right hon. Gentleman to take the whole of the circumstances connected with the morality and industry of Ireland, as affected by the spirit duties, into his serious consideration? The right hon. Gentleman had admitted the great extent of the misfortunes of Ireland. But what had he done to administer relief? Positively nothing. Yes, the Government had thrown them into Chancery. Not a single Irish Bill was upon the table except a Chancery Bill. This was not a pleasant subject to discuss at present. "Sufficient for the day was the evil thereof." There was another point he had omitted to mention, which was that the publicans throughout the country were driven, by the enormous duty on spirits, and the consequent increase of illicit distillation, to resort to poisonous adulterations, and thus the people were injured both mentally and physically—maddened, in fact, by the adulterated drink; whereas there were abundant proofs that pure Irish whisky, when taken, not as the Scotchman took it, but drank as an Irishman and an Englishman drank it, injured neither the mind nor the body. The right hon. Gentleman was scarcely aware of the extent of the adulteration. By the fraudulent skill of the chemist the methyl was extracted from the methylated spirit admitted duty free, and the spirits to some extent rendered potable and forced into the market to the injury of the revenue. It was the same case of the brandied wine, three-fifths of the spirit was imported duty free. It was clear that if these large duties were to be maintained there must be a very considerable increase in the number of detectives, a much greater vigilance would have to be exercised, and the police must be more liberally paid. It was true that a large number of detections had been made; but this was the symptom only of the malady, not a proof that the disease had been subdued. It was clear, then, that the right hon. Gentleman's experiment had failed, and the best thing he could do was to retrace his steps.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the existing Duties on Spirits should be reduced."
—(Mr. Whiteside.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he admitted that the right hon. Gentleman was fully entitled to call attention to this subject—not so much, perhaps, in deference to his particular constituents, who would hardly recognise him on this occasion as discharging any special duties they had committed to him, as in deference to the interests of the important trade whose cause he had pleaded with so much moderation and ability. The right hon. Gentleman had himself made an admission which he must feel bore very materially on this point—that the question they had now to deal with did not affect the case of Ireland alone, but involved the rate of spirit duty to be levied for the three kingdoms. The right hon. Gentleman had stated—and with truth, provided the application of the remark was kept within certain limits—that he, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, was bound to show that any measure proposed for the entire kingdom was applicable to every portion of the kingdom. The case, however, did not stand now as it stood in 1842, when Sir Robert Peel, having laid an additional duty on spirits in Ireland, and an increase of smuggling appearing to be traceable to that augmentation, came down himself and proposed the removal of the additional duty. It would not have been equally easy to adopt that course; in fact, its policy would have been very doubtful, if the duties in the three kingdoms had been uniform, as they were afterwards made by successive measures of Sir George Lewis and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) went back to the year 1853, when he himself proposed to the House to take the first step in the policy of equalization—not at all concealing that equalization was the ultimate aim, but stating at the same time that he was not so sanguine as to anticipate that equalization could be obtained without an augmentation in Ireland and Scotland and a reduction in England. At that time he should certainly have thought it sanguine to anticipate that even an 8*s.* duty could be levied through the three kingdoms; but the result of the augmentation of 1853-4 was so satisfactory, that each step in that direction warranted encouragement—nay, even seemed imperatively to demand the step by which it was succeeded, until they came to the limit where the 8*s.* duty was made uniform through the three kingdoms. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) said that when the 8*s.* duty was imposed on Irish spirits it was regarded by the parties interested as a final arrangement. He certainly could not bear out that statement. The Chancellor of the Exchequer of 1858 did not pronounce any such opinion, and he would have been most unwise if he had. The principle on which Parliament had always acted with respect to the spirit duties was to impose on that article the highest amount of duty which it was possible to levy, without increasing illicit distillation, and the mere statement of that proposition was sufficient to show that the right hon. Gentleman was mistaken in supposing that the 8*s.* duty was regarded as a final settlement. The further augmentation which was proposed, the right hon. gentleman seemed to think the step from a wise to an unwise policy. Perhaps it was hardly worth while correcting the inaccuracy of the right hon. Gentleman's statement, that this augmentation was made to pay the bill for the China war, which had sprung up during the first Administration of the noble Viscount (Viscount Palmerston). The bill for that China war had been paid; it was to pay the little bill for another China war which broke out under the Earl of Malmesbury, who was Foreign Secretary of the Administration with which the right hon. Gentleman was himself connected, that that measure had to be resorted to. But, though the augmentation was made on that occasion, it would be quite an error to imagine that the proposal was then invented. It was a proposal held steadily in view by the Revenue Department, which had been mentioned before anybody was aware that such an exigency would occur; and the only question was, whether the time was then ripe for it, or whether its adoption should be postponed? All previous experience was in favour of it. It was perfectly true that all the increase of revenue which he had calculated upon had not been received; but the right hon. Gentleman, who had studied his speeches so closely, would recollect he did not rest the case exclusively on an anticipation of increased revenue, but that he explicitly laid down the principle that whatever revenue was to be raised from spirits it was desirable that it should be raised from as small a consumption as possible. In dealing with tea, sugar, and such articles, the principle was to raise the revenue by a duty as low as possible, in order not to interfere with the expansion of trade; but the exact reverse of that principle was applicable to spirits, and it was sought to raise the largest revenue which could be got from the smallest area of consumption. He could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the observation made by the Revenue Department in the Return to which he referred to prove the failure of his measure was needless and calculated to mislead. On the contrary, without it the Return would have been fallacious. If it were true that the spirit revenue of 1859-60 was a just and safe basis from which to reason as to the increase or decrease of the duty in subsequent years, the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman might be an accurate one; but, on the contrary, it was demonstrable that the revenue of 1859-60 had been considerably swelled by the premature delivery of spirits, in order to escape from an anticipated increase of duty. The proof of the justice of his statement was to be found in the fact, that the revenue derived from spirits during the first four months of the years 1860-1, when there was no anticipation whatever of an augmentation of the duty, and, therefore, no motive for the premature delivery of spirits from bond, fell greatly below the revenue of the preceding year. Now, that circumstance was, he contended, to be explained in no other possible way than by the supposition that towards the close of the previous financial year a much larger quantity of spirits had been taken out of bond than was necessary to supply the wants of the dealer. If that were so, it was plain that the year 1859-60 absorbed a considerable portion of the revenue due to 1860-1, and to that extent was not to be taken as a fair standard of comparison for subsequent years. The right hon. Gentleman, he might add, had omitted to take into account in the argumentative part of his statement another most important portion of the case. The substance of his argument was that the duty on spirits ought to be reduced for the sake of the distillers in this country. But that argument looked not simply to the effect to be produced in illicit distillation, but to an augmentation in the consumption of spirits. The right hon. Gentleman in one portion of his speech delivered a most cogent argument against the diminution of the duty on malt, and it was plain that a Motion with that object would not receive his support; but be that as it might, he pressed that the duty on spirits should be reduced, while he failed to show whence the money was to be procured for the purpose. He contended, indeed, that there was an increase of £170,000, which sum might be secured to the revenue by means of an increased consumption; but he seemed altogether to forget the duties on foreign and colonial spirits, which, at the present increased rate of duty, yielded nearly £500,000 a year. How was that sum to be made up? Was it out of the diminution of illicit distillation in Ireland? If not, did the right hon. Gentleman mean to propose that the duty on spirits should be reduced with the prospect of the reduction causing a deficiency in the revenue? There were two questions to be considered in dealing with the matter. He would, in the first place, ask whether, if the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman were acceded to, the Exchequer would be likely to obtain the money which he promised; and in the second place whether, if that money could be obtained, the House would be justified by the prospect in making the proposed reduction. Now, in reply to the first question he would say, that he did not think we could obtain the money; while he was also of opinion that the House would not be justified in obtaining it unless it could be shown that it was to be done by the diminution of illicit distillation. That point of illicit distillation was in reality the only one on which the right hon. Gentleman was able to rely. He touched indeed, but only very lightly, on the subject of adulteration,

while he must admit that there were many causes in operation which pressed on the distiller independent of the augmentation of the duty. Such, for instance, was the greatly increased consumption of tea and wine, which tended to restrain the consumption of spirits. If the 3,000,000 gallons of wine added to the consumption of the country within the last three years were taken into consideration, the fact would account for the disappearance of something like 1,000,000 gallons of spirits. Besides, the consumption of beer was gaining greatly on that of spirits, and he should not, under those circumstances, be surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman propose that the duty on malt should be doubled. The number of beer-houses in Dublin, as stated by his right hon. Friend the Secretary for Ireland the other night, had increased from 3 to 370 during the last few years. Thus beer, which was lightly taxed in consequence of the lowness of the malt duty, had been constantly pressing on the business of the distiller. Again the competition of foreign spirits was undoubtedly an element in the case. Very nearly at the same time that the augmented duty on British spirits was adopted, there was also adopted the practical equalization of duty as between British and Foreign spirits. There were, in addition, other causes of pressure under which the distillers in Ireland might have suffered. At the time of the augmentation of the duty, the Legislature sought to improve the position of the distiller with regard to the Excise, and also gave him facilities for export by the allowance of a drawback, which he did not before enjoy. Those facilities operated in England, and in Scotland more especially, to the encouragement of an export trade, which he was afraid was not to the same extent developed in Ireland; but he saw no reason why the Irish distiller should not seek in the same direction some compensation for the reduction of his trade. The right hon. Gentleman, he might add, did not, as he had before observed, dwell at any length on the subject of adulteration, although he might have found in a poet who dealt with Irish questions a complete bearing on the point which would have furnished an illustration for his argument—

"Poor Paddy, of all Christian men, I think,
On basest food pours down the vilest drink."

That was a sort of synopsis of the case as to adulteration, but the poet had too much good sense and knowledge of political economy to attribute it all to the augmentation of the spirit duties. It was true that spirits were commonly adulterated; the adulteration of food seemed, indeed, to be a special and distinct characteristic of this country; but in none of the spirits which had been purchased in small quantities by officers of the revenue had any adulterations of a pernicious character been discovered.

Having thus cleared the ground of other matters, he desired to draw the attention of the House more closely than had hitherto been done to that which was the turning point of the case—the question of illicit distillation. Here the right hon. Gentleman had the vague and general statements of a portion of the body of distillers—statements which, whenever they had been investigated, had proved to be entirely without support—and the Returns of the number of detections which had been presented to that House. He would begin by showing the worst of the case first. In the financial year ending in March, 1861, the detections amounted to 1,585; and in 1862 they rose to 2,110, but even then they were less than in the last year of the lower duty. The right hon. Gentleman saw no wisdom in any one but the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire. It seemed that 8s. was the precise point that wisdom indicated; that it was the duty of the Government to go to that point, and not to go beyond it. He was not finding fault with the measure of the right hon. Gentleman; he was only objecting to the attempt to distinguish between that measure and others in the series of which it was only a step; and he would presently show what was the number of detections in the year 1859. In 1862 the detections rose to 2,110; in 1863 they fell to 1,972, and in 1864 they rose to 2,742. That was the case of the hon. and learned Gentleman. Now for the answer:—First, was there any special cause of recognized and uniform operation which would account for this measure? And, secondly, how did this increase stand compared with that of former years? The special cause was perfectly notorious. It was the state of the oat crop. Whenever there was in Ireland a large quantity of grain of a very low quality, and consequently of a very low price, especially when, as was the case last year, a great deal of that grain was hardly marketable at all, an additional portion found its way into illicit distillation. The price of oats in Ireland in March, 1862, was 14s. 2½d. per barrel; in 1863, 13s. 8d.; and in 1864, 12s. 8d. Nor did this decline fully represent the case. These were the prices in the market of Dublin; but in the towns which were the centres which supplied the districts where illicit distillation prevailed, in the markets of Derry, Donegal, Sligo, Galway, and Mayo, the price did not, he was told, exceed 8d. per stone, or 9s. 4d. per barrel. That being so, the relative augmentation of illicit distillation was a matter of course. The question, however, was not whether in a particular year there was an augmentation of illicit distillation, which was thoroughly accounted for by circumstances, but whether there was a normal augmentation extending over a series of years. The right hon. Gentleman said that if this duty was to be maintained they must have a better, and better paid police force. The police was better than it was, the constabulary had been substituted for the revenue police, and the consequence was, owing to the superior numbers of the former employed on the work, that these Returns were more trustworthy than they ever were before. Having stated the number of detections in the worst year since the imposition of the highest rate of duty, he would go back to 1836. In the year 1836, when the duty was 2s. 4d. a gallon, the detections amounted to 3,323. It would be said that since 1836 there had been a great change in the state of the country. Then he would go to the favourite year of the hon. and learned Gentleman, when supreme wisdom dictated the measures taken with regard to the spirit duty. In the year ending March, 1859, the detections for illicit distillation numbered 3,172; that was 400 more than in the year just expired, although the year 1858 was, if he remembered rightly, a year of good harvest, and consequently of a good condition of grain. While the year just expired had been a bad year, especially in regard to the quality of the grain. How then, in the face of these facts, could the hon. and learned Gentleman assert that the increase in illicit distillation was due to the operation of the new duty? Moreover, the diminution of the number of detections did not sufficiently indicate the measure of the diminution of the crime of illicit distillation. It was necessary, also, to take into account the number of persons arrested. The number of persons arrested in Ireland in the year 1852, the year before the increasing of the duty was commenced, was 492; in 1862, under the full operation of the high duty, it sunk to 103; and, although in 1864 it rose under the influence of the causes to which he had referred to 198, that was considerably less than half the number at which it stood in 1852. And when he spoke of illicit distillation and discussed the operation and success of a measure of this kind, the right hon. Gentleman must remember that illicit distillation was known in England and Scotland as well as in Ireland; and considering that about three-fourths of the spirit duty were raised in England and Scotland, it was necessary, in estimating the operation of an addition to that duty with reference to illicit distillation, to look at the figures for those countries. The numbers indicated were very much smaller than were those in Ireland, but the cases were more considerable. In England and Scotland illicit distillation was carried on not in out of the way places, but in the great towns and near to the markets. In March, 1859, the last year but one of the 8s. duty in England, the detections for illicit distillations were 195; in 1860 they were 126. In 1861, the first year of the high duty, the detections, still falling, were 111 in number; in 1862 there were 114, in 1863 they had fallen to 105, and in 1864 to 79. According to all the evidence applicable to the case, he believed there never was a period when illicit distillation in England stood at so low a point. In Scotland, for the year ending the 31st of March, 1859, the detections were 37 in number; in the next year, 29; in 1861 they fell to 18; in 1862 they were 23; in 1863, 26; and in 1864 they had fallen to 13, or little more than a third of what they were before the additional duty was imposed. He could not conceive by what process of reasoning it could be contended that illicit distillation was increasing, when these figures showed a continual decline, and when the energy of the preventive force was at its height. As regarded the fiscal operation of the measure, he would admit that the product was much less than he had already stated. In the current financial year, however, as far as it had gone, there had been an increase in both the home and foreign spirit duties of about £60,000 per month. The fiscal result of the measure had only been partially achieved; but the gain, whatever its amount, was obtained in conjunction with another advantage—a limitation of the consumption of ardent spirits, which were not only evils in themselves, but fruitful parents of crime. He hoped the House would not accede to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, but would resolve itself into Committees of Supply.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he did not intend to trouble the House at any length; but there were one or two points in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer which he could not allow to pass without observation. In the first place, the Chancellor of the Exchequer accused his right hon. Friend of pleading the cause of the Irish distillers and of "the trade." Now that argument was a very inadequate description of the case. The case pleaded was not the case of "the trade" or of the Irish distillers, but of a country—Ireland. A key to the line of argument adopted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer might be found when he said that the reduction of duty proposed by Sir Robert Peel was one made under entirely different circumstances—that it was made at a time when the Irish duties differed from the English duties. He said that a measure which might be proper when a separate rate of duties existed might not be equally advisable when one uniform rate had been established, as was the case now. That was so; but in applying the principle of uniform duties the right hon. Gentleman forgot that the strength of a chain was to be tested by the strength of its weakest link, and it was to no purpose that he quoted the success of the system in England and Scotland, if it could be shown that a 10*s.* duty was higher than Ireland could bear; and if it could be proved that an uniform duty did not succeed in Ireland, when it succeeded in England and Scotland, surely that was a matter for grave consideration, with reference to the necessity for modification? It had been urged by the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) that the calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the proposed increase in 1860 had been doomed to disappointment; but the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) to his great surprise stated that it was a matter of secondary importance whether his judgment on that point were correct or not.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER explained. He had declared it to be a matter of secondary consequence whether he put the proper construction on certain facts at the time; he never said that it was a matter of secondary importance whether his official calculations were sound.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on being asked how it was that, in introducing his new duty, he did not include in his view the large quantity of spirits taken out of bond at the close of the financial year 1859-60, admitted that it certainly was an oversight on his part, and added that the subsequent experience of the officers of Revenue had thrown further light on the matter. But his right hon. Friend's memory must be exceedingly short, because in his speech introducing the Supplementary Budget on the 16th of July, he plainly showed that this great augmentation in the delivery of spirits from bond had been brought under his notice; in fact, he made it part of his argument. This increase of the spirit duties, moreover, was not part of a great system of policy laying down the principles upon which those duties should be levied in future; it was strictly and purely a money question, the proposal being made at a late period of the Session, after the financial arrangements of the year were concluded, and expressly to meet a deficiency which only then became apparent. The right hon. Gentleman told them in his Budget speech in the following year, that he had expected to get £400,000 more from these duties than they had yielded in 1859-60; but that, instead of producing £400,000 more, they yielded £550,000 less, so that the total disappointment to the right hon. Gentleman that year was represented by a sum of £950,000. The £400,000, moreover, was only the amount estimated to be got in during the remnant of a financial year, a further increase of £350,000 being looked for in the year ensuing. To complete the statement of the results ensuing from this change of duty it would, therefore, be necessary to add that £350,000 to the deficit in the year following. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman got more than he expected upon colonial and foreign spirits; but his calculations and expectations when he raised the duty on home-made spirits from 8*s.* to 10*s.* must be regarded as a great failure in a fiscal point of view. He did not know where the right hon. Gentleman had derived his figures in regard to the revenue from spirits, because they were not to be found in the papers before the House. Yet, although the right hon. Gentleman had made a very considerable miscalculation by not taking into account the particular position of Ireland as regarded the other parts of the United Kingdom, he still doubted whether the House ought at once to pronounce against the experiment the right hon. Gentleman had made. It had only been tried for three years, and its failure in a fiscal point of view did not prove that the House ought to reverse its policy, which had never been to stimulate the consumption of ardent spirits as it had done in the case of tea and coffee. Still his right hon. and learned Friend had shown that, while the increase of duty had done great harm to Ireland by encouraging illicit distillation, it had done no good to the revenue. There was, however, a Committee sitting upstairs to inquire into the whole subject of Irish taxation, and the effect of recent legislation upon the fiscal burdens of Ireland. No doubt this question of raising the Spirit Duties to 10s. per gallon would come before the Committee in due course, and the evidence they were taking might throw considerable light on the matter. He would, therefore, suggest to his right hon. and learned Friend, in the interest of his country and the cause which he had so fairly and so ably brought before the House, that it would be better to wait until they saw the evidence taken before the Committee, and the judgment they formed upon it. It was impossible, on other grounds, to call upon the Government at present to reduce the duty, because a large amount of revenue might be imperilled by a considerable reduction. His right hon. and learned Friend had every reason to be satisfied with the discussion, and he trusted that he would not press the matter to a division.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER wished to explain the misconstruction referred to. It was true that in July, 1860, he stated that there were extra deliveries; but the mistake was in supposing that the assumed effect of those deliveries had been exhausted in the period between February and the end of the financial year, whereas experience showed that the effect was fully felt after the close of the financial year. With regard to the deficiency of £900,000, he stated all the particulars in regard to it in the financial statement of that year.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON expressed his extreme disappointment and dissatisfaction at the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which had held out no hope to Ireland for the future. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, contrary to his usual course, had admitted that he had been disappointed in both his anticipations—that he had not succeeded in raising the revenue he expected, and that illicit distillation had greatly increased. [The Chancellor of the Exchequer intimated dissent.] But the right hon. Gentleman had not given out one word of hope that the present demoralizing effects of his measure would be diminished. He (Lord Claud Hamilton) had received a great number of letters from magistrates in Ireland, stating how crime had increased in consequence of this recent legislation. From one well-known magistrate, intimately connected with the counties of Donegal, Armagh, and Tyrone, he heard that not at any former period was there such an amount of illicit distillation. A collateral inconvenience from this illicit distillation was, that the police, occupied in what was called “still hunting” night after night, were unable to attend to their ordinary duties. If the right hon. Gentleman denied that the measure had failed as regarded Ireland, it was surprising that such denial was made in the face of published documents. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the increased consumption of beer, tea, and wine; but it appeared that as the licit production was decreasing, the illicit production was on the increase. One of the first effects of a large increase of duty was to throw the distilling trade into much fewer hands—to twenty-three hands, he believed, where ninety had previously been engaged, and the concentration of distillers in a few towns, who formerly were scattered over the country; the result was, the farmers could find no local sale for their damaged grain, and were thus driven to dispose of it for illicit distillation. Under these circumstances he wished to know how the right hon. Gentleman proposed to meet the evil. The right hon. Gentleman had alluded to Sir Robert Peel's policy; but when Sir Robert Peel saw that the measure which he had introduced had not the desired effect of increasing the revenue, but had stimulated the illicit trade, he reversed his policy, and repealed the additional duty. But the right hon. Gentleman did not propose to do so. He merely asked how was he to treat the foreign manufacturer and the Scotch manufacturer if he was to reduce the duty upon Irish spirits? But he (Lord Claud Hamilton) looked upon the question as a great moral and social one, and paramount to every fiscal consideration. The demoralization was not confined to those only who were engaged in the illicit trade. No one put up a still without engaging his neighbours to act as spies for him against the police; and therefore it was not merely one man, but thirty or forty men, that were engaged in resisting the law. A learned Judge (Mr. Justice Hayes) had warned the people of the evil of engaging in such a course as that, how it led from venial offences by little and little to penal servitude and the gallows; and he further observed that it appeared from the face of the police Returns, that the fruits of this practice were a greater prevalence of assaults against the person, threatening letters, and incendiary crimes. It was not right that the police should have been turned into a revenue force to put down illicit distillation, for then it had become impossible for them, without a great increase to their number, to perform efficiently their ordinary duties. He, however, did not appear here as the distiller's advocate. If it was possible to raise the tax without producing crime, he, for one, would readily consent to the increase; he only protested against a fiscal arrangement that produced crime and demoralization. He trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would re-consider this matter, and deal with it as one of vital importance to the moral and social well-being of Ireland.

MR. MONSELL said, there could be no difference of opinion as to the great evil of the practice of illicit distillation. It was possible that that practice had of late years increased in a few districts in Ireland; but he believed that there had been no general increase of that kind. Indeed, the Returns presented to Parliament actually showed that there had been in Ireland a smaller number of convictions for that offence during the last few years, than there had been during former years when the duty had stood at its lowest amount. It was alleged that one of the evils of the existing state of the law was, that it had contributed to reduce the number of distilleries in Ireland. But he believed that that reduction was owing mainly to the growth of more temperate habits among the people. The fact was, that there had been a steady decrease in the number of distilleries in Ireland ever since Father Mathew had commenced the temperance movement. The number of those establishments in 1840 was eighty-six, in 1846 it was fifty-four, in 1852 it was forty-six, in 1853 it was forty, in 1859 it was thirty-seven, and in 1862 it was twenty-seven. That gradual decrease was to be accounted for by the diminution of the demand for whisky, owing to the temperance movement, the decrease in the population, the increased consumption of tea and beer, and in some measure the change of system upon which distillation was carried on. It was a remarkable fact that the production of whisky in Scotland had considerably increased since the higher duty had been imposed. In the year 1854, when the duty was 3*s.* 8*d.* or 4*s.* 8*d.* per gallon, Scotland had produced 10,000,000 gallons of spirits; and now, under a duty of 10*s.* a gallon, the production of spirits in that country amounted to 14,000,000 or 15,000,000 of gallons annually. That increase seemed to be principally owing to the employment in Scotland of patent machinery in the work of distillation, and the result was, that the Scotch were at present able to undersell the Irish distillers in their own market. If the Irish wished to compete with the Scotch in that manufacture they should use the same improved machinery. The Irish distillers, for the most part, confined their attention to the production of whisky for the consumption of their own countrymen; he confessed that, for his part, he was not sorry to find that the sale of whisky had of late years declined in Ireland, because he believed that that circumstance was principally attributable to the more temperate habits of the people, and to their vastly increased consumption of tea and beer. He had no desire, on the other hand, to see any measure adopted which would diminish the price of whisky in Ireland, and until the hon. and learned Gentleman was able to show—what he had hitherto failed in doing—that the high duties had produced illicit distillation, he should regret to see any steps taken which would tend to the increase of distillation, and not to the increase of the national morality.

LORD NAAS said, he had always been of opinion that the spirit duties ought to be put at the very highest amount which would be compatible with the prevention of illicit distillation. But if it could be proved that the increased duty had had the effect of greatly increasing illicit distillation with all its attendant evils, that would, no doubt, be a subject for the serious consideration of the House. What he principally complained of, however, was that while the duty had been enormously increased of late years, no corresponding increase had taken place in the police measures adopted for the purpose of preventing illicit distillation. Experience proved that, with proper precautions, an increase of duty need not be attended with an increase of illicit distillation; for the fact was, that there was a smaller amount of that latter evil when the duty had been raised to 8s. than when it had stood at a much lower sum. The practice of illicit distillation seemed to be at present confined to a few districts in Ireland, although in those districts it was no doubt extremely rife and mischievous; and he should be glad to hear that the Government were prepared to have recourse to some more stringent measures than they had yet adopted for the purpose of checking the evil. He believed that the transference from the old revenue police to the constabulary of the duty of preventing illicit distillation had been attended with the best possible results, and he could not help thinking that if the Government would add to the number of constables in the districts in which that distillation specially prevailed—a measure which would necessitate, it was true, a large increase of expenditure—it would go far to eradicate the practice. One of the unfortunate consequences of the present system was, that the spirit sold to the poorer classes were of a very inferior and even of a very deleterious description. A poor man had lately told him that five or six glasses of whisky formerly had no effect upon him, but that two glasses at present made him not only drunk but mad. He was convinced that unless illicit distillation was checked in Ireland the Government would be compelled to reduce the spirit duties. He sincerely hoped, however, that that would not be done, because he believed that spirits formed the most legitimate object of taxation; and he was, therefore, most anxious to see effectual measures adopted for the prevention of illicit distillation. He quite agreed with his right hon. Friend the Member for Limerick, that the recent decrease in the consumption of spirits in Ireland was a subject not of alarm and regret, but of satisfaction and congratulation.

MR. WHITESIDE intimated that he would not press his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HOME AND THE ROMAN GOVERNMENT.—QUESTION

MR. ROEBUCK said, he wanted to ask

a Question of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and it was one to which he also begged the attention of the noble Lord at the head of the Government also. It referred to the treatment of an English subject abroad. This gentleman, Mr. Home, had a power, as he believed, of bringing spirits to his call. He was what was styled a "Spiritualist;" but that had nothing to do with it, for Mr. Home was, he believed, a man of good behaviour. Well, this gentleman went to the Papal States, and did not controvert any of the regulations of the Roman Government; he went to Rome for the purpose of cultivating one of the fine arts, and in order to carry out that design he took a studio and incurred considerable expense. Some time after his arrival he received a notice desiring him to call upon Signor Matteucci, the Minister of Police. He went to Signor Matteucci's office accordingly. The Minister asked him his age; and on his stating it, Signor Matteucci expressed his opinion that Mr. Home was eight or nine years older than he stated himself to be, to which opinion the gentleman himself demurred. The controversy went on, and Signor Matteucci said, "You have published a book in France and England stating that certain spirits wait upon you?" "Well," said Mr. Home, "I have done that." "Then," said Signor Matteucci, "will you undertake that no spirits shall come to you while you are in Rome?" Mr. Home replied, "No, I can't do that; the spirits come to me of their own accord; they don't come when I call them, and I can't answer for the spirits; but I will answer for this—that I will hold no séance; I will do nothing to solicit their coming to me; I will do nothing contrary to the law of the city of Rome." Thereupon Signor Matteucci gave him to understand that he would be allowed to remain in Rome undisturbed. Some time afterwards the person second in command of the police of Rome sent for Mr. Home, who went to his office and found no one there. After his return home he received a peremptory message to wait upon this second Minister of Police; and on presenting himself the following day that functionary said to him, "You were not here yesterday." Mr. Home replied, "I was, and I have a consul to prove it." The other then observed, "I don't care whether you were here or not; you must go out of Rome in forty-eight hours." That was the whole story. He had heard the noble Lord at the head of the Government talk about Civis Romanus sum on one occasion. He now wished for a very much stronger application of the term. Mr. Home was an English citizen, and wherever he was the ægis of England should protect him against any infringement upon his liberty which the law did not allow. He wanted to know whether the noble Lord at the head of the Government would allow any English citizen to be treated in the manner Mr. Home had been—whether he would not protect an Englishman wherever he wandered with the name of an English citizen? He wanted to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whom he now perceived in close consultation with the noble Lord, whether he would not protect this gentleman against the proceedings of the Papal Government? God knew that he had no feeling about the Papal Government; and as for the old gentleman at the head of that Government, he had a high respect for him, and hoped he might live many years in the enjoyment of his high position. And as for Mr. Home, in the presence of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Milner Gibson), he must say that he regarded this spirit-calling as an hallucination. He had no feeling on the subject of that wonderful power, except one of, he might say, contempt for the whole thing; but Mr. Home being an English citizen, he was anxious that this country should protect him as long as he did not disobey the law. That gentleman at forty-eight hours' notice was put into a railway carriage and ignominiously expelled out of the Roman States; and when Lord Russell was asked what he would do, he said, "I will do nothing." It might be said that Mr. Home went into the Roman States knowing that the Pope was all-powerful and despotic; but—he knew he was going on a violent hypothesis—if an English merchant went into Russia, and the Emperor said, "Cut off that English merchant's head," would England stand it? He appealed to the noble Lord to protect this unfortunate gentleman, and he begged to ask whether anything had been done by Her Majesty's Government to procure him redress?

MR. LAYARD expressed his regret that Mr. Home should have placed himself in such a position that the Roman Government had called upon him to leave Rome. But Mr. Home appeared to have infringed the Roman laws. It was alleged that the cause of this disagreeable circumstance was that he was in the habit of communicating with certain spirits of the other world. The Papal authorities said that this was against their laws, and they, therefore, called upon him to leave Rome. Now, he (Mr. Layard) did not wish to give any opinion as to whether that gentleman had or had not communication with unearthly spirits. Neither was he prepared to cavil with the Roman law or the Roman authorities. Such appeared to be the Roman law, and so it was administered within the Roman territories. When a gentleman visited a foreign country he was naturally compelled to conform to its laws, and if he refused to do so it was for the authorities to exercise the power vested in them, and to remove him. The same principle was recognized in England, before the repeal of the Alien Act, which enabled the British Government to remove a foreigner from this country under certain circumstances. It was impossible for Her Majesty's Government to interfere in the case in question. All he could say was, that when Mr. Home was first called upon by the Roman Government to furnish explanations in regard to a certain work he had published, and in regard to his alleged intercourse with the spirits of another world—by no means good spirits, but quite the contrary—he sought the protection of the British Consul. The British Consul, whose duty it was to deal with such questions, at once communicated with the Roman authorities, and endeavoured to obtain a withdrawal of the order to Mr. Home. Upon this application the Roman authorities at first gave Mr. Home leave to remain at Rome upon his undertaking, it is understood, to abstain from communicating with the other world; but they afterwards changed their mind, whether because they believed that those mysterious spirits were holding converse with Mr. Home, or from some other cause, he (Mr. Layard) could not say. But, at all events, they were determined that neither Mr. Home nor any of those spirits should make Rome their dwelling place, and, accordingly, they requested him to depart. Such was the law of Rome, and the House would see it was impossible for the British Government to interfere in the matter. This was not a question in which there was any protection needed for either the person or property of a British subject. There was no charge of ill-treatment, nor of any attempt to injure the property of a British subject. All that this gentleman was required to do was to leave Rome within a certain time. He had no doubt that Mr. Home had suffered great inconvenience from this circumstance, as he appeared to have wished to follow the profession of a sculptor, and to have expended some money upon his studio and house in Rome. The law, however, was such as had been stated, and he was bound to submit to it. Her Majesty's Government had made such remonstrances as the nature of the case permitted, but those remonstrances had proved unavailing, and he was afraid they could do nothing to compel the Roman Government against their will to receive this gentleman and his supernatural visitants.

MR. HENNESSY said, that Mr. Home was a gentleman who stated that he had intercourse with spirits, who foretold future and related past events, and he believed that he accepted fees for his séances. [Mr. ROEBUCK: Never.] Suppose he had done so. [Mr. ROEBUCK: Suppose he had not.] What, however, he wished to point out was that in this country we had very stringent laws against conduct similar to that of Mr. Home. Fortune-tellers and persons attempting to foretell events were liable to be taken up and punished by our laws. He would not discuss whether our laws or the laws of Rome were sound or not. What he asserted was that in each case they were founded on the same principle. There were a great number of English residents at Rome every year, and he had heard many of them state that nothing could exceed the courtesy and attention they always received from the Papal Government. This was the only complaint he had ever heard of against that Government, and he was glad to learn that Her Majesty's Government thought it was not well founded.

MR. SCULLY said, the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield had made a mistake in bringing that complaint against the Roman Government. That Government and Mr. Home were quite agreed; the only difference between them was as to these spirits, for whose good behaviour that gentleman could not be answerable. The only persons to blame were the obscene spirits in the habit of calling occasionally on Mr. Home. The hon. and learned Member said he had a great respect for "the old gentleman" at the head of the Roman Government. That was not a decent mode of reference to the head of the Catholic Church, and it was not justifiable on the hon. Member's part, even although he might have a bigoted prejudice against Catholics. [Mr. ROEBUCK dissented.] The House had been occupied all that evening with spirits and nothing but spirits; and he thought they had had enough of them. For himself he did not believe in any spirits except the spirit invoked by the Witch of Endor, for which there was Scripture authority. The President of the Board of Trade had turned the tables on the hon. and learned Member having left the House, not liking, perhaps, to face the spirits on that occasion. The hon. and learned Member had asked what Earl Russell would do if an English merchant, "not a gentleman," had his head cut off at St. Petersburg. Why he would do exactly what he had in regard to Mr. Home—nothing. Russia was too strong to go to war with. But if the merchant who was not a gentleman had his head cut off by the Roman Government, Earl Russell would then go to war, because the Roman Government was weak. The hon. Member for Sheffield must know, as a lawyer, that the Roman Government in this case had acted within its strict right. England used to expatriate Papists, as she called them, at her pleasure, without receiving any remonstrances from Foreign Powers. The men thus sent away were not even foreigners, but their own countrymen. As for foreigners, England had always excluded them whenever she liked, on any excuse or on no excuse. He trusted they would not have a renewal of that night's exhibition; and he could not see what on earth could have been the hon. Member for Sheffield's object, unless it were the propagation of his extraordinary doctrines.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES. PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Question again proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £55,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for erecting a New Office for the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs."

Mr. Layard

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH complained of the enormous cost of the new building, and called attention to the item of £4,899 for preliminary expenses of designs which were not adopted. He found, when he added this item to the sums of a similar nature voted in previous years, that upwards of £10,000 had been paid for designs not used. He moved the omission of the item.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £4,899 8s. 9d., for Preliminary Expenses of Designs for a Foreign Office, which were not adopted, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Augustus Smith.)

MR. W. WILLIAMS asked when the new Foreign Office would be finished according to the contract.

MR. COWPER said, the contractor had bound himself to complete the building in two years and four months from the present time. It would probably, therefore, be in use in three years. In reply to the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Augustus Smith), he explained that the estimate of £200,000 for the new Foreign Office was based upon the original tenders made in 1859. The building now in the process of erection was, in its internal arrangements, almost the same as that for which the contracts were given; but since that time the price of labour and materials had risen about 10 per cent, and the estimate founded on the lowest tender was £223,516. He reminded the Committee that in July, 1861, he stated that the Government could not bind themselves to the estimate of £200,000. The item of £4,899 was made up of various sums paid for drawings and plans. First, there was a sum of £500 due to Mr. Gilbert Scott for work done between November, 1858, and March, 1859; next, there was a further sum of £2,000 payable to Mr. Scott for working drawings and specifications for tenders in 1859; then the model exhibited to Members of the House cost £300, and £1,500 was paid to surveyors for preparing bills of quantities. There were also some smaller charges, bringing up the total to £4,899; but the money had actually been paid, did not require to be voted, and was mentioned only to show the total estimated cost of providing a new Foreign Office. The drawings and plans, though not adopted, were necessary to enable the House to decide what kind of building the Foreign Office should be. Architects had to be employed to prepare them, and he did not think any fault could be found with the amount. He hoped, therefore, the hon. Member would not press his Amendment.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, it seemed to him that there were several items in this Vote which had already appeared in a previous account.

MR. COWPER explained that the items in question were not to be voted now, and were given merely for the information of the House as to the amount of the whole grant.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH asked whether Mr. Pennethorne's claim in regard to the Foreign Office was included?

MR. COWPER said, that the only architect whose account was included was Mr. Scott.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Vote agreed to.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

The following Votes were then agreed to:—

(2.) £6,750, Industrial Museum, Edinburgh.

(3.) £3,355, Aberdeen University.

(4.) £6,574, To complete the sum for the Probate Court Registries.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH asked what the buildings were for which these sums were required.

MR. HADFIELD said, he thought it would be very convenient if the fees and other sums received by the Probate Courts were put in the same account with the expenditure. They were receiving a large sum every year from the public in the shape of fees, out of which the Proctors' compensation was paid. It was understood that the fees in the Probate Court were to be reduced as the compensation charges for the Proctors gradually diminished, and he therefore thought that a statement of the sums paid to the Proctors should be included in the accounts.

MR. ALDERMAN ROSE said, he believed that under this Vote was the proper occasion to express the alarm he felt as to the custody of wills in the building in which they were now placed. It was understood that the building was very vulnerable by fire, and that no protection at all was afforded to its contents. He should be glad to know whether this subject was under consideration, and if any proper site for the custody of wills had been decided upon.

MR. COWPER said, he shared to a certain extent the anxiety and apprehension of the hon. Member. A railway was going to be carried under the Registry in Doctors' Commons, and a street was going to be taken through it. The Government had endeavoured to take care that the removal of the wills should be conducted in a manner that would not cause any confusion. A clause was to be introduced into the railway Bill, that the wills should not be removed until a proper place of deposit had been secured, and a similar precaution had been taken in the Act for the street. A portion of the present Registry was not, perhaps, in a satisfactory fire-proof condition, and the Government had been anxious to get another building. It was thought that they might be ultimately deposited in the basement of the new Courts of Justice. The circumstances to which he had referred rendered it necessary that a change should be made without delay, and probably the basement of the new Courts of Justice would answer the purpose. The larger portion of the expenses connected with the Probate Court would be found under the head of "Law and Justice," where they could more properly be discussed than on the present Vote, which had reference to a Registry at Manchester.

MR. HADFIELD wanted to know whether all the wills of the district would be stored there?

MR. COWPER said, that all the wills of the district would be deposited in the new building at Manchester.

MR. ALDERMAN ROSE inquired how soon would the new Registry Office in London be completed?

MR. COWPER replied that the existing Registry Office could not be taken possession of without the consent of the Lords of the Treasury, who, of course, would not give their consent until a perfectly proper depository for the wills was provided. He believed that such a place would be ready in ample time.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £574, to complete the sum for the General Register House, Edinburgh.

(6.) £19,000, to complete the sum for the Public Record Repository.

(7.) £15,000, to complete the sum for New Westminster Bridge Approaches.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN asked when the remaining houses in New Palace Yard were to be taken down?

Mr. Cowper

MR. COWPER stated that the owner of Fendall's Hotel and of the adjoining houses was bound by an award to surrender them, and their demolition would commence when surrendered.

MR. KINNAIRD wished to know what was intended to be done when the houses were pulled down?

MR. COWPER said, that the Government had asked for a plan for laying out the whole of New Palace Yard as an open space. The details were not yet decided on; but, probably, the best scheme would be to carry a balustrade wall along the southern side of Bridge Street, on account of the level of New Palace Yard being below that of Bridge Street. This difference of level might be made conducive to beauty in laying out the square.

(8.) £7,930, to complete the sum for new Westminster Bridge.

(9.) £3,260, Architectural Designs &c., for Public Buildings.

MR. W. WILLIAMS asked for an explanation of the Vote.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that the Committee were now asked to Vote this sum for plans and estimates prepared by Mr. Pennethorne at different times between 1853 and 1856, and unless some explanation was given with regard to the Vote he would move its rejection.

MR. COWPER said, the hon. Member must be aware from the various Committees that had sat on this subject, and debates that had taken place in the House, that a great number of plans had been prepared at different times. This Vote was confined entirely to the claims of Mr. Pennethorne. Mr. Pennethorne did not send in his claim until after the question respecting the site of Downing Street was decided, because he did not know that he would not be employed upon it. This question had been the subject of great deliberation. In 1853 it was proposed to have a building facing St. James's Park; but that plan was set aside in November, 1854, and another plan was prepared which was to carry the offices all round the quadrangle. Committees and debates followed: it was afterwards thought desirable to enlarge the area to be employed for the public offices. With this change of opinion it became necessary to throw aside the designs that had been made, and to prepare others. The largest item in this Vote was for a sum of £2,100, charged by Mr. Pennethorne for his designs and his estimate, amounting to £435,000 for an office round the quadrangle, and for which he had prepared the working drawings for a contract in gross, and was entitled to  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent upon the estimate. In consequence of the preparation of these designs, the House voted a sum of money in July, he believed, 1855, for the site, and it was intended that the plan should be adopted. Then it was found that the area would not be sufficient, and a Committee on the public offices was appointed in 1856. They determined upon rejecting the existing plans, and recommended a public competition. Consequently Mr. Pennethorne's designs became useless; but he was entitled to remuneration, and the Committee would see that it would not be honest on the part of Parliament not to compensate an architect for work fairly done, and which had been of great use in forming a decision on the subject. For himself he (Mr. Cowper) rejoiced that the former scheme had been abandoned, and the larger area decided upon.

SIR WILLIAM MILES thought the Government erred in the plan they adopted in paying the persons they employed. It appeared that in 1864 a large sum was due to Mr. Pennethorne for work commenced so long back as 1853. Would such a state of things be borne for one instant in a private establishment? Why could not the expense incurred for plans in one year be paid for and brought into the Estimates of the next year? This debt had been accumulating for eleven years, and he protested against such a mode of managing the public accounts.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH pointed out that no explanation had been given of the £5,600, which, according to the audited accounts, had been paid to Mr. Pennethorne in 1859-1860. It appeared as if Mr. Pennethorne were being paid twice over. In his evidence before the Select Committee Lord Llanover distinctly denied having given Mr. Pennethorne any authority for the preparation of these plans.

MR. COWPER believed that Mr. Pennethorne had misunderstood the directions which he had received from Lord Llanover; but it was not likely that a man of his station and high character would have made these plans except he had believed that he was acting under instructions from the head of his Department. The work had been done, and after due consideration the Government were of opinion that, on the whole, Mr. Pennethorne was entitled to be remunerated for them. As to the sum paid two years ago, it had nothing whatever to do with the plans referred to in this Estimate.

LORD JOHN MANNERS was sure that Mr. Pennethorne believed himself to be perfectly justified in preparing these plans, and was glad that the Government had concluded to propose this Vote. The difficulty in closing the architect's accounts lay quite as much with the House of Commons as with the Board of Works. An architect was directed to prepare plans for some public buildings which were thought to be urgently required. By the time he sent them in, perhaps, public opinion had changed, the buildings were not thought to be so urgent, or there might be doubts expressed as to the mode of carrying them out. Time went on, and the architect did not like to send in his bill, because he did not know but that at the end of two or three years' discussion his plans might be, after all, adopted, when he would get the usual percentage. For instance, how many years had the Foreign Office and the National Gallery been under discussion, and how many architects had been employed in preparing plans for them? As to the Foreign Office, he wished the noble Lord at the head of the Government joy of the building which was being erected in Downing Street, and he hoped that his name would be engraved in large letters over it, so that posterity might know to whom they were indebted for that ornament to the metropolis. Mr. Pennethorne was a most careful and painstaking public servant, and he hoped the House of Commons would not refuse him payment for work actually rendered.

SIR WILLIAM MILES reminded his noble Friend that this Vote was for plans which had been rejected and disposed of at once. Supposing any one not in Mr. Pennethorne's position had prepared these plans, would it have been fair to make him lie out of his money for eleven years?

MR. KINNAIRD asked whether Mr. Pennethorne was not a permanent servant of some Department, and whether his whole time was at its service. He was under an impression that he received a salary either from the Board of Works or from the Woods and Forests.

MR. COWPER said that, under the present arrangement, Mr. Pennethorne had a salary of £1,500 a year as surveyor and architectural adviser to the Board of Works. In these capacities he had rendered great services to the Department, for which he would have received a larger remuneration had he been paid in the ordinary way. With respect to plans for new buildings, Mr. Pennethorne was in the position of any other architect, and entitled to his commission. In 1853 and 1855, Mr. Pennethorne considered himself likely to be appointed architect for erecting those buildings for which he had made the designs. Even after the Committee of 1856 recommended public competition, he did not know, until the contract was made, that he should not be intrusted with the execution of the work. Consequently, he did not press for payment until the contract was entered into for the present buildings. His claims, however, had undergone considerable scrutiny.

MR. W. WILLIAMS thought there would be a great economy in employing a Government architect in all public works. Mr. Pennethorne appeared to be paid a salary, and to make all his charges besides.

LORD JOHN MANNERS observed that it would be absolutely necessary that where a competent architect was taken from his ordinary work he should be paid a competent salary. But it did not follow that because an architect did the ordinary work of his office very well, that he was one to whom they should intrust the design and execution of great public buildings.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH wished to know whether the plans now to be paid for included those of the Lombardo-Gothic building from which they had been saved by the noble Lord the First Minister, and which, however beautiful in itself, would have been totally unsuited to the locality.

MR. COWPER: No. The design to which the hon. Gentleman alludes was not prepared by Mr. Pennethorne, but by Mr. Scott.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £3,260, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray, in the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, the Charge for Architectural Designs, Plans, and Estimates for Public Buildings, prepared at different times between the years 1853 and 1863."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 84; Noes 21: Majority 63.

Vote agreed to.

(10.) £4,000, Nelson's Column.

Mr. Cowper

I so strongly feel in the unworthy delay which, as it appears to me, has been permitted from year to year to occur in the completion of this monument to England's heroic and illustrious admiral; and to complain that, although a sum—in amount, £3,816—has been expended upon the lions destined to adorn its base, so little progress has been made in the work. Regarding this I may mention a circumstance, painful though it be in interest, which is, that a few months since one of the last of Nelson's captains—the late admiral of the fleet, Sir Graham Howard—almost in his dying hours expressed to his son, Captain Howard, of the navy, his strong and anxious regret that this last testimony to the great and illustrious man, whom he survived, was still incomplete. There were but a few left who had served under that great seaman, and he (Admiral Walcott) was afraid that they likewise would pass away with the same sentiment on their lips.

"Well might the passing foreigner exclaim—

If Britain thus neglect her gallant son,

She ill deserved that honour and that fame

Which with his precious life for her he won."

He therefore hoped that some effort would be made to complete this column.

MR. W. WILLIAMS thought that it was disgraceful that the monument should be left uncompleted.

MR. COWPER said, he fully sympathized with the feelings of the hon. and gallant Admiral, who, he believed, originally proposed the erection of the lions, and much regretted the delay which had occurred in the completion of the work. That delay, however, had arisen rather from an excess than a want of care. The first model was all but completed, and he was assured that one of the lions would be cast during the present year. When that had been done the difficulties would have been mainly overcome, and he trusted that no long period would elapse before the other three were finished, and that the hon. and gallant Admiral would have an opportunity of seeing and admiring them. Some money had been paid in advance, but the value of the work executed was fully equal to the sum which had been advanced.

SIR MATTHEW RIDLEY said, there were in the Foreign Office four colossal lions of sufficiently large dimensions, executed by an eminent artist some years ago, and then only set aside by the vote of the late Duke of Wellington. They were to have cost 6,000 guineas, and every lion would have been distinct and different. Not only was the work, after being un fait accompli, thus thrown aside, but the work of providing the lions for the angles at the base of the monument transferred to Sir Edwin Landseer. He trusted that the new work would be properly executed; but he could not help thinking, that as a matter of economy, the lions finished years ago might have been advantageously and properly used. He saw no reason why the British public should pay £17,000 for the same thing as they could get in as high or a higher style of art for £7,000.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER observed the House had been told last year that Sir Edwin Landseer was going every day to the Zoological Gardens—he presumed at feeding time—to study the lions. Now the public were told that they were only going to have one cast some time this year. He trusted, however, that the right hon. Gentleman would give them some more precise information on the point. He hoped the four would not be all alike, and he thought that it would have been better to have engaged four artists. He really could not understand why Sir Edwin Landseer should have been commissioned at all. That he was a great painter of animals was not a very satisfactory reason why he should be a good artist in bronze. Indeed, he should have thought that Sir Edwin was one of the worst persons to whom the work could have been intrusted, for the great merit of his painting was the great finish of his work, whereas what was wanted was something bold and striking.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, one of the lions was ready for casting within the next month. The principal reason which caused Sir Edwin Landseer to go to the lions was that the lions would not go to Sir Edwin Landseer, and the artist deserved much credit for taking the special trouble he did. When the lions were seen they would give a practical answer to the remark just made, and he believed that the hon. Baronet (Sir George Bowyer) on seeing the model would come forward and say that whoever selected Sir Edwin Landseer did well. He (Lord John Manners) had selected him because he considered him the best fitted to place the lions on the pedestal. The hon. Baronet (Sir George Bowyer) had suggested an eminent sculptor; but his next remark that there ought to be four employed was not consistent therewith.

MR. GREGORY had heard from those who were competent to give an opinion, that Sir Edwin Landseer's model was a high work of art. The turn which the debate took reminded him of the heraldic artist who was brought to Exeter Change to see the lions, and who, when assured that they were lions, maintained that they were most misshapen beasts, and not the animals he had been painting all his lifetime. The British public were in the position of this painter of heraldry—they had only seen the conventional beast in stone or bronze—and Sir Edwin Landseer would teach them what the king of the beasts really was.

(11.) £96,000, Harbours of Refuge.

MR. BAXTER said, he had distinctly understood that no further Vote would be asked for on account of the works at Alderney, and yet a Vote of £50,000 was now asked for, and it appeared that more would be required.

MR. PEEL said, it had been stated last year that the Government had decided on abandoning the construction of the eastern arm of the breakwater, and that the works would be confined to the completion of the western arm. There would thus be a reduction in the total estimate from £1,300,000 to £1,200,000; and there was reason to believe that this Estimate would not be exceeded. After the present Vote, a further sum of £50,000 would complete the whole work.

COLONEL W. STUART was glad to hear that the rocks were to be blasted; otherwise the harbour was more likely to wreck than to save our ships.

MR. LINDSAY said, he had recently been to Alderney and could not help being struck with the folly of successive Governments in throwing money away upon the works there. Alderney was one of a cluster of rocks. As to its being a harbour of refuge, if the eastern arm was abandoned no vessel would find protection against an easterly gale, or would run there for protection—and as to its being a look-out station from which to watch Cherbourg, even on a clear day it would be impossible to see ships entering or leaving Cherbourg, which was twenty-four miles off. In addition to £1,600,000 for the breakwater, the Government had spent £250,000 on fortifications, which in a time of war would require 7,000 men to man them. No enemy would ever have thought of attacking Alderney if we had not put fortifications for him to attack there. Did the House think that in time of war the country would keep its ships lying in the harbour? No, they would be cruising up and down the Channel, protecting our own commerce and watching the enemy. The pier erected at Alderney, if constructed somewhere on the coast of England, might be instrumental in protecting life and property; but in its present position it was exposed to the most violent gales, from which its concave instead of convex form rendered it very liable to injury. The harbour itself was nothing but a cluster of rocks; it was true that these were being blown up, but was it not a monstrous thing of any Government to select such a site? For his own part he would rather that the whole undertaking should be abandoned; but if the House should be of opinion that the works should be completed, he would suggest that the additional work should be performed by convict labour.

MR. CORRY said, it was a great mistake to call Alderney a harbour of refuge, as no man in his senses would run down upon that dangerous coast. But at the time it was originally designed for a great naval port, the most distinguished authorities, including the late Duke of Wellington, were favourable to the scheme. To illustrate the matter, if a foreign Power were in possession of a great harbour and extensive fortifications upon an island only sixteen miles from Portsmouth, their importance doubtless would be generally recognized. The breakwater, however, would be perfectly useless unless the south-eastern arm were constructed as well as the western. This would cost an additional £100,000, but whatever Government might be at the time in office he was sure the money would have to be spent.

MR. COX said, he believed that the works at Alderney would only hold out an invitation to an enemy to attack a place which they would otherwise never visit. He also had recently been at Alderney, and one of the 200 or 300 inhabitants of the island told him that it would have been better if the vast sums which had been expended there in the construction of a harbour which could never answer the intended purpose, had been employed in cutting down the whole surface to low-water mark and removing to London the stone of which it was composed to pave the streets.

Mr. Lindsay

(12.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £47,875, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for Works and Expenses at the New Packet Harbour and Harbour of Refuge at Holyhead, Portpatrick Harbour, and of Works at Spurn Point."

LORD NAAS asked, when there was a reasonable prospect of the completion of the works at Holyhead, which the public had been looking forward to for several years past?

MR. TORRENS asked for some information on the subject of Portpatrick Harbour, and moved that the Vote be postponed until the requisite details were furnished in the same form as in Vote 18.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Item of £8,737, for Portpatrick Harbour, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Torrens.)

MR. COX said, that when he was in the North of Ireland he was informed that the Government had agreed with a railway company to construct a line to Portpatrick; but on inquiry he could not discover that any such contract existed. There had been voted up to last year the sum of £21,000, and the House was now asked for a further sum of £8,700. The original Estimate was, he believed, from £12,000 to £15,000. He wished to know how long they were to go on voting money for making Portpatrick Harbour? A small outlay at Stranraer, to form a route by Larne, would be money much better laid out.

MR. MARSH said, he had been two or three times to Portpatrick Harbour, and he believed that the works there were a mere job. Stranraer, on the other hand, might easily be made an excellent harbour.

MAJOR HAMILTON said, he had attempted to land at Stranraer by the steamer, but he was obliged to get into a boat, and could not even land from that, for he was put into a cart and then shot out, like so much rubbish.

MR. COX said, that the sum of £200 or £300 expended on a landing stage at Stranraer would make it a better harbour than Portpatrick, because a steamer could enter it at any time of the tide.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that the works for the accommodation of the packet service at Holyhead would, he believed, be completed within the present year; but some delay had hitherto been caused in consequence of some difficulty being thrown in the way of the London and North Western Railway traffic. This difficulty had now been removed. The Vote for Portpatrick Harbour was rendered necessary in consequence of an engagement, wisely or unwisely, entered into between the Government and the Portpatrick Railway Company in 1856, that if the Company brought down their line to the harbour the Government would render the harbour available for the steam packets between Portpatrick and Donaghadee. He understood that the works would not be completed during the present year, though the deepening of the water-way at the entrance gates would be completed within a few weeks, and the harbour itself would be dredged. This latter work was frequently interfered with by the weather, and, therefore, he could not say when it would be finished, but the Government must carry out their agreement with the Railway Company.

MR. COX said, he had been unable to find that there was any engagement by the Government to do this work, and he asked for the production of the document, if there was any. The Act of Parliament was silent on the subject.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that the agreement was founded upon a correspondence which took place between the Government and the Railway Company, and upon a subsequent Treasury Minute, ordering the execution of the works. Beyond that, there was no written contract with the company.

MR. CORRY said, he could not, under the circumstances, support the Amendment; but he trusted that next year the estimate for this and similar works would be in the same form as those for Dover and Alderney. If there had been any Irishman at the Board of Trade or the Treasury, the works at Holyhead would have been completed long ago.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said that, years ago, a promise had been made that no more money should be spent upon this harbour.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he was not so sanguine as the right hon. Gentleman in his belief in the speedy completion of the arrangements for the passenger traffic between Dublin and Holyhead. He thought that the attention of the Government could with very much greater advantage be directed towards the blowing up of Daunt's Rock. They were asked to vote £50,000 for the works at Alderney.

He regarded those works as nothing less than a monstrous job, and while the Government were bestowing their attention in that direction, the applications for the destruction of Daunt's Rock, which would only cost £20,000 or £25,000, were entirely neglected; and yet if that rock were removed it would make fully available one of the finest harbours in the world.

MR. BENTINCK objected to the principle of expending public money for local purposes. His right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade had assigned a reason for the necessity for the expenditure of so much money the principle that, because the Parliament of 1856 made an agreement, the Parliament of 1864 was bound to accept the conditions agreed to, and act upon them, whether those conditions were good or bad. His right hon. Friend was too good a tactician to admit that the bargain was a bad one, but if it had been advantageous he would certainly have said so, and in his remarks he had carefully avoided making any such statement. The position of Portpatrick was not to be compared to that of Stranraer, and yet Government was spending money for no earthly purpose, while they had a magnificent harbour within five miles. With regard to Daunt's Rock, it was perfectly marvellous what an amount of misconception existed upon the subject. Daunt's Rock was no more an impediment to the entry of Cork Harbour than were the cross-benches to any one coming into the House—in fact, a vessel must go out of her way to get on it. There was actually existing at the present moment, at the very mouth of Cork harbour itself, a rock ten times as dangerous and inconvenient, which no one entertained any idea of removing; and the only ground upon which the removal of Daunt's Rock was urged upon the Government was, the fact of a vessel having run on it in cold blood.

(13.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £72,452, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for Erecting, Repairing, and Maintaining the several Public Buildings in the Department of the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland."

LORD NAAS wished to know the amount which was to be devoted to the Albert Model Farm for additions and alterations.

MR. W. WILLIAMS complained of the expenditure of money for the erection of model agricultural schools, which he maintained existed in reality for the benefit of the landlords. Many items had been included in this Vote which did not properly belong to it. He said that the sum of £4,000 was asked for the Phoenix Park. What was that for?

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, the Phoenix Park in Dublin was placed under the Board of Works, and therefore the sum asked for came under the amount voted for that Board. It was unreasonable to object to the Vote of a little more than £4,000 for the Phoenix Park when no less than £94,000 had been voted for the English Parks.

MR. PEEL explained that the sum asked for the Phoenix Park was to carry out improvements in the way of levelling, draining, and planting shrubberies. With reference to the Vote for the Board of Education Buildings, the principal item was for a steam laundry at the Albert Model Farm, by which it was expected that a considerable annual saving would be effected.

LORD JOHN MANNERS reminded the right hon. Baronet that last year he had undertaken to consider the expenditure at Glasnevin, with a view to its reduction and ultimate extinction. A new Vote for alterations and repairs did not seem adapted to the fulfilment of such a promise.

SIR ROBERT PEEL did not admit that he had contemplated the extinction of the institution. He had promised to consider what reductions could be made, and he had carefully gone over the details of the establishment with that object in view, the result of which was that reduction had been made. He did not believe that it would be for the interest of Ireland to abandon the institution.

LORD NAAS said, it was clear that as long as the schools were maintained repairs would be necessary; but what he objected to was that any enlargement or addition to the Model Farm should take place after the pledge which had been given last year, that the institution should be put upon a reduced scale, with a view to its ultimate suppression. The item of £600 for a steam laundry needed some explanation.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, it was perfectly true that last year he gave the Committee a pledge that the Agricultural Model Schools should be reduced, and he had done all in his power to carry out the wishes of the House in that respect. The expenditure now proposed was, for the most part, for necessary repairs. In Class 4 the Estimate for that particular class of institutions would be found to be diminished; and when Class 4 came on for discussion he should be prepared to give every information in detail with regard to the Model Agricultural Schools in Ireland.

LORD NAAS thought the proposition to increase the amount for alterations of the Model Farm was nothing more than an attempt to perpetuate the institution, and as its real purpose was simply to supply landowners with land stewards, he objected to the outlay for such a purpose. He should therefore move to reduce the Vote by £600.

Motion made, and Question,

"That the Item of £950, for additions and alterations to Model Agricultural Schools be reduced by the sum of £600."—(Lord Naas.)

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, the institution was something more than a school for land stewards; it was really a valuable national institution.

MR. W. WILLIAMS wanted to know why such alterations were made in the Model Agricultural Schools and the Albert Model Farm as to require an outlay of £1,726 upon them.

COLONEL DICKSON asked why it was necessary to build a steam laundry at an expense of £600. Whose washing was to be done in that laundry?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he supposed it was the dirty linen of the establishment.

MR. ESMONDE said, that the school was of more use to the peasantry, from whom land stewards were taken, than to the landlords.

(15.) £1,100, to complete the sum for the National Gallery (Dublin).

(16.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £13,703, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for erecting and maintaining certain Lighthouses abroad."

MR. CORRY wished for some explanation of the item for the harbour master, and for the construction of a breakwater at Howth.

MR. PEEL said, an Act of Parliament was passed last Session authorizing the advance of money to make certain improvements in Howth harbour, in consequence of the number of fishing vessels that went near the harbour. At the same time, power was given for levying tolls on vessels that should frequent the harbour, and it was expected that a considerable sum would be received in that way which would clear off the amount expended.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH objected that this country should be called upon to pay for lighthouses which were of value only to the ships frequenting the coasts of our colonies. He thought that the colonies themselves should maintain those lighthouses. Ceylon had a surplus revenue, and yet the taxpayers of this country were called upon to maintain the lighthouses upon the coasts of that island. He should move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £2,000, the cost of the maintenance of the lighthouses in question.

Motion made, and Question,

"That the Item of £2,000, for the Little Basses Rocks Light Ship at Ceylon, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Mr. Augustus Smith.)

MR. THOMSON HANKEY could not understand why this country should not pay its proportion for the keeping up of this light ship, for if it were not maintained the shipping of this country would materially suffer.

MR. MILNER GIBSON also observed that the lighthouse at Ceylon was kept up to facilitate the navigation of ships going to and from China and Australia, and that it would be very hard to call upon the inhabitants of the island itself to submit to the heavy charge necessary for that purpose.

MR. HASSARD wished the right hon. Gentleman would apply the same argument to the case of Daunt's Rock, in the vicinity of Cork.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, the light ship was principally for the use of the local shipping.

Question put, and negatived.

£4,000, Lunatic Asylum, Isle of Man.

COLONEL W. STUART moved the rejection of the whole Vote. Here was a large sum proposed to be voted by the country for building a new lunatic asylum in the Isle of Man. What the population of the Isle of Man was he did not know. The Governor had £800 a year, and therefore, so far, it was an agreeable place. The probable cost of the building was £20,000, and £2,000 for the purchase of the site. He did not see why English taxpayers should contribute this money for the purpose of building a lunatic asylum in the Isle of Man.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £4,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for the erection in the Isle of Man of an Asylum for the reception of Criminal and other Lunatics."

MR. PEEL said, the Vote was proposed with the view to fulfil engagements which had been entered into in 1850, when Sir G. C. Lewis was Secretary to the Treasury. At that time an application was made by the Isle of Man for a grant towards erecting an asylum for its criminal and pauper lunatics; and the Government undertook to provide half the expense necessary for erecting the proposed asylum provided the inhabitants of the island themselves would raise the other half. Considerable difficulty was however found in the island in raising the necessary sum. Matters remained so until 1858, when the island took upon itself to raise the necessary money by means of a local assessment on real property; and then, upon a second application, the late Government declared that they were willing to pursue the same course as had been suggested in the year 1850. The necessary preliminaries were accordingly completed, and plans and estimates were prepared for the buildings, which were approved by the proper authorities in this country. It was, therefore, deemed desirable to propose the present Vote to defray half the cost of the buildings. He might add that the revenue which the Exchequer received from the Isle of Man amounted to £27,000 a year, while the sum annually paid out of that revenue did not exceed £15,000, thus leaving a sum of £12,000 to be appropriated to the purposes of this country. He thought that, considering this circumstance, and that an asylum was necessary for the island, this Vote might be agreed to.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, it might be true that Customs duties were raised in the island, and that those duties went into the Imperial Exchequer; but similar duties were raised by every county in England, which besides raised rates for such objects as the building of its own lunatic asylums. Why, then, he should like to know, should the right hon. Gentleman seek to arouse the pity of the Committee for the Isle of Man? Or why should it be made an exception to the rule which applied to other parts of the kingdom? That island was in a peculiar position. It had no representative in the House of Commons. It was governed by a Parliament of its own, and if it governed itself it ought to tax itself. If the Committee agreed to the Vote, they would be introducing the principle of taxation without representation—a course to which he objected; and he should therefore support the Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman behind him.

(17.) £17,000, Sheriff Court-Houses (Scotland).

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN called attention to the fact, that while one-half the cost of building and repairing these court-houses in Scotland was borne by the Consolidated Fund, the like charge in Ireland had to be entirely defrayed out of the county rates. In England, again, a still richer country than Ireland, the whole expense of building and repairing the county courts came out of the Imperial Exchequer.

MR. PEEL said, that the arrangement by which one-half of the expense of Sheriff Court-houses in Scotland was provided out of the county rates, and the other half out of monies voted by Parliament, was based upon an Act of the Imperial Legislature. It did not follow from that that in Ireland the Assistant Barristers' courts ought also to be built or repaired from funds voted by Parliament. They should take into account the relative apportionment of the local charges in each part of the United Kingdom. In Ireland the entire expense of the police force was paid out of the Imperial Exchequer, whereas in England and Scotland the county rates were charged with the cost of providing barracks for the police.

Vote agreed to.

(18.) £20,000, Rates for Government Property.

LORD NAAS observed that the principle involved in this Vote was one of considerable interest, and he invoked the close attention of the Government to it. The practice in this matter varied very widely in different parts of the country. At Portsmouth, Plymouth, and Chatham, contributions were granted in aid of the local rates, while in Ireland not a shilling was expended in that manner. It was high time that some rule should be laid down whereby the Government property should be liable to certain assessment in all parts of the country. Before they voted this money, they should insist on knowing whether any general rule would be laid down applicable to all parts of the kingdom.

MR. PEEL said, it was proposed to deal with this money in the same way as the Vote of last year was applied. The rule laid down was, that where the assessable value of the Government property exceeded one-sixth of the assessable value of all the other property in the parish, a contribution should be made in aid of the local assessment. The Government believed that by that arrangement they would indemnify the other properties of the parish for any losses they might sustain by the establishment of Government property in their districts. It was also proposed to make contributions where the Government purchased property, and so withdrew it from the previous rateable area. They would contribute the same amount as they found the property paying when they took possession of it; but it would be a fixed amount, and would not be increased as the value of the property increased by the Government expenditure. Whether in respect to official residences the liability to pay rates should be placed upon those occupying the residences, or the Government, was a question which must depend upon circumstances. That question was, in fact, still under the consideration of the Government.

MR. SCLATER-BOTH asked why the property in question should be liable only to the payment of poor rates?

MR. PEEL replied that where the property acquired by the Government had been assessed for other local rates, contributions would be made to them also.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS protested against the mode in which this money was distributed by the Treasury. He knew that a large quantity of land had been taken by the Government in the neighbourhoods of Plumstead, Woolwich, and Deptford, on which no rates were ever paid. He trusted that before next Session Her Majesty's Government would declare some distinct principle by which this money should be applied.

MR. COLLINS thought that the principle adopted by the Government was very illogical. It appeared that when the Government property should amount to one-sixth of that of the whole parish a special contribution in aid would be given. He could not see any reason why every kind of property in possession of the Government should not pay its fair share of taxation as well as every other property. Then, again, the hon. Secretary of the Treasury said that the Government would not pay any more for property which they had improved by an outlay than what they paid before. But that was laying down a different principle from that which applied to the property of private individuals. He hoped that henceforward the logical principle would be laid down that all Government property should pay its fair share of taxation in the same manner as every other property was liable to.

MR. LOCKE said, it appeared to him an extraordinary principle to lay down that Government property should make a contribution in aid of rates only when it amounted to one-sixth of the rateable value of the parish. This question of rating should not be left in the hands of the Government, but rather placed in the hands of the ordinary local authorities of the country. He thought the explanation given by the right hon. Gentleman very unsatisfactory.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, that when the right hon. Gentleman admitted that a certain proportion of the Government property was rateable, the question assumed a much larger shape, and the question arose whether or not all the Government property should be rated, and dealt with like all other property. He could not agree with the hon. Member for Knarborough (Mr. Collins), that this Vote should be rejected because all the Government property was not rated. It was but reasonable when the Government took possession of land and improved it by the erection of large buildings it should be rated in common with other property under similar circumstances at its full value. He should vote for the present amount, though he considered it should have been a much larger sum.

MR. COLLINS explained. He considered all property should be rated. It was a fallacy to have a mere rate in aid, as the present mode of rating Government property was.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, the

hon. Member appeared to be taking an unusual course. Instead of agreeing to or rejecting the present Vote, most of the hon. Members who had spoken had urged the necessity of a larger Vote, and to meet the views of all, the Government ought to have proposed a sum of £120,000. He, on the contrary, thought the Vote should have been smaller, being of opinion that it was wrong to rate Government property.

(19.) £53,000, Land, &c., at Kensington Gore.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he believed the House was in hopes that the late Exhibition had been disposed of now and for ever, and that the last decision on the question had been given in a way that should not encourage the Government to revive it. He was anxious, therefore, to know what was implied by the rather suspicious phrase, "certain buildings used for the purposes of the late International Exhibition."

MR. COWPER explained, that the buildings in question were the two arcades which were of a permanent character, and had been used as refreshment rooms.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD asked whether any Vote would be proposed this year for the new buildings at South Kensington, for the design of which Captain Fowke had received the prize?

MR. COWPER said, it was not intended to ask for a Vote this year.

MR. AYRTON asked whether the buildings the Government had agreed to purchase were to be dedicated to tavern purposes?

MR. F. S. POWELL wished to know whether they were to be applied to national purposes, or whether the Horticultural Society were to have the benefit of them?

MR. COWPER stated that the portions of the late refreshment rooms bought by the Government were on each side of the central part which remained in the hands of the Commissioners of the Exhibition. The Horticultural Society had no right over the portion which had been sold to the Government. These buildings were to be devoted to purposes of science and art.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH thought it was much better to get rid of the whole of the land instead of completing the purchase of these arcades. He last year voted against the purchase of the land. They were then told it was a very good bargain, that it had been sold cheap, and he was of opinion it would be better for the nation to sell it for a profit. In order to get rid of any further difficulty or dispute about the matter, he moved the rejection of the Vote.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR asked to what particular purpose of science or art it was intended to devote these arcades? It was difficult to understand to what other than the culinary art they could be devoted. He thought they had sufficient room on the other side of the ground for the purposes of science and art.

MR. F. S. POWELL asked when the Exhibition building would be cleared away? As it was rumoured that a Patent Museum was to be erected there, it was important to know when they would have possession of the ground.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he understood the right hon. Gentleman to say he did not intend to propose a Vote for the erection of any building on the ground this season; but he hoped that reply had no reference to the Vote they were led to expect would be asked for this year for a building for the reception of the Natural History collection of the British Museum. He hoped that that Vote would not be delayed. The opinion out of doors was favourable to such a Vote.

MR. COWPER said, he was very sorry, but he did not think it would be possible to propose a Vote this year with reference to the removal of the Natural History collections from the British Museum to South Kensington, as it would be impossible to get the arrangements completed this year. The contractors were removing the old Exhibition building at South Kensington as fast as possible, but he could not say exactly when the ground would be cleared. The Government were not responsible for the contractors' arrangements. They were bound to remove the building, but it did not appear there was any binding covenant entered into by them with the Commissioners of 1862 for the clearing of the ground in a given time. He was unable to say at present to what particular purpose of science and art the arcades would be devoted. That was a question for further consideration. The ground was purchased on the understanding that it should be devoted to such purposes connected with science and art as Parliament should determine. The buildings were well adapted for the collections of Natural History. Unless the House voted the money so as to complete the purchase and to obtain a conveyance there could be no legal title, and the money which had been already paid would be lost.

LORD NAAS hoped that nothing would be done to prejudice the question as to the removal of the Natural History collections from the British Museum. He objected altogether to the removal of these collections, which were so attractive to the working classes. He believed the proper place for the Natural History collections was the British Museum, and protested against any steps being taken for the removal of the collection.

MR. GREGORY said, he did not wonder at the House being aghast at the notion of any addition to the Science and Art Department at Kensington, and he believed that the very phrase "Science and Art" stank in the nostrils of every one. With respect to the removal of the Natural History collections of the British Museum, nothing could be done without the sanction of Parliament; and when a Vote for the purpose should be taken, then would be the time to have plans submitted to the House for the accommodation of the collections.

MR. HASSARD asked, whether there was any plan for the appropriation of that part of the twelve acres purchased for the purpose of the South Kensington Museum, which seemed to be insufficient for the Patent Museum?

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH inquired what was the period when the Exhibition Commissioners had agreed to clear the ground of all buildings and hand it over to the country.

MR. COWPER said, that at present there was no proposal before the House for the disposal of the Exhibition ground. That might be brought forward next year; but as yet the matter was not ripe. The Exhibition Commissioners of 1851 were in possession of the land, which they sold to the Government; but they did not possess any legal power to require the ground to be cleared within a certain day. The building was, however, in process of demolition. The Patent Museum occupied a small place belonging to the Kensington Museum, and upon the ground referred to by the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Hassard) the building was being proceeded with.

MR. FERRAND asked, whether the contractors had not pledged themselves to have the building removed from the ground by a certain day?

MR. COWPER said, that there was originally an agreement for the removal of the building within a certain date; but the stipulated period having elapsed, the Commissioners had no legal power to name any other time.

MR. LOCKE wanted to know, whether the building on the twelve acres which had been referred to was to be erected in accordance with Captain Fowke's plan, which ultimately assumed a very handsome appearance?

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR observed, that though it was stated that the arcades would be useful for the exhibition of the Natural History collections, yet if the House decided not to remove the collections there, then the arcades would be perfectly useless. By the Vote now proposed the House would be pledged more deeply than ever to the removal of those collections, and therefore he thought that his hon. Friend was quite right in moving the rejection of the Vote.

MR. COWPER said, that upon being asked of what use the arcades would be, he replied that they were for the same use as the land—namely, for purposes connected with science and art, and he had referred to the opinions of competent judges, who stated that they were very well adapted for that object.

WRITS REGISTRATION (SCOTLAND)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."*

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, he had been requested to make a statement more in detail of the origin and nature of the Bill than he had done in the few words in which he had moved for leave to introduce the measure. The Bill had its origin in the Report of a Royal Commission, appointed in 1861, which was laid on the table of the House at the commencement of last Session; and its object was to reform the system of registration of land titles in Scotland. At present there were local registers in the counties, and a general register in Edinburgh: it was proposed by the Bill to remove the local registers to Edinburgh, and to keep the register in Edinburgh in the form of a county register. The results would be to remove the necessity of a double search, to ensure economy by the abolition of the separate staffs, and lastly, to keep the index so close up as greatly to facilitate the search and lessen the expense. It would readily be supposed that a subject which had been the object of a Royal Commission was neither new nor unimportant. It certainly was not new, although it had been represented in some of the local newspapers as having come upon the country by surprise. On the contrary, the objects which the Bill proposed to carry out have been canvassed in Scotland for years before the Commission was appointed—so much so that the officers who had been appointed to be Registrars of Sasines in Scotland since 1858 had held their offices under the condition that, in the event of the registers being removed to Edinburgh, they should not be entitled to compensation. It was, therefore, unfair to represent this Bill as a sudden thought, or an ill-digested and ill-considered scheme, proposed for the first time in the present Session of Parliament, whereas it was the result of long consideration and discussion; and was based on the opinion of the soundest and most eminent lawyers in Scotland. He was not disposed to deny that the measure is one of great importance. To show what was its importance, he would briefly describe the existing state of things. The system of land registry was introduced into Scotland in 1617. In that year an Act was passed which established a complete register of all rights affecting land, whether conveyances, or burdens, or legal process. The nature of the system introduced by the Act of 1617 was this—A general register was established at Edinburgh, and in that general register all rights affecting land were registered and divided into different departments, according to the nature of the rights registered. But, as the Act expresses it, "for the greater relief of the lieges," certain districts were appointed throughout Scotland in which offices of registry were kept in order to prevent the necessity of the deeds being sent up to be recorded in Edinburgh. These districts were not counties, but districts embracing sometimes more than one county, and sometimes parts of counties. As they were appointed in 1617, so they remained to the present day. The result of the Act of 1617 had been most beneficial to Scotland. It had built up a system of registration of land titles which was nearly perfect. It had been perfect in giving a great security to land tenures in Scotland, enabling purchasers and lenders of money to ascertain, if not with perfect accuracy, at least with an approximation to accuracy, the burdens which existed on land. There was only one defect—at least only one important defect—and that was the expense. The expense was very great comparatively, and one object of the present measure was to reduce it. Should it prove successful, a great and immediate economy would be effected; and it might prove the foundation of further reforms for cheapening the conveyance of land in Scotland to an extent unequalled in any other part of the kingdom. At present, if a man wished to purchase or to lend money on security of land, he was obliged to search for forty years; because, as forty years was the prescriptive period, he must see that the land he was going to buy or to lend money upon was free so far as that period. In order to do this, the first step he had to take, if he lived in the country, was to examine the local register—the register of sasines in the country. But that register only extended over a limited period; for all the local registrars entered the deeds as they came in in a book sent by the Registrar General, to whom, when it is full, it is re-transmitted. Sometimes, in large counties, these books were filled in a few days; sometimes in counties and districts where the transactions were few, they were not filled for three or four years. The first thing to be done was to ascertain whether there were any burdens on the land; then a further search must be made in Edinburgh, and it must be made in a double register, first in the general register which was kept there; and secondly, in the particular register which had been transmitted from the counties. In that way, double trouble was occasioned, double fees were charged, and double expenses were incurred. Now the proposal made in the present Bill was this. It would no longer be necessary to have these registers kept in the counties for the purpose of recording; and for the purpose of searching they were useless. It was, therefore, proposed to bring up the registers from the counties to Edinburgh, to keep them in the Register Office, to abolish the general register, and to keep for the future the whole of the county registers in Edinburgh. The result would be that there would be only one register to examine instead of three, and a considerable economy would be effected. In the next place, there would be a saving of the whole expense of the local registrars. The fees received by the local registrars amounted to £12,000 a year, and if the registers were brought up to Edinburgh and kept there by one staff, there would be a saving of about £7,000 or £8,000 a year on the total cost of the registers, which in the end would accrue to those who used the register—in other words, of those who were interested in the conveyance of land. But the greatest and most important advantage would be, that the registers being all in one place the officials would be able to keep up the "Index" to the current year. He would not enter into the details as they were fully explained by the Commissioners in their Report. In order to secure a simple and easy search, it was necessary that there should be a complete index of the whole of the registers. That was impossible as long as there was a double register—one kept at Edinburgh and the other in the counties; and it was impossible that in Edinburgh the officials could complete it, because the county registers came up at intervals, sometimes at intervals of three or four weeks, and sometimes as long as three or four years; and in that way the process of completing the index could only be done in cycles of five years. These were substantially the leading features of the Bill. There had been a good deal of criticism expended upon it, and some had so far misconceived the measure as to imagine that it would be practically very expensive and inconvenient. In what way expense and inconvenience could arise he could not imagine. It could not arise in the mode of searching, for the mode of searching would be simplified and shortened; it could not arise in the registration, for whereas in former times it was necessary to have these local registrations, because the registration could only take place at particular places, since the introduction of the penny postage a very ordinary mode of registering the deed had been by transmitting it by post to the registrar, whether in Edinburgh or in the counties. There was a passage in the Report of the Commissioners which was clear and distinct upon this point. The Commissioners said—

we should scarcely have been prepared to recommend the abolition of one of them—whether it resulted in the keeping of a single register for each county in Edinburgh, or for each county within itself—unless improved means had been provided for the conveyance of deeds by the establishment of cheap postage, and unless we had been certiorated by experience of the perfect safety of their transmission by post. On this last point we have been fully satisfied by the returns we have received from the keepers of all the registers. It appears from these returns that while nearly a fifth part of the whole writs recorded in the General Register House is now transmitted by post, the proportion transmitted to some of the district registers is much greater. In Ayrshire and Fifeshire, four-fifths are sent by post to the district registers; and the proportion in several other districts varies from four-fifths to a half. This proves that the post is already universally accepted as a cheap and convenient auxiliary to registration. The same Returns inform us that though transmission by post has been so extensive for a number of years, not a single instance has occurred, throughout Scotland, of a deed intrusted to the Post Office for the purpose of transmission to the register having been lost, or even delayed for an hour. This is the result, although scarcely any of them have been registered at the Post Office, and although the great majority has been sent in book-post packets."

There was, therefore, good reason to believe that any process of registering deeds could be quite as efficiently performed by persons residing at a distance sending them through the post, as by sending them through the local register. As regarded expense and economy, there could be no doubt as to the difference between the present system and that now proposed. It had been suggested—he need hardly say without a shadow of foundation—that this proposition was really made in the interest of professional bodies in Edinburgh. It was difficult to meet a suggestion of this kind, but fortunately in this case he had the means of proving that it was entirely unfounded. The proposal did not originate in Edinburgh. It originated with the Procurators of Glasgow—a body of legal practitioners than whom none stood higher in Scotland; and to them the public would really be indebted in a great measure for this important improvement. In the year 1856, the Procurators of Glasgow took up the question of the state of the Register of Land Titles. They resolved upon a Report which he now held in his hand. In that Report they recommended the proposal for reform which was embodied in the present Bill. They considered the question whether the register should continue to be kept in Edinburgh or not, and they gave a very clear deliverance upon the subject. They said that the General and Particular

Registers as at present kept should be discontinued, and separate registers kept in Edinburgh for each county. They then went on to say—

"There appear many strong reasons for keeping all the county registers in Edinburgh. First, the principal part of the present registers are at present kept altogether in Edinburgh; second, all the register-books are at present sent in blank from Edinburgh, and when filled up are sent to Edinburgh, and these transmissions are attended with considerable official troubles and expense to the public; third, the keeping of all the registers at one place would tend to form and maintain a methodical and accurate general system of recording; fourth, there is a General Register House especially built for safety of records; and fifth, by the above arrangements, and those after proposed, all searches could be made at once, and in the same place, thereby saving much time and expense."

This was the Report of the Committee of the Faculty of Procurators of Glasgow, signed by twenty-three of the most eminent of that body—gentlemen not inferior to any body of professional men in Scotland, either with regard to the extent of their business, or to the extent of their knowledge. The general body of the Procurators, not content with adopting the Report unanimously, resolved that it should be printed, and copies of it transmitted to the Lord Advocate, to the different legal bodies, to the Members of Parliament for Scotland, and to other persons interested in the land registers of that country. He (the Lord Advocate) thought, therefore, that the suggestion that this was a novel and ill-considered project could scarcely be maintained. The result of this Report was that the project was taken up by the Lord Justice Clerk, who was at that time Dean of the Faculty of Advocates. That body appointed a Committee to consider the subject, and they reported clearly and strongly in favour of the proposal; and not only so, but the present Lord Justice Clerk, when he was Lord Advocate in 1858, introduced for the first time, into the commissions of those officials appointed, during his tenure of office, a clause to the effect that if those registers should be removed to Edinburgh, there would be no claim to compensation on the part of the holders of offices. No stronger testimony can be given to the views which the Lord Justice Clerk entertained on the subject. The Writers to the Signet did the same thing. Mr. Montgomery Bell, the Professor of Conveyancing in the University of Edinburgh, read a paper at the Social Science Congress at Glasgow in 1860, in which he gave the clearest and strongest opinion upon the same matter. The hon. and learned Member for Greenock (Mr. Dunlop) on more than one occasion in 1860 and 1861, asked whether he (the Lord Advocate) intended to legislate upon this matter of records. Although impressed with the desirableness of a change, at the same time he felt that it was a very important matter, which was, to some extent, a matter of practical detail. He did not think it would be safe to act in regard to a matter affecting interests so large and momentous without further inquiry; and therefore he suggested to the Government the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the whole matter, to examine the whole of the county registers, and to report their opinion upon the subject. Accordingly, two gentlemen of the greatest weight and distinction in the profession—Mr. Charles Morton, Writer to the Signet, and Mr. Andrew Bannatyne, now the head of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow—were appointed for that purpose, and they made a full and elaborate Report, in which they entirely and fully confirm in every particular the views expressed by the Procurators of Glasgow in 1856, followed, as they were, both by the Faculty of Advocates and by the Society of Writers to the Signet, and the Society of Solicitors before the Supreme Courts. In short, nothing could have been more fully or better considered than this proposal. It might be good, or it might be bad, but there was no ground for saying that it had been rashly or lightly submitted to the House. The Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow, although they commenced this important work, did not, however, appear to be inclined to finish it in the same spirit. They took up the Report of these Commissioners, who exactly confirmed the views which they held in 1856, and they reported again that they were quite clear that, in their opinion, the local registers should be brought to Edinburgh, but that one exception should be made, and that registers ought to be kept at Glasgow. That was a strong testimony to the general principle. As to the exception, it rested, in his opinion, on very slender ground. He would not detain the House by going into the matter, but he wished to suggest to those who take an interest in the subject, that in the Appendix to the Report of the Committee of Procurators they will find protests signed by a minority of the Committee—composed of names which with all acquainted with the profession in Glasgow would carry great weight, in which the proposal to make an exception of Glasgow was thoroughly and clearly answered. It was quite true that, since the Bill had been introduced, a petition had been presented to this House by the Procurators of Glasgow, in which they stated that they think the measure is objectionable, on the ground that it proposed to bring up the local registers to Edinburgh. The Procurators of Glasgow are a body of whom he wished to speak with the highest respect—indeed, he knew of no body of professional individuals more entitled to respect; but having proposed in 1856 this important measure, they had, on grounds which he (the Lord Advocate) could not appreciate, come to change their views in regard to the particular proposal which he now submitted to the House. To what extent that opinion prevailed he did not know, but he thought that the clear and dispassionate opinion of 1856, which was again repeated at the end of 1863, was the wisest and soundest opinion. He was not disposed to change his opinion in consequence of the petition which had been presented by the Procurators of Glasgow. He would make but two further observations. In the first place, it was said that it was not proposed to bring up the burgh registers. In the first place the burgh registers are not comprised in the Act of 1617. They were not brought up to Edinburgh. They stood upon an entirely different ground, and they could well and properly be dealt with separately, as was recommended by Professor Montgomery Bell and also by the Report of the Commissioners. There were matters in regard to the burgh records which might require attention; but it was desirable that they should be dealt with in a separate measure, and not mixed up with the county register. The second matter to which he wished to allude, was compensation to the holders of office. Without now expressing a general opinion on the subject, he might say that those who hold their offices without any clause to the effect that they were not entitled to compensation, might reasonably be compensated. His opinion was, that they ought to be compensated out of the fees that would be drawn under the new system. It would not be necessary to put hands into the pockets of the Treasury, who, indeed, drew £5,000 from the registers in Scotland. The matter may be fairly considered, and there would be plenty of money to defray any charges of the kind. It was not a money question. The object of the Bill was, that dealers in land, whether buyers or lenders, should have a good clear title at the least possible expense. There could be no other object. The object he was most anxious to accomplish he was satisfied never could be accomplished till there was this right registration, and he was certain that when that was done it would produce great economy, and that upon this still larger and more important reforms would be based.

MAJOR HAMILTON: The right hon. Gentleman has told us to-night that this Bill had been discussed at a meeting by most of the Members for Scotland. He ought also to have told them that that meeting was somewhat against the Bill. The fact, however, was, that the principal feeling of enmity to the Bill was that it had not been fairly discussed either in the House or in the public papers in Scotland. It had been desired that a Bill of this kind should have been brought forward before the county meetings of the 10th April, and it was therefore suggested to the right hon. Gentleman that he should postpone his Bill until they had had an opportunity of discussing it at their meetings. The right hon. Gentleman was not inclined to do so, but fairly stated that on moving the second reading of the Bill he would make a statement that might appear in the public papers, and be read all over Scotland. That statement he had now made, and he (Major Hamilton) begged to thank him for the pains he had taken. He was not himself in favour of the Bill, nor did he think that his constituents were; but as his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Ayrshire (Sir James Fergusson) had put an Amendment on the paper, and it was desirable that the Scotch Members should have a full opportunity of discussing the measure which could not be done at that hour of the night, he would beg to move that the debate be now adjourned.

MR. SMOLLETT: Sir, it is not my intention to make a long statement to the House. The Bill contains a great deal that is valuable, and I do not think that there is any great objection to it because it is unpalatable to certain local legal practitioners in Scotland. But my intention, in rising, is to say a few words upon the manner in which Scotch business is transacted in this House. When I first became a Member of the House I was told that the

Scotch business was conducted in a most admirable manner. It was said that Scotch business was dealt with in a manner that contrasted most favourably with the way in which Irish business was conducted, and with the rows that were constantly got up when any Irish business was before the House. Now, I think if Scotch Members allow themselves to be flattered by observations like these they will greatly deceive themselves. I think the way in which Scotch business is transacted is the most slovenly possible. In point of fact, the only person charged with the conduct of Scotch business in the House is the Lord Advocate of Scotland, and that learned Gentleman is, as his name imports, a practising barrister—often in very large practice; and I believe the present Lord Advocate is the leader of the Scottish bar. We never see the right hon. Gentleman in his place in the House till after Easter, or at least very seldom, unless he wishes to be present in some Ministerial party division. The consequence is, that no business of any importance is brought forward in the early part of the Session; and if any important business connected with Scotland is introduced at the latter part of the year, it is slurred over in a very unsatisfactory manner, as is shown by the debate going on this morning at half past one o'clock—the only debate, too, that has taken place on Scotch business in the present Session of Parliament. Now, in my opinion, there is no part of Her Majesty's dominions that requires more reform than the ancient and loyal kingdom of Scotland. We have courts of law in Scotland called Courts of Session, but they are so strangely constituted, their proceedings are carried on in such unintelligible jargon, and the Courts themselves are fenced about with forms so obsolete, expensive, and dilatory, that they are obstructions to, and not courts of, justice. Scotland is full of legal sinecures. We have some local Courts in Scotland. They are called Sheriffs' Courts; and of these we are somewhat proud, but we feel that they are incumbered with a double set of Judges. The Sheriff's Substitute performs all the duties, and he sits throughout the year hearing and deciding cases; the Sheriff Depute, often the less competent Judge of the two, revising and reversing the judgments in appeal. Then we want a sweeping reform of the Scotch law of marriage, of the law of domicile, of the law of inheritance. Last year we had a Bill in this House to correct the procedure of the Courts of Session, but the Bill was not pressed forward with zeal—it was withdrawn, and, I believe, was not introduced again this Session. If it be introduced, I am quite sure it will be emasculated, and will be found utterly worthless, because the Minister for Scotland is the Lord Advocate. He is a legal practitioner, and if he brought in any Bill that would really do away with all the sinecure offices in Scotland, and put the Courts on a good footing, it would be torn into pieces by the practitioners who benefit by the present system. We have these measures discussed at the meetings of the Social Science Association in Edinburgh, and I believe the Lord Advocate takes a great part in these meetings, but they are never discussed in this House. In lieu of such proposals, we have a Fish Teinds Bill, we are threatened with a discussion upon the Law of Hypothec, we have a Rivers Pollution Bill, and such small matters as might, in my belief, be just as well deferred to the Greek Kalends. What ought to be done to remedy this state of things? We ought to have a Minister for Scotland who is not a practising barrister. And unless we have some remedy of this nature, we never shall have any of those great measures of practical reform which Scotland requires, and which her Members ask and imperatively demand. I beg to second the Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Amendment proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Major Hamilton.)

THE LORD ADVOCATE: I think I am entitled on the Motion which the hon. Gentleman has made to say a few words in reply to, perhaps, the not very relevant, but not the less important speech of the hon. Member for Dumbarton. I quite admit that our plan of conducting business in this House is very different from that he would have us adopt, and the hon. Gentleman has set the good example of the new mode of procedure which he would recommend. On this, which is a very important Bill, relating to a very important subject—a subject that is as important as any of those law reforms which he wishes to see undertaken—the hon. Gentleman has chosen to introduce every topic which has nothing to do with it—everything which is not concerning the matter before the House; and I suppose that his method of conducting Scotch business in this House is to have important debates conducted in such manner as is suggested by his speech. He seems to be under the delusion that he is speaking on Friday night and not on Monday night, and that the Motion which stands in the name of the hon. and gallant Member for Ayrshire (Sir James Fergusson), for Friday, is the Motion now before the House. He will have an opportunity, when that Motion comes on, of expressing his opinion upon these matters. But let me put the hon. Gentleman right. He says, that since he came into Parliament, I have never been in my place till after Easter. In that he is entirely under a mistake and a delusion. There has not been a single Session of Parliament in which I have not attended in my place before Easter—there has hardly been a single Session in which I have not been here in the second week of the Session and remained until Easter. If there have been occasions when that has not been the case, they have only been when there was little public business to do, and I have thought that I might, without impropriety, remain in Scotland. In regard to the general mode in which Scotch business has been conducted, I venture to say that during the last ten years the measures that have been passed for Scotland have been as important, well considered, and successful as any of those for any other part of the United Kingdom. I am not going now to enter into them. If the hon. Gentleman had wished, he could have informed himself of the facts. What does he want us to do? I am happy to say that the censure he has bestowed upon me he has broadly and impartially scattered. There is not an institution, scarcely an officer, of Scotland that has not fallen under the lash of the hon. Member. The Court of Session, he says, is useless; the Sheriff's Court is bad; the law of marriage ought to be reformed. I would suggest to the hon. Gentleman, since he holds these strong opinions, he, as an independent Member of Parliament, perhaps might lay upon the table Bills upon the miscellaneous subjects which might carry out the views he has expressed.

THE LAW OF HYPOTHEC.

LORD BROUGHAM begged their Lordships' attention to a petition signed by 1,200 or 1,300 tenant farmers, corn merchants, and cattle dealers in the county of Kincardine, complaining most justly of the law of Hypothec in Scotland. There the landlord had a right to seize for his unpaid rent not only the crop upon the ground, but after it had been sold and paid for, or to make the bond fide purchaser of it repay him the price. This law had come before their Lordships in 1830, soon after he (Lord Brougham) entered this House, and a case had been decided on appeal in which Lord Dalhousie was the respondent. His noble Friend had, by the sentence of the Court of Session, been adjudged entitled to obtain his unpaid rent from a corn merchant who had purchased his tenant's crop in the market; he had bought by sample, and not by bulk, and therefore he was held liable to repay the price to the landlord for his unpaid rent, though it was not pretended that he had been aware of the rent being in arrear. This was deemed so intolerable a state of things that his noble Friend, Lord Wynford, and himself, had endeavoured to obtain a change of it, but failed in two Bills they had presented. These petitions now prayed for the amendment of the law, which they represented as the remains of the old state of things in feudal times, when the lord cultivated his land by bondsmen or serfs, and did not let it to tenants.

PENAL SERVITUDE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 23.)—SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I do not know whether, in considering the second reading of this Bill, your Lordships will be disposed to discuss the general principles which ought to guide us in legislating on the subject of secondary punishments; but it will probably be convenient that in moving the second reading I should, in the first instance, explain shortly what are its provisions. They are not complicated, but are, on the contrary, of a very simple character. Except with regard to two of its clauses, I believe the Bill to be founded exclusively upon the recommendations of the Commission which, as your Lordships are aware, was composed of very eminent men, and who devoted so much time and consideration to this subject last year. Although I am quite sure your Lordships will exercise your independent judgment as to the provisions of this measure, yet at the same time I cannot help feeling that you will view with considerable favour recommendations which emanate from the Commissioners, and which have also received the sanction of the House of Commons. I will refer in the first place to those recommendations of the Commissioners which have not been carried out. The first clause contains only the short title of the Bill. The second clause makes it impossible for the Judges to sentence a prisoner to less than five years of penal servitude. This was not a recommendation of the Commissioners. They were of opinion that the system of transportation to Western Australia which is now in existence should not only be continued, but be augmented; and, although their recommendation was accompanied by many restrictions and limitations, which he believed were not well understood either in this country or in the colonies, its practical effect would have been to about double the number of convicts sent out to Western Australia. Subsequently to the Report of the Commission, the Government received from the Australian colonies an expression of opinion which they thought it impossible to resist. The Commissioners themselves were not aware of the strong feeling which existed in the colonies on this subject.

EARL GREY: On the contrary, we had the fullest information.

EARL GRANVILLE: I do not think it is possible that the Commission could have been fully aware of the feeling which exists in the colonies; and I am confirmed in my view by the change of opinion which took place in one of the noble Earl's Colleagues upon the Question, for I cannot but believe that this change was brought about by the strong feeling afterwards expressed in the colonies with respect to transportation. It was impossible not to deny the existence of this feeling. From each of the Australian Colonies, except Western Australia, there came the strongest remonstrances. One Governor after another wrote home. There were meetings of intercolonial delegates, representing the Legislatures of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania, all unanimously praying that the stain of convictism should be removed from them. The Governors all bore testimony that this was the feeling not of one class only, but of all classes of the community; and that there existed the utmost anxiety and alarm on the subject. I do not say that a good deal of that feeling was not unfounded; but I do say that it is an unwise thing for Governments, in dealing with large communities, to disregard a strong and a universal feeling, founded upon what all must acknowledge to be a very honourable and creditable sentiment. As regards transportation itself, no doubt your Lordships would desire to get rid by its means of our criminal classes if we could do so; and there was a time when transportation was very effectual, because it was regarded with greater dread than any other punishment; but when we remember our own extreme anxiety to get rid of our convicts, we must, I think, admit that it is not unnatural that the colonists should feel excited by even the remote danger of being inundated again by these men, either before they had finished their time, or after they had served their full sentence. These are the considerations which induced the Government, with the approbation of some of the most eminent members of the Commission, to give up the proposed extension of transportation to Western Australia. At the same time, they did not yield to that which they thought unreasonable on the part of the colonists, for they believed it to be only fair and just towards Western Australia, which had been saved from ruin as a colony by convict labour, to continue the supply of that labour which the colony now receives. Having determined on this alteration, it became absolutely necessary to reduce the minimum of sentences of penal servitude from seven years, as recommended by the Commission, to five years. Except this clause and the fourth clause, the principal object of which is to insist upon a monthly report of the ticket-of-leave man to the police, I believe all the rest of the Bill strictly accords with the recommendations of the Commission. The fourth clause was not originally in the Government Bill, but was inserted owing to the strong feeling which existed in the other House of Parliament. The third clause relates to offences committed in convict prisons, and for the better maintenance of discipline empowers two justices, acting upon the warrant of the Secretary of State, to deal with those offences on the spot, and to order the infliction of corporal punishment. A very important recommendation of the Commissioners is adopted in the fifth clause, relating to offences committed by the holder of a ticket-of-leave; and it is provided that if he fails to produce his license when required, or breaks any of the other conditions of his license by an act which is not of itself punishable either upon indictment or upon summary conviction, in that case he shall be subject to summary punishment for not more than three months. There is also a clause providing that the police shall be able to apprehend without a warrant the holder of a license reasonably suspected of having committed any offence, or broken the conditions of his license. The next clause describes the procedure by which a summary punishment shall be inflicted; and the eighth clause provides that a certificate of this summary conviction shall be forwarded to the Secretary of State. The ninth clause is one of considerable importance, and relates to the revocation of tickets-of-leave. It provides that where any forfeiture or revocation takes place in consequence of a re-conviction, the holder shall, after undergoing the punishment to which he may have been sentenced for the new offence, be condemned further to undergo the term of penal servitude which remained unexpired when his license was granted. The last clause is an unimportant one. Having gone through the provisions of the Bill, it will probably be convenient that I should reserve further observations until I see what turn the discussion takes, and can afford what further information the House may require.

LORD HOUGHTON: My Lords, I rise, with your Lordships' permission, to make a few remarks upon this Bill, and I feel I shall require additional indulgence from your Lordships, because, though I am inclined to view with disfavour certain provisions of the Bill, I do not intend to oppose it in its integrity. The Bill has come from the Lower House, and carries with it not only the authority of that House, but also the high authority of the Commission of eminent persons who were appointed to consider this subject. I agree that in the main the measure may be treated as carrying out the recommendations of the Commission. There is one point to which, no doubt, your Lordships will be inclined to give much attention—namely, with regard to the propriety of continuing or discontinuing transportation; but upon this point I shall not think it necessary to trouble your Lordships with any remarks. I believe the abandonment of the system of transportation to be one of the greatest social misfortunes which have ever fallen upon this nation, and I am bound to say that, having given my best attention to this subject, I cannot but feel that the policy of this country with reference to this question has been guided in a very false direction. I am afraid, however, that the question has now become one of sheer necessity, and that it is of no use to irritate our great colonies any further, for the mere chance of keeping on a few convicts for a year or two longer. You have placed yourselves in a difficulty from which you will find it impossible to extricate yourselves, and must take the consequences. But there is another question of very great importance involved in the Bill, and to this I desire to call your Lordships' attention—the manner in which we are to treat those unhappy persons who are furnished with what are called tickets-of-leave. The ticket-of-leave system is a sort of imitation of the licenses which were formerly given to the convicts in the colonies, who were furnished with them as a means of establishing themselves in service in different parts of the colony. This system has to some extent been applied to the convicts in this country; but the circumstances are entirely different, for the convicts had the means of obtaining employment in the colonies which they did not possess in this country. I remember that Chief Justice Earle before a Committee of the House of Commons expressed his concurrence in the ticket-of-leave system, because he regarded it as a means of encouraging hope in the mind of the convict; and he added that if the convict were deprived of hope he would be reft of the very foundation of all moral improvement. If, then, one of the grounds for granting tickets-of-leave be a desire to assist the convict to an honest livelihood, surely it is very unreasonable to place so many difficulties in the way of his procuring employment as are contemplated by this Bill. The provisions of this Act will really place him in a much worse position than he was before. If the ticket-of-leave were contemplated as a means of furnishing a convict with the opportunity of earning an honest livelihood, it is surely unfair to place him in a position fraught with such constant mental anxiety, and such unceasing trouble in procuring employment, that it would have been far better both for him and the country if he had never had a ticket granted him at all. There is one provision of the Bill which appears to me so utterly objectionable that, if my views find the least favour with your Lordships, I shall take the liberty of dividing upon it in Committee. I refer to the police supervision contemplated by the Act. Up to this time, I believe, there has existed no real provision of the law by which any man can be ordered to place himself under the supervision of the police. The police have hitherto represented the vigilance of the law, their duty has been to act as the preventors or detectors of crime. But it will be an entirely novel system to enact that a man shall voluntarily present himself to the police and declare that he is a criminal. I trust that your Lordships will agree with me in thinking that this is a principle which in many respects runs counter to the tenour of the institutions of this country. It must be remembered, too, that the police are empowered to arrest any ticket-of-leave man without a warrant. This is a provision to which I cannot but object. The law in this respect appears to me to be defective. What provision is there against mistaken identity? I think that the position in which the ticket-of-leave men will be placed by this Act is a very grave one. The power which the Act proposes to place in the hands of the police is one which will not in every instance be wielded by men equal in character and discretion to those employed in the metropolis, who have besides vigilant and intelligent officers at their head. The power will also be committed to the police of the manufacturing towns and the rural police who cannot be expected to have the same intelligence, or to be amenable to the same discipline. The result must be very disastrous to the liberated convict. After he has surmounted the difficulty of obtaining some honest employment, and had got a chance of regaining his social position, he will have to ask a periodical holiday for the purpose of presenting himself to the police; and he will thus be compelled to declare himself unfit for the new social sphere in which he is moving. It is true that a somewhat similar system has been successfully adopted in Ireland. But there is a great difference between the circumstances in which it is applied in the two countries. There is not in England, as there is in Ireland, an intermediate prison, where the convict finds temporary employment; and, above all, we must remember that in Ireland the law is not regarded as it is in this country. The law is there looked upon as the enemy of the honest man. There is an entire absence of that superstitious reverence with which the law is regarded in England; and, though the crimes against property in Ireland are fewer in proportion to the population than they are in England, the fact of a man's being a criminal is not received with so much disfavour; he is not placed under the same social ban, and there is much less objection to afford him employment after the term of his imprisonment has expired. I have gone over the Commissioners' Report, and I certainly can see no ground for the assertion that the reformatory system has failed. We are told in that Report that in proportion to the increased population crime has decreased. We are also told there that no evils have followed the adoption of the milder system. A more deterrent system has been tried and has not succeeded, and it became necessary to adopt some other plan. Therefore, it was that the reformatory system has been established in this country. I believe the principle of reformation, moderately and judiciously applied, not in a spirit of false and sentimental extravagance, will be found the most suitable for the treatment of prisoners.

LORD CRANWORTH said, he regretted that the Government had found it necessary to abandon that part of the Commissioners' Report which related to transportation. At the same time, he could not agree that the Commissioners had before them all the information which the Government afterwards obtained. One great element of transportation, which made it formerly a valuable mode of punishment, was now wanting—its deterring quality. There could be no doubt transportation had been the best system for this country, for the convict himself and also for the colonies, as it offered the greatest opportunity to the convict to reform his habits; but, on the other hand, he agreed that the feeling of dislike with which it was regarded by the colonists of many colonies rendered its continuance difficult if not impossible. In this country, where there was almost a glut of labour, it must be in a high degree difficult for a man once tainted with the mark of a convict to re-establish himself; but there had been no such difficulty in the colonies, where, owing to the vast extent of territory over which the population was scattered, labour was so much in demand. Transportation, however, being now impossible, the Commissioners had to consider the best substitute. The Lord Chief Justice had taken a view which the other Commissioners had very carefully considered, but had not been able to adopt. Objections had been made to the element of uncertainty involved in a system of remissions of portions of sentences; but by the law as it stood, upon certain conditions being fulfilled, a convict was entitled to certain remissions of his sentence. The question was whether that was a right principle to act upon, and he could not but think that it had been found useful. All the evidence went to show that a criminal suffering a long period of punishment could not be kept to habits of industry if he was deprived of hope, and he could have no hope to influence him but the expectation of a diminution of the term of his punishment. That fact, too, was important, because it showed that those who complained that penal servitude had no terrors were mistaken. If the punishment in itself had no terrors, there would be no strong desire to shorten the period of its duration. It was true that one or two cases were mentioned in which persons had committed offences expressly for the purpose of being sentenced to penal servitude ; but those were idiosyncrasies with which it was impossible to deal. The great bulk of the criminal classes had a strong distaste for penal servitude, and therefore to that extent it had a deterrent influence. Then came the question, What should be the position of a man sentenced to a long period of punishment ? The Commissioners proposed that, for the first nine or twelve months, the convict should be kept almost entirely in a state of solitary confinement, and that afterwards he should be sent to Chatham, or Portland, or other places where he could be set to hard work. The recommendation of the Commissioners was not at all to diminish the period of punishment on account of good behaviour in prison. Bad conduct in prison could be punished. Their recommendation was that a certain number of marks should be allotted to each convict for every day of his punishment, so that if he continued to work industriously he might, upon obtaining a certain number of marks, also obtain a remission of part of his period of punishment. He believed that the practice of working hard and perseveringly for two or three years, with the hope of remission in view, was the most likely means of engendering industrious habits, and of giving to the convict a chance of setting himself right with the world after his release. Then came the question, whether a man ought to be allowed to leave the prison free or upon what was called a ticket-of-leave ? He could not see that with proper management there would be any difficulty in retaining a hold upon a man during the remainder of his term of punishment which had been remitted. He quite agreed that if the ticket-of-leave holder was required to report himself every month to the police, injurious consequences might follow. A man could not long comply with that regulation without his position becoming known. In Ireland, the ticket-of-leave holders in the metropolitan district reported themselves, not to the police, but to an officer connected with the convict establishment. That establishment possessed a remarkably intelligent officer, Mr. Organ, who had applied himself with great energy to improving the habits and position of the discharged prisoners. The Commissioners recommended that to an officer of the convict establishment some kind of control over released prisoners should be given. With the objection taken by his noble Friend (Lord Houghton) to the power given to a policeman to arrest, without warrant, a ticket-of-leave holder who violated any of the restrictions imposed by his licence, he could not concur. His noble Friend said that such a power was un-English ; but that really was not so. At present, a policeman could arrest, without a warrant, any person whom he might see committing a breach of the law. Upon the whole, he hoped the Bill would be found useful, and he should give his support to the second reading.

LORD TAUNTON said, he entirely concurred in the adoption by the Government of the recommendation of the Commission, not to extend the present system of transportation to Western Australia. He had always felt great anxiety on the subject of transportation, and its effect upon the relations of the colonies with the mother country. When connected with the colonies some years ago, he became aware how universal was the feeling in the colonies against the system, and he knew that the extent of that feeling was very much underrated by many public men in this country. He always dreaded that the system might become a source of collision, and produce the most unhappy results. It was not at all surprising to him that, when the appointment of the Commission became known, the colonists not only of Australia but of the Cape of Good Hope made the most solemn and urgent representations against any extension of the system of transportation. It was useless to say that this was an unreasonable feeling. In his opinion it was not an unreasonable feeling, but one founded on the most honourable principles of human nature. It was a feeling in which every one of their Lordships would have participated if they had been placed in Australia or at the Cape instead of in England. No one who had looked into the subject could doubt that society in Australia had been deeply tainted by the employment of convict labour, to which it was the fashion to ascribe their prosperity. He had recently received a letter from an eminent man, formerly the Governor of one of our colonies, in which he expressed the deepest anxiety as to the course which Parliament might pursue on the subject. It was looked upon by the colonists as a point of honour as well as a point of interest to prevent any extension of the system of transportation. They said it did not matter whether the number of convicts proposed to be sent out amounted 10 or 10,000—they would have none of them. It was the same principle as that which formerly actuated the American colonists, when they denied the right of this country to tax them without their consent. Unfortunately the Government of that day persisted in their policy, and thus gave rise to the War of Independence, and to the separation of the colonies from this country. The people of Australia were loyal and attached to this country, but only on this condition—that we should not attempt to put upon them the great insult, as well as great injury of making them convict settlements. It would be a great injustice to these colonies to attempt to extend the principle over so vast a continent as that of Australia. It was a question of feeling with the colonies, for if convicts were sent there they would find their way all over Western Australia. In order to prevent that, they had passed Bills which were most unconstitutional in their provisions, and in those Bills we had acquiesced rather than enter into a quarrel with them on a matter of that kind. What occurred at the Cape of Good Hope should be a warning to us. His noble Friend on the crossbenches (Earl Grey) must remember what took place at the Cape when he was Secretary for the Colonies. Nothing could be more violent than the conduct of the people. They would not allow any communication with the ship, or any provisions to be supplied, because she had a few convicts on board; and their refusal was supported by the principal of the colonists. This was a sufficient proof how strong was the feeling of the colonists on this subject. He had received communications from which it appeared that the system of bush-ranging was breaking out again in Australia, and this was ascribed to the old convict blood. The colonies were a valuable possession of the British Crown, and it would be madness to adopt any system which would lessen the affection they entertained towards this country. Therefore, he held that so far from yielding to an unreasonable clamour, the Government would have been inexcusable if they had not respected the universal, deep, honest, well reasoned feeling of the colonies on the only point in which we could have a quarrel with them—the extension of the convict system. He entertained very strong feelings on the subject, and he considered himself bound in duty to the colonists to express it on this occasion.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I am not about to enter on the subject of transportation, although the observations of almost every speaker have been chiefly directed to that question. I certainly do not agree with all that has fallen from the noble Lord opposite, and am very much disposed to dispute the analogy which has been drawn between the state of feeling in America in regard to taxation, and that which is stated to exist in Australia in relation to transportation. So far from there being a universal concurrence of opinion in opposition to it, I must remind the noble Lord that at the time he was Colonial Secretary the district of Moreton Bay (now the colony of Queensland) petitioned for an increase of convicts. But putting aside the subject of transportation, the questions raised by this Bill, and the principles embodied in it are so large and important, that they ought to be discussed by themselves. There are, indeed, several modes in which the discharge of a prisoner can be effected, but the chief rival and antagonist theory to the principle embodied in the Bill may be briefly expressed thus—short, sharp, and certain sentences—the system, in fact, advocated by the Lord Chief Justice in his memorandum. If, indeed, this were the only alternative I should not shrink from giving my voice in favour of that principle; justice must be done, and society must be protected, and I have certainly no sympathy with that sentimentalism which shrinks from inflicting a due measure of punishment upon a criminal who may have inflicted great injury on society. But at the same time I feel very loth, without good and clear reason, to strike off from the system of penal administration that most important branch of it which looks, not merely to correction and punishment, but also to the reformation of criminals. I agree in many of the remarks that have fallen from the noble and learned Lord (Lord Craaworth). There have been, no doubt, three causes which led to the failure of our penal system. First, there were certain elements wanting which ought to be there, and these, I believe, are embodied in this Bill. In the second place there were certain conditions essential to its success, and these conditions will be enforced by this Bill. The third and last cause was the unfortunate course of action taken on the one side by many of the Judges, and by the Home Secretary on the other. The Judges availed themselves too frequently of their power of passing short sentences, and showed a leniency towards criminals hardly compatible with the protection of society. Coupled with that there was so much uncertainty, so much vacillation, and so much misplaced tenderness evinced towards great and notorious criminals on the part of the Home Secretary, that crime received a fresh impulse in this country. These three causes led to the breaking down of the present system. Now, this Bill comes before your Lordships in a very different state from that in which it was originally presented to Parliament; and it is not so much to find fault with what has been done by the Government as for the right understanding of the question that I wish to advert briefly to the form of the Bill when first introduced into the other House. In the first place there was then altogether wanting from the measure the clause alluded to by my noble Friend opposite, providing for a regular police supervision of ticket-of-leave holders. The omission of that provision would, in its effects, have been very injurious to society, and most cruel towards the convict himself. There was, indeed, when the Bill was brought into the other House by Sir George Grey, a proposal that the convict on his discharge from prison should report himself within seven days to the police station of his district, but after that time all supervision over him should cease. Therefore the Government had no right to condemn the principle of supervision in toto. Their proposal, however, was founded on an impossible compromise between a system of supervision and no supervision, and on the assumption that the police, from this single visit of the convict, would be able to know and identify him in case he relapsed into crime; although, at the same time, there was no sort of machinery provided for carrying that supervision into practical effect. Under those circumstances one of two things was certain. Such a limited amount of supervision as that would either have been nominal or real. If only nominal it would have provided nothing better than the existing system which has broken down, and would have held out more and more hope of impunity to the convict by discharging him without any actual check or restraint hanging over him. But another and a still more serious result would be, that the police, conscious of the indirect responsibility you were placing upon them, by making the convict report himself to them once, would very soon have turned the nominal supervision into a real one; and it would then have become not a direct, legitimate, and authorized supervision exercised by responsible persons, but would have degenerated into the most mischievous and pernicious of all forms of espionage. The policeman having seen the convict once immediately after his discharge, and knowing that he would be held responsible for identifying him if he should relapse into crime, would have dogged his steps, set about making inquiries as to his residence, his habits, and his occupation, and raised every sort of suspicion against him in his neighbourhood in a way that would have debarred him from honest employment. This has been remedied by the Amendment which has been introduced in the House of Commons. But this is not all. In the schedule of this Bill, as originally drawn, the ticket-of-leave holder was strictly prohibited from emigrating. I have nothing now to say against that proposal in itself; but I may observe that in the papers laid on our table relating to penal servitude there is to be found an expression of Sir G. Grey's willingness to give a bonus of £3 for every prisoner dealt with by the Discharged Convicts' Aid Societies. Now, those societies are, I believe, among the most valuable institutions in the country; but they represent themselves and quite truly in all their annual reports as being dependent upon emigration for the success of their operations. Here, then, you have the Government placing themselves in a very anomalous position. By the Bill, as originally drawn, they were seeking to prohibit by legislation the emigration of ticket-of-leave holders, and, at the same time, they were ready to supply money to a society the avowed object of which is to provide such persons with the means of emigrating. There is another point in regard to which the Bill, as first introduced, was not only powerless to do good, but most powerful to do mischief. If there be any part of our penal system which is more free from defects than any other, it is the Irish system. But so inconsiderately and imperfectly was this measure constructed, that one of its first results, if passed into law, would have been to destroy a most valuable portion of the Irish system. The license proposed to be enacted was of such a nature that all those female refuges which have been carried on in Ireland with such success would have absolutely been closed, and it was only by introducing another clause into the Bill that that difficulty was overcome. Such was the position of the Bill as originally proposed. Since then it has undergone material changes, some of which are great improvements. I was sorry to hear the noble Lord (Lord Houghton) express an opinion so hostile to police supervision. There has been so much misapprehension on that subject that I desire to make it as clear to your Lordships as I think it is to myself. The noble Lord said one effect of this police supervision would be that it would oblige the ticket-of-leave holder to get a holiday from his employer in order to go and report himself. Let any one look carefully at the words of the clause, and I defy him to put such a construction on them as has been done this evening. The words are that the prisoner is

"Subsequently to report himself once in each month, at such time and place, in such manner, and to such person as the chief officer of such station shall require."

This language gives the widest possible latitude for the exercise of this power. I admit that it is a great and delicate power to intrust to the chief constable; but it may be so exercised as in no possible case to entail any hardship. The police authorities would obtain their knowledge of a man's residence, habits, and employment in fifty different ways—through the instrumentality of the Discharged Prisoners Aid Society, through the agency of the clergyman of the parish, by means of communication with his master. I do not, indeed, see why the communication should, in most cases, be a personal one; and I should hope the result would be in many instances, that the chief constable would feel himself justified in requesting the Home Secretary to advise the Crown to issue a free pardon. That practice has been followed with the best results in Ireland, and it is obvious that a free pardon so obtained would be a great reward to the man himself, and a great inducement to others. But I am not defending police supervision on abstract grounds, or with merely theoretical arguments; on the contrary, I can appeal to facts and precedents which are within the cognizance of the whole country. Every one admits that the Irish branch of the system works well. Now, the Irish plan is based upon police supervision, and, so far as it has gone, the employers of labour in Ireland, as a general rule, not only prefer to have police supervision, but would decline to accept the services of ticket-of-leave men if that supervision were not to exist. Let me mention another remarkable fact bearing on this point. A few years ago there was an application made by some large contractors in England to the Irish Department for a supply of ticket-of-leave labour; but the application was accompanied with the stipulation that the holders of the tickets-of-leave while in England should be subjected to the supervision of the police. In consequence of that stipulation the application broke down, for the Home Secretary was not disposed to make any concession in that direction. But what I have stated shows, first of all, the ready disposition of large employers of labour in England to accept the services of ticket-of-leave men; and, next, the common sense view which men of business entertain that such men would work better and more safely if they were subjected to the supervision of the police. It has been said, in the course of the debate, that the police are not the proper persons to execute this duty, and a suggestion has been thrown out with respect to the formation of a department something analogous to that which exists in Ireland. I have little objection to the formation of such a department in England except on the score of expense; but, on a further opportunity, I should be prepared to maintain and to show again by facts and precedents, that the police are not only the best persons to discharge the duty, but are absolutely the only persons competent to perform it, always, of course, under proper control and subject to proper regulations. Substantially, therefore, I approve the Bill as it now stands, and I trust it will pass through the remaining stages unimpaired on any material point. There are, no doubt, certain amendments which I think might be inserted with advantage in Committee; but as to the main principle of the Bill, I believe it is correct. As it stands, the Bill constitutes a great, important, and beneficial alteration of our system of penal administration, especially when joined with those extensive changes which the Home Secretary has sanctioned within the walls of prisons. But I deeply regret that while the Home Secretary was initiating important changes in the penal administration of the country, he should have done so with almost expressions of hostility on his part—that the Bill, in fact, appeared to have been wrung out and extorted from the right hon. Gentleman. No doubt objections may be stated to any measure of the kind; but I venture respectfully to tell the Government that, in carrying through this Bill, and in giving practical effect to it afterwards, the country will hold them responsible for seeing that it has had fair play and justice done to it.

EARL GREY: My Lords, it is my intention to support the second reading of this Bill, inasmuch as, with all its defects, it will, undoubtedly, be an improvement on the existing laws. But I am bound to say that I cannot regard it as so satisfactory as it ought to have been. Among the minor objections to it one of the chief is, that it contains no provision for subjecting those, who may be called professional thieves, to a more lengthened punishment than persons of a different character convicted of like offences. No fact has been more clearly established by evidence and experience than that persons who betake themselves early in life to thieving as a profession are never withdrawn from it except by some prolonged and very severe punishment. It was upon that account the Commissioners recommended that some arrangement should be made to insure a longer punishment for these persons; and I think it a great defect of the present Bill that it proposes nothing of the kind. Again, I concur with the noble Lord (Lord Houghton) who objected to the terms of the clause with respect to the supervision of released criminals. I am strongly of opinion that a criminal discharged on a ticket-of-leave ought to be kept under strict control; but still I entertain serious objections to the clause in its present shape, and I trust it will be amended in Committee. My only other minor objection is that it seems to me the Bill ought to have cleared up the question, on which there is now a great deal of doubt, as the legality of the emigration of ticket-of-leave men. Some persons of great knowledge and authority are of opinion that under the law, as it stands, ticket-of-leave holders cannot legally leave this country. Whether they are entitled to do so or not is a question of great importance, and one which ought to be decided one way or another. But the main objection I take to the Bill is, that it substitutes a period of five for seven years as the minimum term of penal servitude. If there was one point more clearly established by the evidence taken before the Commission than another, it was that the early return of convicts to the places where they have committed their crimes is one of the greatest sources of evil, and has contributed, probably more than any other single cause, to the increase of crimes. As far as I remember there was not a single witness examined before the Commission who expressed the slightest doubt upon that subject. In the first place, the early return of criminals who have been sentenced to penal servitude to their usual haunts, has the effect of throwing upon the public a class of men who have practically no other resource to obtain a living but stealing; who are, no doubt, taught caution by the punishment they have undergone, but who are compelled to resume their old habit of preying upon society. But worse than that, the early return to their former haunts of men known to have been sentenced to penal servitude has done more than anything else to break down the fear of punishment among the unconvicted criminal class. The latter do not know the severe hardships which the convicted criminal has undergone in the penal establishment, but they see a man who had been convicted of a serious offence return in three or four years to his old place of abode, and they are apt to say to themselves, "Well, if the worst comes to the worst, it is not so very bad after all; we shall soon return home, as many have done before us." More than that, it has been clearly shown by evidence, that returned convicts are often the corruptors of the young and their instructors in crime. Shut out in a great degree from honest employment, the chief resource of the old criminals is to seduce the young into crime, in order that they may live on the produce of their misdeeds. For these reasons it appeared to the Commission that one of the main evils of the present system was that it enabled convicts so speedily to return to their former haunts.

The Bill in its present form will effect a comparatively slight change in that respect. As the law stands, the great majority of convicts are sentenced to three or four years' penal servitude, which it is in their power, by industry and good conduct, to reduce, in the one case by six, in the other by nine months remission. On the average they are actually in confinement for about three years. It is now proposed that the minimum sentence should be five years, of which nine months are to be passed in separate confinement, and the remainder in penal labour on public works, the convict having the opportunity of gaining a remission of a quarter of the time he is liable to serve on public works by industry and good conduct. A convict, therefore, who is sentenced to five years' penal servitude, after passing nine months in separate confinement, will be sent to labour on public works for four years and three months, with the power of earning by industry a remission of one-fourth (or rather more than a year) of this time. Hence the evil to which I have referred will remain much as it is now, since the only difference will be that the convict will be able to return to his former place of abode in rather less than four years after his conviction, instead of three years after it, as at present. The Commissioners proposed instead of this that seven years should be the minimum term, with a further recommendation, the effect of which would practically have been to withdraw the majority of convicts permanently from this country. They proposed that all convicts, if not disqualified, should be ultimately removed to Western Australia, and there receive their discharge on ticket-of-leave. Experience proves that of those sent in this manner to the colonies a very small percentage ever return to this country. It is difficult to overrate the advantage of thus permanently removing criminals from this country; and there is, in my opinion, little doubt that the present increase of crimes is in a great degree to be attributed to the fact, that so many more convicts are now discharged at home than formerly. In the last two or three years there has been a marked increase in the prevalence of crime. I do not mean to say that there has been an increase of crimes in the present time as compared to a somewhat distant period. On the contrary, if we look back twenty or thirty years, there had doubtless been a perceptible and gratifying diminution of crime. It would, indeed, have been very extraordinary if this had not been the case, considering how many causes of improvement are now in operation. In the first place, there has been the establishment of a well organized police throughout the country. Then there has been the general establishment of reformatories. Besides this there has been a much wider diffusion of education than formerly, and that, too, of a superior quality. And, above all, there has been a marked improvement in the general welfare and condition of the people, arising mainly from the increased demand for labour. These were changes tending greatly to the diminution of crime. But it does not appear to me that the improvement has been nearly so great as it ought to have been, and the Returns before us clearly prove that in the last two or three years there has been a marked increase of crimes of a serious character. And it is not a little significant that this late increase of crime is coincident, in point of time, with the discharge from penal servitude of the earliest prisoners subjected to the short sentences authorized by the Act of 1857. That is a confirmation of the opinion that the early release of convicts and their speedy return to their former places of abode constitute a great evil. The Commissioners, in recommending that the minimum sentence of penal servitude should be seven years, contemplated, as I have said, the transportation of the great majority of convicts to West Australia, where they would receive tickets-of-leave. The Government have, as it appears, been induced to adopt the five years' limit, instead of that of seven which was recommended, because they have resolved not to follow the other recommendation as to the general removal of convicts from this country. And if the latter proposal is to be abandoned, there is, I own, much to be said in favour of rejecting the other also, and making the minimum sentence five instead of seven years, because there would, no doubt, be a serious objection to retaining convicts for that longer period under punishment, or with tickets-of-leave, at home. The question as to what ought to be the length of the sentence depends on whether convicts are or are not to be sent to Western Australia. As far as this country is concerned, it is not, I believe, denied that the advantage to be gained by their removal is obvious and substantial. We relieve ourselves by it from a class of persons who are dangerous in themselves and demoralizing to others. The advantages to the criminals themselves appears to me to be equally clear. The condition of a discharged convict in England is cruel and painful in the extreme. While debarred from nearly every means of earning an honest livelihood, he is surrounded by temptations almost irresistible. He is most probably a person of strong passions, and has been deprived of all indulgence for several years. He finds himself on his release among his old associates in vice, ready to seduce him into his old practices, with public-houses inviting him with open doors, and with opportunities for plunder on every side. It is almost too much to expect that in such a position they can resist the temptations to which they are exposed, and it is too well known what is the usual result. On the other hand, in West Australia, the convicts are in a great degree removed from temptation, and have every encouragement to good conduct since they find an ample demand for their labour, and if they behave well they cannot fail to rise to a comfortable station in life—often to own houses and lands, and to become in their turn the employers of labour. Already a considerable number of the convicts who were sent out there thirteen or fourteen years ago have reached this satisfactory position. Many have become prosperous men, living in their own houses, cultivating their own land, and employing the labour of convicts subsequently sent out. They are also removed from most of the temptations to which discharged convicts are exposed at home. In the colony they are dispersed over wide districts of country, with few opportunities of getting into bad company, and often not having a public-house within many miles. They are subject to close supervision by the police; and there is a moral certainty that, if they commit even the smallest offence, they cannot escape detection, and will at once incur a sharp and severe punishment. The result of this twofold advantage is that, whereas in England experience proves that a very small minority of discharged convicts fail to fall back sooner or later into the penal ranks, in Western Australia experience is equally decisive that it is only a small minority who so relapse, and that, whether they are at heart reformed or not, the great majority live outwardly lives of honest industry. Such are the advantages of transportation to this country and to the convicts themselves. To Western Australia the advantages are hardly less striking. That colony possesses great resources, but they can only be turned to account by labour, and labour is wanting. Owing to the great attractions of the other colonies, and especially of the goldfields, few free emigrants of the labouring class ever go to Western Australia. And it is well that this should be so, for I think it highly desirable that the free emigrant should go to colonies where he will have greater advantages than are enjoyed by men sent out as convicts. Your Lordships will observe that I do not dwell upon the effect of removal to the colony as a punishment; because, though formerly, in a different state of society, when Australia was less known, removal to that part of the world was in itself a severe punishment, this has ceased to be the case, and you must look for the efficiency of the punishment to the penal labour which precedes the discharge of the convict. The advantage of sending a convict to Western Australia is, that with a ticket-of-leave he can be discharged under circumstances which enable him to do well, and which prevent the country from suffering, as it would suffer, if he were discharged at home. The fact that transportation is productive of great advantages to Western Australia, to the mother country, and to the convicts themselves, was not denied by my noble friend the Lord President, nor, as far as one may judge by the papers on the table, has it been denied by the Government. But I believe they hold that these advantages should be sacrificed in deference to the objections entertained by the other Australian colonies. Now, in my opinion, in deciding that those objections should be deferred to, Her Majesty's Government have not fulfilled the duty belonging to the high station which they occupy. What is the duty of the servants of the Crown in a matter of this kind? Is it not their duty to take a general view of what they think for the welfare of the empire at large and to recommend to Parliament, or adopt, as far as the executive authority of the Crown extends, such measures as, upon a careful consideration, they think best adapted to promote the welfare of the empire as a whole? Their first duty is to prevent any one portion of the Queen's subjects from suffering from undue pretensions on the part of any other. How is this duty fulfilled by deferring to the objections to transportation raised by the other Australian colonies? In order to form a judgment upon this point it is necessary to consider what these objections are; and here I may remark that, though my noble Friend (Lord Granville) contradicted the assertion, the sentiments of the colonists were well known to the Commission. For, though it is true we could not be in possession of the despatches more recently received, memorials containing in substance the whole of what the colonists have since urged against transportation to Western Australia were transmitted to the Government, and, after being laid before Parliament, were referred to the Commission. I can only say for myself that the fact was as well known to me when I began that inquiry as it is at this moment. Many additional memorials have been transmitted since, but in all the sum and substance of the objections is, that sooner or later the convicts will pass from Western Australia to the other colonies, and inflict great injury upon their inhabitants. The whole case rests upon this assumption. Now, I venture to say that any one of your Lordships who looks carefully and impartially into this matter will come to the conclusion that, sending convicts to Western Australia, as proposed by the Commission, would have no tendency whatever to increase the number of those persons who will go to the other Australian colonies. In the first place, Fremantle, which is the convict depôt (and the greater number of convicts are farther from the other colonies than they are at Fremantle) is distant by sea from the capital of the nearest colony—namely, Adelaide—rather more than 1,800 miles. By land it is somewhere about 1,600 miles. But to get away from Western Australia by land is quite impossible. It has been tried over and over again. Some time ago a well equipped expedition endeavoured to penetrate from Western Australia, into the interior of the continent from that colony, but utterly failed in accomplishing its object, and was obliged to return after enduring great hardships. By sea it is hardly more easy to get away from the colony, for the ports are few and they are strictly watched. The Commissioners were informed by the Governor of Western Australia that in twelve years only forty-two convicts were unaccounted for, and one-half of these got off together in an American whaler which was short of hands, while of the others there was no moral doubt that the majority perished in the wilderness in endeavouring to escape. Thus the number of convicts who escape is so insignificant as to be hardly worth considering. I am aware that this only applies to convicts who are still under legal restraint, and that holders of conditional pardons and ex-pirees could not be prevented from going to the other colonies. But Her Majesty, on the advice of the Commission, has put an end to the granting of conditional pardons, and in my opinion it was a mistake ever to grant them; and as to ex-pirees, the Legislature cannot prevent them from going to any part of the world they please. But it is far more probable that men of this class will reach Melbourne or Sydney from England than by Western Australia. There is comparatively little communication between Western Australia and the other colonies, and the ex-pirees who have strong motives for leaving this country have, on the contrary, much to induce them to remain in Western Australia. Convicts in that colony while holding tickets-of-leave generally have got into some occupation, and very often would have acquired land or money, and have embarked the latter in some business requiring their presence in the colony, so that when they become free to leave it by their sentences having expired they would seldom be inclined to do so. Experience shows that those only return from the colony, as a rule, who have some attachment at home, or have relations living to whom they desire to return. But those who have lived respectably as holders of tickets-of-leave, and have no such reason for coming home, almost invariably settled in Western Australia. I ask your Lordships to consider from this statement (to which I defy contradiction) what real grievance would be inflicted on the other Australian colonies by our sending convicts to Western Australia. I believe that the more the subject is inquired into the more clearly it will appear that the grievance is a purely imaginary one. My noble Friend who formerly held the position of Secretary of State for the Colonies (Lord Taunton) has argued that we are bound to yield to the feelings of the colonists, even (as I understood him) though no real injury would be done to them. My Lords, that appears to me to be an extraordinary proposition. I can understand why the feelings of the inhabitants of New South Wales and Victoria should be consulted in all measures affecting themselves; and, as regards transportation, even if it were just or expedient to send convicts to those colonies against the wish of the inhabitants, it would be impossible to do so. When transportation to Van Diemen's Land was abandoned, as I thought very unwisely, I never denied that if the feeling against it had been really as strong as was supposed, if the objection to receive the convicts had been as real as it was loud, it would have been impracticable for this country to go on with this system which would not work without the co-operation of the colonists. But I doubted the existence of such a strong feeling. I believed that these objections arose from the clamour of a few interested men, and did not represent the feelings of the colonists at large. So far from there being any reluctance to receive and employ convicts when sent out to that colony, the very last ship that was despatched was so besieged by colonists eager to secure the services of convicts, that it was found necessary to have a military guard to preserve order among the competitors who sought to hire them. I would also remind your Lordships that many of those who have signed the strong memorial from Victoria are the very persons who in 1849 joined in a subscription in what was then the district of Port Philip for importing ex-convicts from Van Diemen's Land, because they wanted their labour. I do not, therefore, believe that the feeling against transportation is in any part of Australia so earnest or so sincere as it is supposed; but granting that it were so, I cannot see that these other Australian colonies have any right to interfere with our proceedings in Western Australia. They may fairly ask to determine what shall be done within their own boundaries, but they have no title to control another and independent colony. They claim that the British Government should not interfere in the management of their own internal affairs; and though I think they push this point somewhat beyond the mark, I am willing to admit the principle to some extent; but I think that while this country takes upon herself the burden of protecting these colonies she has, within certain limits, the right to exercise authority in those colonies for the common benefit of the empire at large. If, however, the principle be granted, that each colony is to manage its own affairs—that there is to be non-interference so far as regards Great Britain in Australia—what right have New South Wales and Victoria to seek to dictate to Western Australia? The example of America has been cited in support of the statement that it would be madness to resist the feeling of the colonists. The cases, however, are entirely different. The Americans objected, and most justly, to the levying of taxes from themselves; but the people of Boston or Massachusetts would never have dreamt of rising against the English Government on account of our mode of governing Jamaica. It is perfectly childish to imagine that Victoria or New South Wales would feel itself so far aggrieved by measures adopted in Western Australia as to take up arms to resist them. What possible means would they have of doing so; could they fit out expeditions to invade a colony two or three thousand miles distant, or to intercept the convict ships on their passage. But we are told that if we persist in our plan we shall lose their affection, and that the colonists will cast off their allegiance. I would remind your Lordships, if this is held out to you as a threat, that yielding to clamour is the surest way to incur contempt, and contempt was never yet the parent of affection. The greatest service that the Imperial Government can render to our colonies is to prevent any one of them from adopting measures injurious to the others. I am persuaded that if the moderating influence and the authority of Her Majesty's Government are not firmly used to restrain these rising communities from wronging each other, many years will not elapse before those strong feelings of intercolonial jealousy, which already exist in that part of the world, will occasion serious disputes and even worse perhaps than disputes between the Australian colonies. By giving way to clamour we encourage the colonists to rely upon similar behaviour for success on all occasions. Our true policy is to consider calmly and temperately what is urged by our colonists, and then to act as reason and justice may prescribe. We should do them no wrong; but, on the other hand, when their complaints have no foundation in justice, and when the inhabitants of one colony make demands which cannot be granted without injury to another, we are bound to assert an Imperial authority, and refuse what is so improperly asked. And as to what is said of the colonists throwing off their allegiance, it is mere idle talk. The whole gain of the connection between England and her colonies is on the side of the latter. We do not even retain sufficient authority to prevent them from levying injudicious taxes upon our trade, and there is at this moment a discussion whether protective duties shall not be established against our manufactured goods. I for one think, that if they desire to cast off their allegiance to the British Crown for a quarrel of this kind, they should be allowed to do so. It would be madness to attempt to retain the connection by force, and it would be better to allow them to sever the connection rather than to permit them to insist upon conditions which are unjust to another colony. It is a remarkable fact that these claims are set up only against us. France has established a penal colony in New Caledonia, which is not half the distance from New South Wales that Western Australia is, and the communication is very easy; but, of course, the colonists can make no complaint against France—yet they do object to our doing what is for the benefit of Western Australia. There is only one other point which I must notice. Those who have read the papers which are on the table will observe that the Australian colonies require the entire discontinuance of transportation to Western Australia. But the proposition now is quite another thing: transportation is only to be continued on the present scale. The effect of that will be that you will destroy all the efficiency of the scheme of punishment recommended by the Commissioners; you will lose the advantages arising from a lengthened removal of the convict from the scene of his crimes, which was the object of the whole arrangement; you will also introduce the element of uncertainty, while at the same time you will fail to meet the views of the other colonies. I believe that if there had been a calm and a courteous explanation given to show how little ground there was for the apprehensions of the colonists, the opposition would have been of a very mild character. I am confirmed in the opinion by having seen some extracts of newspapers published in Victoria, in which is pointed out how untenable are the objections taken by the colonists to the policy of the mother country. In short, this is just one of those measures, halting between two opinions, which marks infirmity of purpose and makes failure almost certain. That is a feature which seems to distinguish the acts of the present Government in every department—colonial, domestic, and foreign—infirmity of purpose. Hesitation in their views is the besetting sin of the Government, and is very strongly marked in the course they are pursuing upon this subject. I shall not in Committee move any Amendment; but should any other noble Lord move to substitute seven years for five years as the minimum term of sentences of penal servitude, with a distinct understanding that seven years is meant with a view of removing those convicts to become free in Western Australia, I will support it.

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD said, he entirely concurred with the noble Earl (Earl Grey) in thinking that great advantages would be obtained by a system of transportation, but he also felt that the Government had, at this time, acted wisely in yielding to the strongly-expressed wishes of the South Australian colonies. There were two points to which he wished to address a few remarks. One was the question of police supervision, and the other was the question of re-convictions of habitual offenders. With respect to supervision, it appeared to him that the only argument in favour of the system was its alleged success in Ireland. It was right, therefore, that they should inquire closely into the grounds upon which that success was founded. He was by no means satisfied with the statistics which had been put forward to show the success of supervision and of the intermediate system in Ireland, and he thought that great difficulties would arise from the clause on that subject introduced into the Bill. One objection was, that it would interfere with the operations of that most useful society—the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society. The fact of a man reporting himself monthly to the police would have a very different effect to the wholesome supervision exercised by the society he had mentioned. At the proper time he would be prepared to support the Amendment of which his noble Friend had given notice. He also objected to the clause in this Bill, because it had been introduced with the avowed object of adopting the Irish system as part of our penal legislation. He held that the circumstances of the two countries were very different, and the class of men to whom the system would apply were also very different. But, even allowing that the statistics which had been put forth to show the success of the Irish system were correct, and that they bore out the results claimed for them, he maintained that the success was not owing to the system, but to the efforts of one of the most extraordinary men who ever had to deal with the criminal classes—the lecturer employed at the convict establishment in Ireland. The supervision proposed was not the same supervision that was adopted in Dublin. The success of the system in Ireland was largely owing to the personal efforts and extraordinary influence of Mr. Organ, who was regarded by the convicts more as a guardian than an inspector. He would certainly rejoice to see an Amendment carried, by which the clause requiring monthly reporting to the police should be excluded from the Bill. He regretted the absence of any provision for more effectually dealing with habitual offenders. The number of re-convictions was continually on the increase in our prisons. Of the 2,628 convicts received into convict prisons in 1863, 1,683 had been previously convicted, 1,124 had been before sentenced to imprisonment, and 559 had been in convict prisons. That state of things was far more owing to the uncertainty which had attended the sentences passed heretofore than to any inefficiency in their prison discipline. On the 7th of April of this year there were 536 prisoners in the county gaol of Staffordshire, 196 of whom had been previously convicted. Of thirty-six prisoners received during the year who had been previously sentenced to penal servitude, eleven were sent to prison for terms varying from fourteen days to nine months. Their previous sentences to penal servitude varied from three to ten years. If they took those eleven cases, they found the total amount of imprisonment awarded to them came to three years and six months, whereas the total amount of the former punishment awarded to them came to sixty-three years. That was very much due to the operation of the Criminal Justice Act of 1855; and although he should be sorry to see that Act repealed, it was impossible to examine too closely the evils that had arisen from so many prisoners being dealt with summarily under that measure who had been previously sentenced to penal servitude. No magistrate ought to dispose summarily of any case of felony under that Act unless he knew the circumstances and antecedents of the man he was punishing. He should be glad to see some clause introduced into this Bill which would, to a certain extent at least, deal with the class of cases to which he had referred. Although the minimum of five years' penal servitude might be adapted for ordinary cases, he thought that seven years should be the minimum in all cases of previous convictions. It might advantageously be even made compulsory to pass a sentence of seven years where the previous punishment had been one of penal servitude. Thus they would gain two objects—first, they would keep old offenders longer in prison, and longer, therefore, out of the way of doing mischief; and next, they would enable those who had charge of the convict department to make a better selection of prisoners who should be transported. The Report of the Royal Commissioners showed that there would under any circumstances be considerable difficulty in the present state of thing in obtaining even the limited number of convicts which it had been agreed to send to Western Australia. His suggestion, if adopted, would lessen that difficulty. It had been discussed at quarter sessions by his brother magistrates and generally supported by them, the only ground of objection he had heard offered to it being that it might entail some additional expense. In Committee he would move an Amendment making seven years the minimum sentence of penal servitude in all cases where there had been a previous conviction.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, he trusted the noble Lord would persevere with his intention. He would support his Amendment, for he thought such a provision would be a valuable improvement.

SEIZURE OF THE CHINCHA ISLANDS.

QUESTION.

MR. WEGUELIN said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received Despatches relative to the seizure of the Chincha Islands, belonging to Peru, by a Spanish naval squadron; whether it is the opinion of Her Majesty's Government that the occupation in time of peace of the territory of a friendly nation, without cause or declaration of war, and the forcible detention of individuals of that nation to serve as hostages, are proceedings consistent with the usages of civilized nations, or the dicta of International Law; whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to admit the claim put forth by the Spanish Admiral and the Spanish Commissary, of the right on the part of the Spanish Crown to "re-vindicate" the property of said islands—a right, they assert, similar to that which Great Britain sanctioned when she restored the Islands of Fernando Po, Azmolon, and Coserco, after a formal and uninterrupted possession during a considerable number of years; and whether Her Majesty's Government will interpose their good offices to bring about a settlement of the trifling matter of dispute which has led to these high-handed proceedings on the part of the Spanish officials?

MR. LAYARD: Sir, in reply to my hon. Friend, I have to state that I am afraid I cannot give him any satisfactory information on the subject of his Questions. I am unable, without being better acquainted with the exact circumstances of the case, to say whether or not the proceedings of the Spanish Government have been consistent with the usages of civilized nations and the dicta of International Law. All I can state is, that on Saturday last Her Majesty's Government received despatches from the British Minister in Peru giving an account of what had taken place in these Islands. It appears that the Spanish Minister made a demand with which the Peruvian Government did not comply, and in consequence the Spanish Minister, in conjunction with the Spanish Admiral, without further notice, took possession of the Chincha Islands, which are very valuable, as they yield large quantities of guano. At the same time, it was stated that no contracts would be interfered with so far as concerned British subjects. As the Government have not yet received from the Spanish Government any information as to their reasons for this occupation, I cannot, until further information be received, inform my hon. Friend what course Her Majesty's Government may pursue.

THE CONFEDERATE RAMS.

QUESTION.

MR. HODGKINSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is intended that the price to be paid for the Confederate Rams shall be the subject of a Supplemental Vote, or whether it will be paid out of money already voted for some other purpose?

LOED CLARENCE PAGET: Sir, I have to state it will be my duty to bring on a Supplementary Estimate for the purchase of these Rams.

MR. HERBERT'S PICTURE.—QUESTION.

MR. COX said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he can make any arrangements by which the public may have the opportunity of viewing Mr. Herbert's picture in the Peers' Robing Room?

MR. COWPER said, in reply, that the public would be admitted to see the picture as soon as Mr. Herbert had satisfied himself that the solution with which he intended to cover it was so fixed that the picture would not be injured by the dust which would necessarily arise from large crowds of people passing through the room, who, no doubt, would be anxious to see this admirable work. He was not able to say when the picture would be open to view, but when Mr. Herbert had satisfied himself that the public might be admitted, they would see it on Saturdays at the time they were admitted to the rest of the building.

THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER said, he would beg to ask the hon. Member for Sunderland, If he intends to bring on his Motion with reference to the Confederate States of America on Friday?

MR. LINDSAY: Considering the terrible struggle, Sir, now going on in America, and considering what is likely to be the result of that struggle, I consider that I shall best consult the interests of peace if I postpone the Motion from Friday, the 3rd, to Friday, the 17th of June.

MILITIA REGIMENTS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Why a Return relative to Militia Regiments (Companies, &c.), moved for on the 8th April, has not been furnished?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that the Return ordered on the 8th of April relative to certain Militia Regiments would be laid on the table that night. The delay had been occasioned by the non-arrival of some of the Returns until the 25th of the present month.

THE BRAZILIAN GOVERNMENT AND MR. REEVES.—QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Is it not the duty of the English Consuls who have remained in Brazil since the suspension of diplomatic relations to report to Earl Russell everything which concerns the English Government or English interests; and have Her Majesty's Government not received from the Consul at Rio or otherwise information of a speech made in the Brazilian Senate, on the 24th of February, by M. Sinimbré, lately Minister of Justice, defending the conduct of the Under Secretary who wrote to ask the Judges to vote against Mr. Reeves, producing all the Correspondence with the British Legation, and describing Mr. Christie's Notes complaining of the Under Secretary's conduct, by order and with approval of Earl Russell, as "most impertinent?"

MR. LAYARD replied, that the English Consuls had sent home Reports, but he must ask his hon. Friend not to press for an answer to his Question, as he was aware that mediation had been offered between this country and the Government of Brazil, that it had been assented to, and that negotiations were now going on; and he hoped nothing would be done which would tend to create any angry feeling on the part of the Brazilian Government; and that was the reason why he asked his hon. Friend not to press his Question.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he felt anxious to accede to the request; but he must ask whether the case of Mr. Reeves would form part of the mediation

MR. LAYARD said, he could not state that it would form part of the mediation, but no doubt it would form the subject of consideration on the part of the British Government.

NAVY — THE TRIAL OF THE "RESEARCH."—QUESTION.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether Sir Charles Fremantle's Report upon the state of the Research after the trial of her guns will be laid on the table?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in reply, said, there would be no objection to lay the Report on the table, but it made no mention of any damage done to the vessel.

MR. FERRAND said, he wished to know, Whether the Admiralty intend to call for a Report from the Commander-in-Chief as to the damage done to the Research?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the Admiralty had already received a Report from the official persons of all the damage done on the occasion of the trial. The Commander-in-Chief had made a Report which he should lay on the table, and it would give a detailed statement of whatever damage had been done.

ARMY — MR. LYNALL THOMAS'S GUN. QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether the trials of Mr. Lynam Thomas's gun have been concluded; and whether, on the conclusion, a Report of the trials would be laid before the House?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that some weeks ago, in answer to a similar question, he had stated that the gun which had been manufactured for Mr. Lynam Thomas at the gun factory, on the distinct understanding that it should be at his own expense, had not been paid for. A letter was written to Mr. Thomas or rather to his assignees, for he had had the misfortune to become bankrupt, stating that if it were not paid for within a certain time — three months — the Secretary of State would then consider what steps ought to be taken to save the public the largest possible portion of the expenditure which had been incurred on this gun. The trials were suspended until the expiration of that period. The three months had now expired, and the gun was not paid for, and the Secretary of State now considered that Mr. Thomas had no right to any property in the gun. The question would be referred to the Ordnance Committee, to consider what would be the best use which could be made of the gun for the interests of the public without any reference to the supposed right of Mr. Thomas. All experiments had been suspended since the letter was written to Mr. Thomas.

AFFAIRS OF POLAND.—QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he rose to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government, Whether certain Despatches of which he held copies, relating to the policy of the Government in reference to Poland, were authentic? With the permission of the House, he would read an extract from one of them, which was a despatch from Count Walewski to Count Persigny, dated October 15, 1855. It said—

“Lord Cowley has read to me a despatch from his Government in reply to that which I commissioned you to deliver to Lord Clarendon, on the subject of the situation of the Kingdom of Poland, in its relation to the Treaties which determined its legal condition in 1815, and to the eventual basis of the future peace.”

Now, the Question which he wished to put to the Government was, Whether the Despatches to which the extract which he had just read made reference, and of which it formed part, were authentic; and, if so, whether the noble Lord would be prepared to lay those Despatches on the table?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, as he understood the Question of the hon. Gentleman, it was whether certain despatches to which he alluded, and which were addressed by the Minister of Foreign Affairs at Paris to the French Ambassador here, and vice versa, were or were not authentic. In reply to that Question, he must observe that he was really quite unable to answer for the authenticity of the French despatches.

MR. HENNESSY said, it was stated in 1861 by two Ministers of the Crown, one of them being the noble Lord himself, that in their opinion no despatches had passed between our own and the French Government in 1855 relative to Poland. Now it appeared that Lord Cowley had in that year read a despatch purporting to be from Lord Clarendon to the French Government on that subject, and he wished to know whether that despatch and others on the same subject will be laid on the table?

The Marquess of Hartington

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he could not give an answer off hand with respect to the despatches alluded to. He would, however, examine into the matter, and see whether they could be produced.

AFFAIRS OF CHINA.—RESOLUTION.

MR. COBDEN rose to move the Resolution on the subject of China, of which he had given notice, and said: The subject to which I venture to call the attention of the House has been introduced to our notice first by the noble Lord the Member for Cookermouth, and in the next place by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northumberland, both with great ability; and it has also been referred to in another place by Earl Grey in a speech which displayed, I think, much wisdom and forethought. That being so, I should not now trouble the House on the subject had the circumstances in connection with our relations with China remained unchanged, or did they appear to be in a more satisfactory state than they were at the time when these Motions were brought forward. I cannot, however, read our more recent despatches from that country without feeling that there is little prospect of any amelioration taking place in those relations. I have read attentively the last blue-books, and I confess their perusal impressed me with a sense of great anxiety and uncertainty for the future. It seems to me that no one in China representing this country is satisfied with the present state of things. Our merchants are very much dissatisfied, and Sir Frederick Bruce, our Minister, appears to be in a state of despair, because the policy recommended by him, or carried out there with his acquiescence, seems to have failed and broken down, so that he has no longer any policy—so far as I can understand his despatches—in hand. Then with regard to our military commander, in his last despatch of December he has advocated the complete abandonment of that policy which we were led to suppose was the sole means of restoring peace and the authority of the Imperial Government. We must also recollect that the mail now on its way to China carries out with it an Order in Council, rescinding a former Order which allowed English officers to take service in the Imperial army—a step which in my opinion ought never to have been permitted. But we have it from Sir Frederick Bruce, that it is the foreign element in China which has gained all the late successes, and I cannot but apprehend that when the news arrives in China, that those officers who led the disciplined contingent of the Chinese army are to be withdrawn from the service, renewed hope will be given to the Insurgents, and, probably, the result of the interference of our Government two years ago in China may be to make things there in a more distracted state than they were. Such being the uncertain position of affairs, I think we should be wanting in our duty to the country if we shrink from expressing our opinions on this important question. Taking a review of our position in China, I ask myself what is our object in going to that remote region at all? It is simply trade, and the profits of trade. The next question I put to myself is, have we pursued a course in China consistent with our interests and our honour? And I am bound to say that I think we have not consulted either in the line of policy we have adopted. It might have happened that we, with a sacrifice of national character, might have achieved great success in our commercial undertakings in China. That might be urged by some persons with the view to reconcile us to the course we have pursued; but I confess for my own part, that I should not be disposed to consider a satisfactory balance in the national ledger as sufficient to condone a course of conduct which I thought inimical to the national character. I am, however, sorry to say, that a most unsatisfactory feature in our relations with China is the commercial view of the question. We have been carrying on large military operations, and making great efforts to extend our trade in that country, and I am prepared to show they have ended in the most unsatisfactory manner. This appears to me a subject in respect to which the greatest misapprehension exists, and nowhere does it prevail more apparently than in the mind of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, for the noble Lord a little while ago made a reference to our trade with China, to which I shall presently allude. I want, in the first place, to show the House what the nature of our trade with China is, and what it has been during the time we have been attempting to extend it by these warlike operations. It is a somewhat remarkable fact, that it is the only foreign country in which we have been systematically attempting to force a trade by violence and war, and the only one which really forms an exception to the progress we have made in all other directions in the extension of our commerce. I moved for a Return of the exports from this country to China and Hong Kong from the year 1835 up to the present time, thus including the whole of the period during which our trade with China has been carried on by private enterprise—I mean since 1834, when the monopoly of the East India Company was abolished. There is a peculiar characteristic in this trade. We have had three wars in twenty years, and whatever has been the apparent cause, the ultimate and undisguised object of those wars has been, to use a technical phrase, to open up China and to extend our trade with that country. The effect has been this—that whenever there has been a war our merchants, stimulated by the prospect of an extended market, have sent out speculative stocks, and that their enterprise has invariably been followed by disappointment and re-action. I am speaking in the presence of an hon. Friend of mine, through whose house I believe one-third of the export trade to China goes, who, on one occasion said to me, “The trade with China has been always a disappointing trade.” If the House will allow me I will give it an analysis in a very few words of the Returns for which I moved and to which I have already alluded, which will serve to show how great is the misapprehension which prevails on this subject of our export trade to China. In 1835, the first year of the open trade after the abolition of the East India Company’s monopoly, our exports to that country were £1,074,000. In 1836 they were £1,326,000, which was the highest amount they reached while the trade was confined to Canton. The opium war occurred in 1840, and by the peace of 1842 Shanghai and the other treaty ports were opened. For the following three years there was an increase in our exports—in 1843, they were £1,456,000; in 1844, they were £2,305,000; in 1845, they were £2,394,000. From this point they declined, and for the next ten years they remained, with the exception of one or two spasmodic efforts at recovery, at little more than half the amount of 1845. In 1854, they fell to £1,000,716, being less than in 1835, twenty years previously, when the trade was confined to Canton. In 1856-7, and again in 1859, the war arising out of the lorcha affair was carried on, and by the peace that followed several new ports were opened, and the great river the Yang-tze was made accessible to foreigners. A treaty opening Japan was also entered into, and the first exports to that country were sent through China. Our exports rose in 1859 to £4,457,000, and in 1860 to £5,318,000; but, following the invariable law, they fell in 1862 to £3,137,000. Last year, 1863, they amounted to £3,889,000. Speaking the other evening the noble Lord at the head of the Government informed us, that owing to the great expansion of our trade with China the difficulties of our commerce in Lancashire had been largely met, and that we were indebted to that increase of trade for our ability to bear as well as we had done the pressure of the American civil war. Now it amazed everybody connected with the trade of Lancashire to find that the noble Lord made such a statement. The trade with China is almost the only one that has weighed on the business of Lancashire in consequence of the immense amount of stock which was lying at Shanghai and Hong Kong, and China is the very last market that responded to the rising prices consequent on the Cotton famine. A gentleman in business informed me that during the years 1862 and 1863, the very time when, according to the noble Lord, this market was relieving Lancashire from depression, there was such a glut in China that it would have been profitable to have brought cotton goods from Shanghai and sold them in Manchester. I am astonished at the reckless assertions that I hear made at that table. I can account for it in no way but this—that noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen who become Cabinet Ministers consider that they speak from a brief. They do not speak with the ordinary responsibility of private individuals. It is supposed that somebody else puts the figures into their hands and that they may say anything. I venture to say that there are more groundless statements made at that table to this august body—by both sides—when they are in office than in any other assembly of Gentlemen—and they are made with such solemnity and with such emphatic blows on that box, that all but the oldest and most obdurate Members of this House are imposed upon; and as for the public out of doors they unfortunately believe everything that is said by a Cabinet Minister. The noble Lord, from his long experience, must be considered the most accomplished master of this, which I will call official, language; and if I was asked to point out the most promising of his pupils, I should say that it was my hon. Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. It was, I believe, my hon. Friend who misled his chief. They ought to understand each other better. Speaking on the lapsed debate upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Northumberland, the hon. Gentleman read a tissue of the most fallacious statements to show the vast extension of our trade with China. He compared the trade of 1857 with that of the present time; he gave us the exports and imports of the treaty ports; the exports that went from an interior port to a coast port, and then the exports from that port to another; but he altogether left out of sight the fact that by Lord Elgin's Treaty in 1859 the trade in opium was legalized—that is, brought into the regular trade and into the statistics, in which it did not appear before, because it was a smuggling trade; and that generally amounts to three times as much as our legitimate exports. I have stated in general terms the facts with regard to our exports to China, but here is a statement which has been sent to me with regard to cotton goods, which will fix upon the mind the extraordinary nature of that market, and the great depression which has existed in it, more than the statement of any money amount. My friend, who was surprised at the noble Lord's statement, sent me these figures showing the quantity of cotton goods exported to China and Hong Kong for the four following years:—In 1860 there were 222,963,000 yards, and in 1861, 243,654,000 yards; that was during the time of excitement and speculation, when the hope that now at last there was going to be a large consumption in China was operating upon our merchants' minds. Now comes the recoil; in 1862 the exports fell from 243,000,000 yards to 80,000,000, and in 1863 it fell from 80,000,000 to 46,000,000 yards. So that the exports to China of cotton goods, which are really the chief article that we export to that country, fell in two years from 243,000,000 yards to 46,000,000 yards, or less than one-fifth, and that was during the time when the noble Lord tells us that Lancashire was sustained by the great extension of our trade with China. That is the character of the business that you are transacting with China. You have now tried it in every possible way. You have tried it by war; you have tried it by the extension of the treaty ports; you have tried it by going into the interior; and that is the character of your market in China. I do not pretend to say what is the reason why we cannot find a large consumption of our goods in China. Whether it is that one-third of the human race—as the noble Lord told us the other night when he said, “Think of having free and unrestricted trade with one-third of the human race!”—whether it is because the Chinese are the most industrious, the most frugal, the most energetic and persevering people in the world, because their labour is cheaper than anywhere else, and you get for the cheapness of the Hindoo the quality of the Scotchman or the Swiss,—whether it is in consequence of that that they can produce their own articles cheaper than even a steam-engine can do it on this side of the earth—whether it is that the opium traffic absorbs their means, and prevents their being in a condition to purchase other goods which we expect to sell, or whether it is that the revolution and civil war going on in China tend to destroy the cities and populations where the great consuming demand existed, I do not pretend to say; but this I do say, that from some cause or another you have arrived at this positive proof, that it is not by war or violence, or the increase of your treaty ports, that you are likely speedily to extend the consumption of your goods in China. If you look back for the last thirty-five years you will find that China is the only country that has disappointed you; that is, that the exports to China have not kept pace with the natural increase of your trade in other directions. Last year your exports to China were £3,800,000, your exports to the whole of the world £146,000,000: so that you only send  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent of your exports to China. If you run your eye over the table of exports you will find that China stands only twelfth in the list of your foreign customers, that it stands even below Brazil and Egypt. This is the moral—that it is not by blood and violence that you are to extend your commerce. That is the way to destroy trade and not the way to create it. I hope that after all this experience we shall none of us again advocate any violent measure with the view of extending our trade either in China or elsewhere. The noble Lord told us truly that there is one-third of the human race—that is 350,000,000 or 400,000,000 of human beings—in China. They are but very small customers, but look at it in another way. If you are to follow that policy which is peculiarly the noble Lord's; if you are to break into the country, hold it, and be its police; if you are to make another Turkey of China, and if, in addition to meeting Russia and France, you are to meet the United States at Pekin; if you are to trouble yourselves and future generations with governing and controlling and intriguing in China, recollect that you have a country of vast extent and prodigious population to govern, and that you ought well to consider whether it is worth your while to incur all these risks, and enter upon this policy with the proofs that you have that you are not likely to do more trade with that country than with Brazil or Egypt. We are too apt to forget what China is. China has ten times the population of France. It has eight times the surface of France. Having broken into Pekin by the most flagitious means, you have now a Minister there who is undertaking to remodel that vast empire. Read his despatches; what is he doing? Constantly advising the Government that they must change their mode of administration. They are to become a centralized Government. I can hardly speak of the tone of those despatches without expressing my feelings in un-Parliamentary language. Why! the idea of a man going to an empire that is now moving in the ruts created by 2,500 years of existence and of one civilization—a country which has probably transmitted to you very much of the habits and mode of living of the ancient Babylonians—to think of going to Pekin and coolly recommending that the Government of Pekin should absorb to itself the government of all the provinces—each province being as large as a European empire. What good can possibly come of that? It only shows the utter impossibility of our understanding the nature of the country with which we have to deal. Sir Frederick Bruce forced his way to Pekin expecting to find there a centralized Government and a great Power. When he got there he found a decaying capital and an Executive with very little power. It is very possible that it is owing to that circumstance that the empire has endured so long as it has. [Mr. WHITE: Hear, hear!] What is Sir Frederick Bruce doing? He is recommending the Emperor to withdraw the power and authority enjoyed by the local governors of the different provinces, and to assume their power himself at Pekin. He is recommending a complete revolution in the mode of governing China. It seems, that the power of the governors of departments is really almost independent of that of the central Government. Now, I think that what we have to do in China, if it be a great empire in ruins, is to avoid the fall of the ruins, just as you would keep out of the shadow of an old castle wall for fear it should fall upon you. The wise policy would be to have as little as possible political or social relationship with that country. That is the policy which I should recommend this House to consider. What are we doing now? We are actually doing our very best to break up the little authority that was left to that central Government, because we are carrying into that country habits of insubordination, and letting into that country wild and lawless men. And the very circumstance of our opening the door to what is called the extra-territorial population is that we let in, not respectable merchants alone, but every kind of filibusters and brigands who can reach that country. There is nothing comes out so clearly in the late despatches as that you yourselves cause much of the disorder that is going on in China. You opened up the great Yang-tze river—that is, you stipulated that foreigners should have the right to navigate that river. Well, that was an unusual step, and we ought not to have done it unless with much better securities for the maintenance than we could possibly obtain. I believe it was done against the better judgment of Lord Elgin himself. What has been the effect? Read the despatch of Vice Consul Adkins, who is placed in a consulate on that river, and who describes the population. He says, writing to Sir Frederick Bruce from Chinkiang, on the Yang-tze, on the 2nd of September, 1862 :—

“ I am well aware that the river is likely to be overrun by foreign blackguards, knowing no law, and under no control ; the more so that the Chinese authorities themselves shirk the responsibility, and take no steps to protect their countrymen.”

Writing again on the 23rd of September, and referring to outrages that had taken place, he says—

“ The Europeans who caused the disturbance were in Chinese employ. It is a common practice to hire a foreigner ‘to take care of the boat.’ By this is meant hoisting a foreign flag when passing a native Custom House, and bullying any official who may get in the way.”

Again, on the 27th of April, 1863, he says—

“ I very much fear that the foreigners trading on this river in sailing boats are almost without exception men without principle or character—outlaws, in fact, who have no regard for treaties or regulations, and who look upon the Chinese as made for them to prey upon. Their drunken and debauched habits have made an impression even on the Chinese.”

And Sir Frederick Bruce, writing so late as July last to Earl Russell, speaks of the “ constant scenes of blood and violence which have inaugurated the opening of the Yang-tze river.” Can any one realize what this extra-territoriality means? You have stipulated that Englishmen who go into China shall not be subject to Chinese laws. You make a sort of effort to follow your fellow subjects with your own law—that is, you set up Consuls 200 or 300 miles apart on this great river. I believe there is a space of 500 miles on that vast river where we have no Consuls at all. Your countrymen go there, and foreigners also. This system of hoisting flags is carried on in all sorts of surreptitious ways. Let us suppose that Chinamen came here, and could penetrate into Oxfordshire without being subject to our law—that they could commit every species of robbery and outrage upon the constituents of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire, and that the local magistracy had no power to interfere with them beyond this, that they could seize them and carry them to the nearest Consulate, there to be judged according to Chinese laws. They must be taken to the Chinese Consulate at London, the witnesses must be brought with them, they go before a foreign tribunal, and then, after all this expense, what chance would you have of obtaining law or justice? Why, such a condition of affairs amounts to a state of actual lawlessness for every European and American in the interior of that country. The law allows every foreigner, be he English, French, or American, to pass into the interior, and foreigners having treaty rights are exempt from the jurisdiction of the mandarins. You must bear in mind that the mandarins shirk the responsibility of meddling with these people; and why? Because they know very well that one war, or rather two wars—the wars of 1856-7—were caused by the lorcha Arrow. The same may be said of the war that followed the exchange of the ratifications; and there is not a Chinese authority that does not tremble in the presence of the English flag. The consequence is that for vessels under the English flag, since that lorcha war, there is a complete irresponsibility and lawlessness. Chinese capitalists buy European-rigged vessels; they get a foreigner to come on board, as they did in the case of the Arrow, to take care of the boat. When he is on board he claims to be the owner of the boat. He bullies the Chinese authorities, he passes the Custom House, and defies them to fire upon him. Why, this amounts to an actual state of anarchy. These lorcha vessels are at the bottom of a great deal of this mischief. What says Sir Frederick Bruce in his despatch to Consul Sinclair at Ningpo, dated January 24, 1863. He says—

"I have to instruct you to execute strictly the treaty in the matter of clandestine and prohibited trade, particularly as against lorchas and small sailing craft engaged in the coasting trade. The class of men who sail these vessels, and their lawless and violent proceedings, make peaceful progress difficult, and do much to keep up a feeling of alarm and aversion to foreigners among the authorities and population of China. You must be aware, from your experience at Ningpo, that it is the employment to be found in these vessels which keeps up the class of lawless foreign adventurers which infests the ports, and is the hot bed of crime on the coasts of China."

Now, you undertake the police of the vast region. You have got your gunboats on the Yang-tze river and on the coast, but I am very much afraid that you are led into almost as much lawlessness and involuntary crime as the natives themselves, because a wholesale massacre and destruction of the native junks by our ships of war has been going on, attributable, no doubt, to our ignorance of their language. Such acts, however, reflect a very great discredit on the national character. We read of 200 junks at a time being destroyed by our vessels. They destroyed first the pirates, as they are called, and then the Government vessels. There is a curious correspondence, from which I will trouble the House with only a short extract. It illustrates in a very short space the anomalous and discreditable relations to which I refer. Prince Kung sends a despatch to Sir Frederick Bruce, complaining that our force in the Yang-tze river had burnt three Government war junks for pirates, one of them having on board a mandarin, for the loss of whose personal effects a pecuniary compensation is demanded. In reply, Sir Frederick Bruce says—

"A short time since Captain Dew destroyed a fleet of 200 pirate vessels at Chusan at the request of the Chinese authorities; and in the case now complained of, the officers of Her Majesty's ships, at the request of the people, destroyed these junks, which the popular voice, as well as the appearance of the vessels themselves, pointed out as Cantonese and piratical."

And he adds, in reply to a second remonstrance, that

"As several respectable looking villagers on shore averred that these junks had been plundering them for some time past (a statement corroborated by a small mandarin), the commander of the larger steamer caused them to be set on fire."

[A laugh.] That is not a thing to laugh at in a Christian assembly. You cannot realize such a state of things, because the scene of these outrages is so remote. There is an old saying that a man would sleep more soundly if he knew that the whole Chinese Empire would be destroyed in the night, than if he knew he was to have a tooth drawn in the morning. But our interests are becoming deeply compromised in the Chinese Empire. Here is the answer of Prince Kung, and I would rather have faced a broadside than have received such a communication—

"A well-dressed and well-to-do people are not necessarily well-affected subjects, nor is a small mandarin necessarily a genuine mandarin. Who can say that in this case the parties complaining were not pirates in disguise, who, in their dread lest the Government vessels should arrest them, trumped up this story of the evil done by these junks with a view to inciting the commanders of British steamers to destroy them."

And the Prince proceeds to say that for this act of violence, in the summary destruction of these Government vessels, he hopes that a penalty commensurate with the offence will be inflicted on the British officers. This is a most demoralizing state of things when your forces are made the instruments of this brutal violence—when they destroy 200 vessels because they are denounced by a large mandarin, and then three Government ships because they are denounced by a small mandarin. I say that such a state of things, if allowed to go on, would re-act prejudicially on our home politics and the very character of our social life, and it is our duty to put it down. Why are our vessels there at all to do the behest of the Chinese Government in destroying what are called pirates? At Chusan it was said that 200 war junks that were destroyed were ready to join the Taepings. In the present state of things in China, you cannot draw a line between pirates and rebels, and yet these junks that are found ready to co-operate in the defence of the rebels—and these people had as much right to rebel as ever we had—are to be treated by our forces as a common enemy. Under what authority are such things done? I see in the despatches, Standing Order No. 10, from Admiral Kuper, he says—

“Chinese vessels are on no account to be destroyed by Her Majesty’s ships, unless the officers in command are requested by a competent Chinese authority to aid in doing so; nor unless, on the sea coast of China, a pirate is caught in the act of piracy.”

It was an old standing order of the Admiralty that our vessels of war were not to destroy even pirates unless they were proved to have attacked a square-rigged vessel. I think I heard that standing order quoted by the late Mr. Hume some twenty years ago. It is not to be tolerated that our brave sailors are to be made the executioners of such a community as that. Now the question arises, What is the remedy for this state of things? If we were beginning afresh to-morrow to establish our relations with China, we should not hesitate a moment as to what we should do. We should avoid all political and social contact with that country. We should, in fact, follow the example given us by a man who was not only a statesman, but essentially a philanthropist—Sir Stamford Raffles. He founded Singapore in 1819. He purchased an island in the Malacca Straits about the size of the Isle of Wight, a barren island, covered for the most part with dense jungle, and gave no earthly advantage to the desert spot except the establishment of a complete freedom of commerce and complete security for life and property. What has been the consequence? That place has grown up from some 200 inhabitants to 100,000, and its exports and imports—which are genuine, and not fictitious, like those of my hon. Friend—I have lately seen stated at something like £12,000,000 sterling. Well, why not do in your China trade what has been done in Singapore? You have only to establish free ports on the coast of China, and to withdraw yourselves altogether from political contact with that people, and you will have a trade greater than ever you can hope for by assisting to destroy their civilization in the vain attempt to promote your commercial relations. You have an example of what might be done in the case of Hong Kong. Hong Kong is a mere rock at the entrance of the Canton waters. You have made a free port of it; it has no productive nor consumptive power whatever; but by making it a free port, one-third of all the commerce which now goes on with China is carried on through that port. While Canton is deserted, and left quite out of the list of your export and import accounts, everything goes to Hong Kong; and there is no doubt if you could get two other small islands—the smaller the better—one towards the centre of the coast and the other towards Shanghai, and merely establish them as free ports—I do not ask you to do more—they would draw all the trade of China, and solve the question of your relations with that country without any more ado on your part. Well, then, having this example of what should have been done, we go on preferring a policy which is carried out at great loss to the national character, and at great cost to the people of this country, because such a policy imposes a great charge upon the people, and the time may come when this country will be very impatient of this sort of mismanagement. I would exhort this assembly and its constituencies—since we are now beginning to view ourselves as a kind of privileged class from which we exclude five-sixths of our people, because we are supposed to have more forethought, more political wisdom, more philosophy than they—that something is expected from us. I will show you by the conduct of a great, a brave, and essentially a just man—the Duke of Wellington—what the course you have pursued during the last thirty years is as compared with what he would have done. A very curious incident brings in the Duke of Wellington as an authority on this question. I may call to the recollection of this House that in 1834, after the opening of the trade with Canton to private enterprise, Lord Napier was sent out to that place. He addressed the officials there in the usual way, but they refused to have any communication with him except in the way of trade. Lord Napier, after some angry correspondence, wrote home some despatches inciting our Government to coerce the Chinese by sending out a few regiments, and showing how easily they might be brought to submission. At that time the noble Lord now at the head of the Government was Foreign Secretary; but before Lord Napier’s letters arrived, that curious interregnum, which those at the wrong side of fifty cannot but remember, took place, when the Whig Government went out and the Duke of Wellington held all the seals until Sir Robert Peel should return from Italy. Those letters of Lord Napier’s fell into the hands of the Duke, who then held the seals of the Foreign Office as well as the seals of the other Secretaries of State, and he wrote in reply a very brief despatch, which is the only one from his pen of the papers of 1840, and here is one of the sentences, which contains the pith of the whole. It is dated February 2, 1835—

"It is not by force and violence that His Majesty intends to establish a commercial intercourse between his subjects and China, but by the other conciliatory measures so strongly inculcated in all the instructions which you have received."

Now, I am bound to say, in justice to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, that the instructions which were sent out by him, being the King's ordinance by an Order in Council for the management of our trade in China, were all dictated in a spirit of justice, moderation, and peace; and I can say I have never seen any despatches of the noble Lord which have been addressed to China which have not always breathed that spirit of forbearance and justice. But what I find fault with in the noble Lord is this—if one of his subordinates in any part of the world commits any violation of those rules of moderation and justice, the noble Lord backs him. Now, I defy the noble Lord in all his correspondence to show me half-a-dozen lines conveying a courageous and just rebuke to an over-zealous or violent agent abroad like those few lines of the Duke of Wellington. What we want is a Government here which can check its officials at the antipodes as well as the Government of President Lincoln can restrain its officials from wars with China. [This remark of the hon. Gentleman excited some murmurs and subdued commentaries on the Opposition benches.] I understand what is passing among hon. Gentlemen. Well, I come now to the point to which I was going to refer, and that is, the Duke of Wellington's view of what should be our expenditure in China. After sending the despatch from which I have quoted to Lord Napier he sits down, and in a memorandum prepared for the Cabinet, which you will find in the same volume of the Correspondence up to 1840, he goes into the question of Lord Napier's difficulties with the Chinese. He says—

"They refused to receive him at Canton; they had a perfect right to do so. For us to attempt to force the Chinese officials to receive an English official would be disgraceful."

VOL. CLXXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

"Disgraceful," that is the word; and he goes on to say—

"If they do not want to receive an English Minister with high-sounding titles, let us be content."

And at a time when Lord Napier was supposed to be a refugee at Macao, in a memorandum dated March 24, 1835, he fixes our establishment in China. He recommends, until trade has taken its regular peaceable course, a frigate and a smaller vessel of war for the protection of our trade with China; and he fixes the cost of the civil establishment there at £13,600 a year. So that, according to the Duke of Wellington's principle, our trade was to be protected by a frigate and a small vessel, and our civil establishment was to cost only £13,600. Now, last year I saw a list of Government vessels in the waters of China and Japan, and they were fifty in number, and we have a little army at Hong Kong, and another at Shanghai, and the expense of our civil establishments has enormously increased. While our trade with China has increased only threefold during all that time, our expenses have increased twenty-fold, and all that has been done under the purest delusion that ever any people were under. We went to work with the Chinese to force our political connection on them—a course which the Duke of Wellington thought ought not to be followed at all. We have done so on the assumption that the Chinese could be traded with fully only if we established our political connection with them. But the Chinese, with an instinctive knowledge of their own interests, immediately came to the conclusion that their peace and security were at stake in excluding foreigners from all political and social contact with them. They felt that they could not co-exist on an equality in the same country with the English, and, while they have consequently resisted all social and political contact with us, we have been always acting under the delusion that a political and social connection was essential for the interests of our trade. That was the greatest delusion in the world, for the Chinese people were free-traders, while we were in the very mire of protection in this country. The Chinese and Asiatics never understood or felt the question of protection to native industry. I remember quite well, when I advocated the repeal of the Corn Laws in this country twenty-five years ago, repeatedly making use of the argument of the case of the Chinese, and showing what free-traders they were, how they not only allowed rice to come into their country duty free, but they exempted from port charges a ship bringing a cargo of that first necessary of life in China. Some persons may attempt to answer me by saying that I am only speaking of exports to China, and that I say nothing of our imports from that country; but no one doubts that if we stayed at home the imports from China would still reach us. We have never gone to China to force the Chinese people to give us their produce, but to increase our exports to that country. It may be said that it is not a practical question to talk of withdrawing our present connection with China. I thank God I am not responsible for anything that has been done with respect to China, but we are in the midst of difficulties with that country, increasing every year in danger; therefore we cannot leave the matter alone, and if we cannot suddenly take that course which we might do if we had to begin again, we can, at any rate, move in that direction, and can apply the principle I advocate to Japan, where we have endeavoured to force ourselves on a reluctant people. The representatives of Japan are now in Paris, and they will come over to this country, and will be ready almost to prostrate themselves before us and ask us not to force ourselves on them; for if we should, they could not be answerable for the safety of our countrymen, and civil war and strife might be the consequences. Now I want to know whether we are going to receive the Japanese Envoys in the same way as we received the Ambassadors who pleaded in the same manner with Lord Elgin. The communications which passed between the Chinese Plenipotentiaries and Lord Elgin, when they were pleading in every possible way against the English forcing themselves on their country, were the most pathetic State papers I ever read. Are we to pursue the same course with respect to Japan? I trust not. I trust that we shall, in respect to that country, pursue the same principle as in Singapore and Hong Kong. Establish ourselves if we will on the mainland, but let us isolate ourselves, and not come in contact with the interior. Let us take this precaution. We have had the death of one Englishman in Japan—Mr. Richardson—and to avenge that we have thrown away the lives of many brave men. We must observe, in our trading relations with these Oriental nations, precisely the same policy as was pursued by our Plantagenet

kings when we received in former times those merchants from the Hanse Towns who came here and were allowed to trade, but were obliged to keep themselves distinct from our people. The consequence was that those merchants settled in a distinct part, a place being set apart for them, and were obliged to avoid all contact with Englishmen, simply because they were exempt from our laws. In the end we must come to the same condition of things in dealing with these people, and in order to carry on business with them in quietness we shall have to establish free ports; if on an island so much the better, and if on the mainland we must keep our people to themselves. If Englishmen go out to these parts of the world, must they involve their countrymen at home in these wars because they will not confine themselves to five square miles for horse exercise? Why, our naval officers are content to be imprisoned on the quarter-deck, with the chance of an occasional walk of half a mile. Let our merchants submit to a similar ordeal, and as a matter of duty to ourselves we are bound to enforce such a course of conduct on them. I have brought forward this Motion because I think it right not to let this question be huddled up by a "count out," and a "count out" never takes place in this House unless the Government are in it, and because I wish to give the opportunity to hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House to express their opinions on the subject. I think—and the thought occurred to me since I gave notice of submitting a Motion on this question—that it would be the wisest course if this House should understand that, at the next meeting of Parliament, a Select Committee would be appointed to inquire into our commercial relations with China and Japan. It may seem presumptuous, considering the uncertainty of human and Parliamentary life, to say what should be done six months hence; but some steps might be taken in the interval of the recess to procure the necessary documents from China, and in the meantime hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House might express their opinions on the subject. After the debate is over, I attach very little importance to the fate of the Motion; but it is important people should know in China that this country is dissatisfied with the present state of things, and is not prepared to endorse the conduct of any Englishman which may involve a repetition of our Chinese wars. I hope that during the recess nothing will be done to give us greater cause to blush than now, or to increase the humiliation which we must feel at what has passed; and that every man in that distant country, whether official or merchant, will bear in mind that, in dealing with an ancient but helpless people, it is our duty and interest to act in accordance with the mild character of Christianity. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given notice.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the policy of non-intervention, by force of arms, in the internal political affairs of Foreign Countries, which we profess to observe in our relations with the States of Europe and America, should be observed in our intercourse with the Empire of China."—(Mr. Cobden.)

MR. LAYARD said, it was curious that this Question, which had been brought under the notice of the House more frequently than any other foreign question this Session, should hitherto have received so little attention from hon. Members; and therefore he conjectured that the large audience which he saw assembled that evening, had been attracted thither not so much by the piece as by the actor. He thought that hon. Members might congratulate themselves on the speech they had heard. The hon. Member for Rochdale, who was always original in his views, had been more so than usual that evening. It was a speech characterized by the hon. Gentleman's usual ability and by unusual moderation and calmness. It fully deserved the attention of the House, and he would do his best to answer it. When, on a former occasion, there had been a difficulty in keeping "a House" to listen to a debate on China, that was not to be attributed to any desire on the part of the Government for a "count out," but rather to the fact that the House felt that the proposition to call on the Government to reverse its policy with regard to China involved a responsibility too great for the House to undertake; and he thought he could show that if Her Majesty's Government had simply followed the advice that was then given by Members of the House with regard to China, disastrous results would have followed both to our commerce and the lives of a number of British subjects in China. But after their speeches either no Resolution was put to the House, or the House was counted out in consequence of there not being forty Members present. He never very clearly understood what those hon. Gentlemen meant. The hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) the other evening, after blaming the Government for their policy, concluded by wishing that they should continue to defend the Treaty Ports and to protect British interests in China. Why, that had always been the policy of the Government; and therefore, as between them and that hon. Gentleman and those who thought with him, the question became one of degree and not one of principle. But now the House had a totally different state of things before it. His hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale had advocated a totally new policy. He said the time was come when we ought to abandon the policy on which we had hitherto acted in China, and adopt another and a diametrically opposite one; in other words, that all direct relations with China, diplomatic and commercial, should cease. That was an original view, and such an one as might be expected from his hon. Friend—one displaying great ingenuity on the part of the hon. Gentleman; but it was a view from which he (Mr. Layard) totally dissented, and he thought he would be able to show that it was one which in these days it was utterly impossible to adopt, or that would be tolerated by the House and the country. He heard with surprise the statement of his hon. Friend, that the only exception to the increase in our trade with various countries, was China. He did not think that the hon. Member's own statistics bore out that assertion; because, towards the end of his speech, he stated that the trade with China had increased threefold during the last few years. He also said that the statistics he (Mr. Layard) quoted to the House on a previous occasion, on behalf of the Government, were not trustworthy—that the most reckless disregard of facts, accompanied by emphatic blows on the box, was exhibited at the table of that House. The hon. Member characterized the noble Lord at the head of the Government as the master of that kind of proceeding, and paid him (Mr. Layard) the compliment of saying that he was the most promising of the noble Lord's pupils. He should be proud of the past and hopeful of the future if the latter statement were correct; but he knew his hon. Friend only paid him an empty compliment. He would now call the attention of the House to a few statistics which he had gathered from official Returns laid upon the table from year to year; and if his hon. Friend doubted them because they were official reports, he would refer to reports given in China by persons not connected with the Government, but connected with trade, and who had no interest in misrepresenting the facts. He found from the Return headed "Declared value of British and Irish produce exported from the United Kingdom to various countries and British possessions," these results relating to the exports to China, exclusive of Hong Kong—that in 1854 the amount was £532,639; in 1855, £888,679; in 1856, £1,415,478. There was a gradual increase till 1861, when the amount was £3,114,157; but in the following year there was a sudden drop to £2,024,118, which was easily accounted for. It was owing to the Cotton Famine and the consequent decrease in the cotton trade. The value of the imports into China was in 1854 £9,125,000; in 1862 it was £11,699,964, and the exports increased from £1,000,000 in 1854 to £5,451,557 in 1860. There could be no doubt whatever that those Returns were accurate; but if his hon. Friend should be inclined to question them, he would refer him to returns published in a supplement of The London and China Telegraph for the 7th of last March. In that broadsheet it was observed—

"The advance of the import trade from China is very remarkable, the value having doubled within the past two years. The imports of tea here have been very large—a considerable quantity now coming here for re-shipment to the States of America, Russia, and other parts of the Continent. Chinese wool keeps steady, although showing no very large increase, and a new item appears in the imports of cotton. Hitherto China has been an importing country, receiving large supplies from India, instead of an exporting country. The value of British exports to China has been rather on the decline of late years, but this arises in a great degree from the decrease in the shipped cotton manufactures, which is scarcely one-fourth of the amount of former years. Beer, coals, iron, lead, hardware, and other principal articles keep pretty steady."

Our imports of tea from China and Japan had risen from 75,000,000 lb. in 1859 to 134,000,000 lb in 1863. In a former debate it was alleged that the proceedings of the Taepings had caused no diminution in the export of silk, and his assertion that it had decreased while the export of other articles had increased was questioned by some hon.

Members, but in the same paper he found this statement—

"The total export of silk from Shanghai during the year (January to December) 1862 was 84,983 bales, against 70,459 during the preceding year; but of this increase 8,330 bales were Japanese silk re-exported, so that the increase on Chinese produce was only 6,194. A portion of this, too, may fairly be assumed to have been diverted from Ningpo, where the falling off during the last six months of 1862 was 6,620 bales; so that unless an increase be assumed at the latter port during the six months of Taeping occupation, the export of silk from the two ports has actually decreased. According to the annual circular of Messrs. Durrant and Co., there was a diminished import here in 1863 of 21,400 bales of Shanghai silk, 800 of Canton silk, and 900 of Chinese thrown silk, but an increased import of 14,000 bales of Japan silk."

His hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale had said that on a former occasion he had quoted statistics of the accumulated trade of China, instead of those of the trade of China with this country; but it would be in the recollection of the House that he had quoted those figures, as returns of the accumulated trade, in order to show the good results that had followed from the protection of the treaty ports by the British Government with our French and American Allies. His hon. Friend had advocated a new and original policy; but he must submit that his remarks were not altogether logical. He pointed out the great success which had attended Sir Stamford Raffles' occupation of Singapore. He (Mr. Layard) quite agreed that Sir Stamford Raffles was an eminent philanthropist as well as a far-seeing politician. He was able to purchase this island from its native ruler, and to establish a town and free port. The experiment had proved perfectly successful, and his hon. Friend suggested that we should pursue exactly the same course in China—that instead of having commercial communications with the Chinese in their own cities and upon their own rivers, we should establish free ports on the coast of China. His hon. Friend had, however, failed to point out how this policy was to be carried out. We must have the consent of the Chinese Government. The fact was that Shanghai had virtually within the last few years become a free port. Hong Kong had been made by us a free port, and the experiment had succeeded; but the fact of our doing so was a cause of considerable annoyance to the Chinese Government, and it was only after a long war, in which the Chinese were defeated, that we obtained the cession of Hong Kong. But did the hon. Gentleman suppose that the Chinese would cede to us the islands he referred to of Chusan and Formosa without compensation, for the purpose of establishing free ports, and absorbing the commerce of the Chinese, and placing it in our own hands? Well, if we could not obtain these free ports by negotiation, would the hon. Gentleman suggest that we should seize the islands in question and go to war for them. We must either obtain them by negotiation or as the result of a prolonged war. It was utterly impossible to ask the Chinese for such a cession. Then his hon. Friend seemed to forget that there were other Powers in China besides England—there were France, Russia, and the United States, each of whom might come forward and demand a similar cession; and thus the result would be that we should get into difficulties and complications with China and other Powers. What had been our policy in China? We had obtained from the Chinese the right of trading at certain ports which had heretofore been closed against us. As soon as British and foreign trade was admitted into those ports an immense increase of commerce took place. Shortly afterwards the Taeping rebellion broke out. The Government had often been charged with having interfered in this domestic quarrel between the Taepings and the Chinese Government; but that was not the case. Our only interference had been to prevent the Taepings taking possession of the treaty ports. We had nothing whatever to do with them until they approached the treaty ports, and they might have gone on fighting for centuries if they had not threatened those ports. There was not a diplomatic agent, a consul, a missionary, or a merchant in China who had not urged Her Majesty's Government to defend the treaty ports against the Taepings. Everybody concurred in asserting that the Taepings were utterly incapable of founding any settled form of government; that they would not respect our treaties with the Chinese Government; and that if they were allowed to take the treaty ports, British and foreign trade would be utterly annihilated, and that probably an immense sacrifice of human life would ensue. In the face of these representations what a responsibility would have rested on the Government if they had permitted the Taepings to enter the treaty ports! His hon. and gallant Friend behind him (Colonel Sykes) was fond of quoting anonymous writers and newspaper extracts in favour of the policy he recommended: the other night he produced a string of newspaper columns stitched together as long as a tailor's measure; but he had never heard of any evidence given by any person of authority and knowledge in favour of establishing relations with the Taepings. When Admiral Hope went out he was exceedingly desirous to treat with the Taepings, and to enter into friendly relations with them; and he paid a visit to Nankin for the purpose. But he failed altogether, and he was the last man in China to give up the idea that relations could be established with the Taepings. His hon. Friend maintained that the Taepings were not destructive, and he was unwilling to accept the evidence of Ministers and Consuls to that effect. In fact, he, and some other hon. Gentlemen as well, seemed to think that there was a perpetual plot going on in China to deceive her Majesty's Government. There was no doubt about it, however. Everybody who had seen anything of the proceedings of the Taepings concurred in so describing them. Nankin, Hankow, and other flourishing commercial towns were ruined the moment they fell into the hands of the Taepings. A great deal had been said about the thirty miles' radius; but no general principle had ever been laid down that there should be a thirty miles' radius around all the ports. At Shanghai that radius was the military line of defence pointed out by the military authorities. At other ports a ten or twenty miles' radius might be sufficient. It was altogether a military question. It was true that this thirty miles' radius had been passed on several occasions, and the officers were not always justified in passing it. In several instances the Government had condemned officers for passing it; in others they had acknowledged the force of the reasons on which they had acted. It was thought necessary on one or two occasions, in order to prevent the Taepings closing the roads which lead to Shanghai, to dislodge them from posts outside the thirty miles' radius. The hon. Gentleman had condemned Sir Frederick Bruce as one of the authors of the policy which had led us into so many difficulties. On other occasions, however, he (Mr. Layard) had heard it said that Sir Frederick Bruce had a far different view of the policy that ought to be pursued from Her Majesty's Government, and that he was opposed to the employment of British officers in China. The hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) went so far the other evening as to say that the Government had suppressed a despatch, or rather a memorandum, signed by Sir Frederick Bruce and others, disavowing the policy of the Government, and another hon. Gentleman said that an admission had been with difficulty extracted from him (Mr. Layard) that such a memorandum had been received. That showed the reckless manner in which statements were made in that House, for there was not a single word of foundation for that statement. Sir Frederick Bruce communicated a despatch and inclosures to Mr. Burlingame, the American Minister, who wrote to his Government to say that he had seen that despatch, and had sent a copy of it, but requested that it should not be published until the English Government had published it. He himself was the first to bring that despatch under the notice of the House. He quoted from it to show the entire concurrence of Mr. Burlingame in the policy proposed to be pursued by Sir Frederick Bruce, and he also stated that that was the policy which had been followed by the Government. There had never, he might add, been any difference between the Government and Sir Frederick Bruce as to the policy which should be pursued, and he had over and over again borne testimony to the great ability and tact with which that Gentleman had conducted his communications with the Chinese authorities. He could not lay the despatch in question on the table because it contained observations on the policy of foreign States which it would not be conducive to the public interests to publish; but he would to-morrow or the next day produce extracts from it which would give all the parts to which allusion was made by Mr. Burlingame. One extract which bore on the point at issue he might be allowed to read. It was as follows:—

“On the appointment of His Imperial Highness to the post of Prime Minister, Sir Frederick Bruce had strongly urged Her Majesty's Government to support the Chinese Government—firstly, by protecting the ports against the rebels; secondly, by aiding it in the organization of a regular executive. The feeling of the British nation is always opposed to interference in the internal dissensions of other States. Sir Frederick Bruce had, notwithstanding, on his own responsibility, authorized Her Majesty's army and navy stationed in China to defend the ports against the rebels; and it is entirely due to the exertions of the allied forces that Shanghai and Ningpo are not now in rebel possession.”

By Sir Frederick Bruce's own admission it appeared that he himself was the first to suggest the employment of British troops in defence of Shanghai; so that a distinct contradiction was given to the allegation that there was any disagreement between him and the Government on that part of their policy. But be that as it might, was it, he would ask, or was it not, the fact, that our relations with the Chinese Government and the Chinese people had improved? His hon. Friend had quoted the correspondence relative to the destruction of certain junks by British officers; but it was perfectly clear that if a similar circumstance had occurred some years ago, instead of Prince Kung writing a diplomatic note to Sir Frederick Bruce, and negotiations taking place, war might have ensued between the two countries. Lord Elgin was, he also thought, perfectly right—and the result justified his conduct—in pressing on the Chinese the conditions to which he endeavoured to obtain their assent. One of the greatest results of his mission was the concession under the treaty enabling foreign Ministers to reside in Peking—it had proved of the utmost advantage. Constant intercourse now took place between Sir Frederick Bruce and the Imperial authorities, and matters leading to irritating differences were settled with comparatively little difficulty. With respect to our having entered into treaty engagements with Japan, his hon. Friend seemed to forget that we were not the first to adopt that course; that a similar treaty had previously been concluded by the United States and Russia with that country; and that he himself would, in all probability, be the very first to condemn the apathy of the Government if they had declined to follow in the same direction. His hon. Friend, he would further observe, condemned the existence in China of a state of things which no longer prevailed in that country. There was no doubt still in China much which was to be deplored. The collection there of large numbers of idle persons, known as “filibusters,” was a great evil, and imposed on the British Government a great responsibility. But it was most difficult to know how persons of that description could be excluded from the free ports, unless we were prepared to withdraw from China altogether. What, under the circumstances, had we done? We had established that extra-territorial system, which he admitted was open to objection; but which, considering the cruel character of the Chinese, was necessary for the protection of our own people and to prevent them from being exposed to unduly severe punishments. The exertions of our Consuls under the system had, he believed, already tended very much to check crime in China and to exclude from it idle and worthless persons. Nevertheless, acts were frequently committed by British subjects which deserved severe punishment; but in all these cases the offenders had been fairly tried, and entire satisfaction had been given to the Chinese authorities. He believed that no Government with any sense of responsibility would think of entering into relations with the Taepings—such a connection would be sure to turn out disastrously. It was all very well to say that we were supporting in China an usurping dynasty; but having spoken much on this subject with Mr. Wade, the British Secretary of Legation, who was perhaps better acquainted with that country than any other living man, he had been assured by him that the present was a popular dynasty, that the people looked upon it as having conferred upon them great benefits, and were willing to remain under it, while they looked with horror on the rebellion; and Mr. Wade also assured him that not a single Chinese of respectability had joined in the rebellion. Those were facts which he had never heard contradicted on reliable authority, and he asked the House, with confidence, whether after the explanations which had been given it would be possible for the Government to change the policy which they had hitherto pursued in China. It was true that, in order to mark our sense of the misconduct of the Futai in putting to death the Wangs who had surrendered at Soochow, an Order in Council had been issued to the effect that British officers must no longer take service under the Chinese Government. Therefore our exertions were now limited to the defence of Shanghai and the other treaty ports. Those ports we must defend against the Taepings, for if we allowed the rebels to enter them, Europeans by thousands, and Chinese by tens of thousands, would be slaughtered. If Shanghai, that great emporium of trade, which, according to Sir Frederick Bruce, contained 1,500,000 inhabitants, was allowed to fall into the hands of the Taepings, and to become a desert like other great cities of China, a vast responsibility would fall upon the Government, from which they would never be able to escape.

LORD NAAS said, that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs had commenced his speech by stating that he had listened with attention to many speeches made on this subject by himself (Lord Naas) and other Members on that side of the House, who condemned the policy of the Government with respect to China, but that he had failed to find out what those opponents wanted. Now what was "wanted" had been explained over and over again. What was wanted was a policy of absolute neutrality between the two contending parties, and the issuing of strict orders to all our diplomatic, naval and military employés that they should abstain altogether from mixing themselves up with the internal affairs of China. That had not been the policy of Her Majesty's Government since about six months after the signature of the Treaty of Tien-tsin; and if they were now returning to the policy which Earl Russell laid down in his despatch about that time, it was because they had tried a different policy and it had failed. It was true that he and those who agreed with him in condemning the policy of the Government had always admitted the necessity of defending the treaty ports, and protecting the enormous amount of British property which was to be found in the towns and cities of China; but they had always maintained that our interference with the internal affairs of the empire endangered the safety of that property and was calculated to defeat the objects which the Government professed to have at heart. Last year he showed that with regard to three essential particulars the policy of the Government had been one essentially of interference, and he ventured to predict that on all these points it would be a failure. He was surprised to see how quickly his prediction had been fulfilled. The three institutions in China established by our Government were the Inspectorship of Customs, the flotilla under Captain Sherard Osborn, and what was called the Anglo-Chinese force under a very gallant gentleman Major Gordon, and what had been the results? The foreign Inspector of Customs had been ignominiously dismissed; the flotilla, which went out under the command of Captain Sherard Osborn, had been as ignominiously withdrawn and disbanded; the Anglo-Chinese force was at present in a most critical state, and its maintenance would be so fruitful a source of danger to our relations with the Chinese Government, that he did not believe that the Ministry would long be able to uphold it. The Under Secretary of State having taken credit for the success of the Government policy in China, it was necessary that he should show the House what the Government had really done with reference to these matters. He would not go minutely into the history of Captain Osborn's expedition, but would refer to only one or two points to show with what carelessness and almost recklessness the Government went into that most wild and extraordinary scheme. Before the expedition sailed last year he (Lord Naas) denounced it as impolitic and dangerous, and ventured to say that the Government had taken upon themselves, without authority from a Foreign Government, to despatch to it a large armed squadron. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs contradicted him flatly upon that point, and stated that the persons who had come to England to organize the expedition were armed with full and complete powers, and had satisfied the Government upon that subject. What were those powers? He found that Earl Russell very naturally suggested that Mr. Lay should produce some written authority from the Chinese Government before the consent of the Foreign Office was given to his request, or the Orders in Council were repealed. Mr. Lay's answer was that he had received such an authority—from whom?—from Mr. Hart, who was his own locum tenens in the Inspectorship of Customs during his absence from China. Mr. Lay said he had received a despatch from Mr. Hart urging the sending out of the vessels. The Chinese Foreign Board had no doubt told Mr. Hart that if he could send them any vessels they should be glad to receive them; but there was no written authority from the Chinese Government stating on what conditions this force was to be raised, or what treatment it was to receive when it arrived in China. Sir Frederick Bruce himself said that, although the fleet left England in the winter, it was not until the arrival of Mr. Lay in China in the following spring that the Chinese Government had any intimation of the position of affairs, of the cost of the vessels, or of the nature of the undertaking entered into by Mr. Lay. Therefore if our Government was not in ignorance as to the intentions of that of China, the Chinese Government was in total ignorance as to the cost, the intentions, and the objects of this expedition; and yet the Under

Secretary of State assured the House that the Government knew all about it and were in perfect accord with the Chinese Government and with Mr. Lay, who had come to this country armed with full powers to negotiate. If that was not keeping the House in the dark he did not know what it was. Parliament adjourned, the fleet sailed, and came to an ignominious end. There was a still more serious matter connected with these negotiations, to which he must call attention, because it showed how very suspicious was the nature of the whole affair. Mr. Lay and Captain Osborn made an agreement between themselves in this country which came to this, that Captain Osborn was to have the entire control of the vessels, and that he undertook to act upon all orders of the Emperor conveyed to him through Mr. Lay; but that Mr. Lay was not to give any orders unless he approved them himself. So that Captain Osborn was to be entirely under the control of Mr. Lay, and was to receive his orders from no one else, although nominally in the service of the Emperor of China. There was, however, a sort of agreement between the Chinese Government and Mr. Hart, and it had been stated that Mr. Lay must have been conversant with an agreement that Captain Osborn should be associated with a Chinese officer of high rank, who should control all matters relative to the fleet. He did not know whether or no the Government was cognizant of this fact. When this arrangement was found out, it was not surprising that indignant opinions should have been expressed on the subject. It was clear that Her Majesty's Government were entirely imposed upon by the representations made to them. So little indeed did they think of the importance of this expedition, that they sent out no instructions to the Ambassador at China when the expedition sailed, from which Sir Frederick Bruce inferred that Earl Russell could have no intention of being a party to the engagement. It was entirely owing to this neglect on the part of the Government and the carelessness with which the expedition was sent forth, that British officers and the British name had been subject to such an indignity as the contemptuous dismissal of Captain Osborn. It was impossible, in his opinion, to continue these Anglo-Chinese expeditions, to which he took exception last year. The great difficulty in China was, that the central authority was weak and the local authority strong; and he agreed with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden), that the evils that afflicted the Chinese Empire were not likely to be remedied by these proceedings, and that no act of ours ought to increase them. These contingents had done more to weaken the central authority and strengthen the corrupt local Government of the mandarins than anything else could have done in China. The House would be surprised to hear that Major Gordon and his officers were not in the service of the Emperor of China at all. They were under the orders of the Futai of Shanghai, an almost independent Prince, who habitually set at naught the orders he received from Peking. Let him implore the House to consider the disgrace that was brought upon British names and British arms by any man wearing Her Majesty's uniform being in command of such a force. He would remind the House that an act of the grossest treachery had been committed, contrary to the wish, but under the very nose of the officer commanding the force. An agreement for the capitulation of a town was made between the chiefs and Major Gordon, but as soon as the Imperial General got them in his power he cut off their heads. In another disgraceful case seven Chinamen were tortured in the very camp and station occupied by Her Majesty's forces. He alluded to these occurrences to show that it was impossible to continue this species of assistance to the Chinese without being mixed up in these abominable acts. Take the case of Colonel Burgevine, who succeeded to the command of the Foreign contingent after the death of Colonel Ward. He was dismissed by the Chinese Government, in opposition to the opinion of Sir Frederick Bruce, who thought it safer that the force should be under the command of a foreigner than under the command of an Englishman. He deserted to the Taepings, where he shot his second in command. He then left the Taepings and returned to the Imperial territory. Major Gordon thought it of great importance to get this man back into the Imperial service. What proposal did he make to Major Gordon?—that as they were both tired of serving the Taepings and the Imperialists, it would be better for them to set up for themselves, and create an army and an altogether independent Power in China. He then made a piratical attempt on a steamer at Shanghai, and was at last sent out of the country by the American Consul. The truth was, that these Eastern waters were so infested by men of Burgevine's stamp, that it was impossible to officer the Chinese forces without having recourse to their assistance. It was perfectly impossible that any course of action at all creditable to this country, or in accordance with the general feeling, could be carried on with such tools as were to be found at our disposal in China. No wonder, therefore, that the Chinese Futai should have said that actions such as those of Burgevine and his comrades were altogether without the pale of civilization. It was deeply to be regretted that any countryman of ours should be mixed up in the unfortunate events that had occurred. He wished to say nothing disrespectful of the English gentlemen who were engaged in those affairs. He believed many of them were gallant men, and wished to serve their country; but he feared that daily contact with the people they had to do with, and with the scenes which they had to witness, would, in the end, blunt the finest sensibility. He greatly feared in the case of Major Gordon that, as a Chinese commander, he had witnessed and participated in acts which the young engineer officer in the Crimea ten years ago would have recoiled from with horror. No doubt the temptation was very great, and very large sums were offered for the services of such men. By the blue-book upon the table it would be seen that Mr. Lay himself made upwards of £10,000 in the last year. Those temptations ought not to be held out to British officers, and he implored the Government to prevent British subjects from yielding to them whenever they could.

But to turn to another subject. He was somewhat surprised at the repeated statements made by the Under Secretary (Mr. Layard), that the opinion of the men of most influence and authority on China was in favour of the policy of the Government. The hon. Gentleman had endeavoured on various occasions to show "that the policy of Her Majesty's Government had been approved by the merchants in the East, by missionaries, by naval and military authorities, by Sir Frederick Bruce, and Mr. Burlinghame, and he hoped it would be approved by the House." Now, he (Lord Naas) thought he could show that every one of the authorities quoted by the hon. Gentleman had, individually and collectively, expressed his disapproval of that policy. With regard to the missionaries, taking as an instance

Dr. Legg, who had spent the greater portion of his life in China, who was a ripe Chinese scholar, and whose personal predilections would incline him to a favourable view, he had condemned the policy of the Government two or three different times. Sir Frederick Bruce had pronounced an emphatic condemnation of that policy; he showed how impossible it was that the flotilla could succeed, and was delighted at having got rid of it, and his opinion of the contingent was equally unfavourable. He said—

“ I am of opinion that unless the force be properly constituted and relieved from the necessity of obeying the orders of the local Governors, it will do no real and permanent good, and that the officer who commands it will speedily find himself in a position neither compatible with his professional reputation nor with what is due to the character of a British officer.”

He could not but express his astonishment that the hon. Gentleman should to-night have repeated the statement which he had made on a previous occasion as to the views of the merchants in China with regard to our policy. The memorandum of the Chamber of Commerce of Hong Kong had been already read to the House. But the hon. Gentleman said that was not the opinion of Shanghai merchants. But anybody that knew anything about China was aware that the Hong Kong merchants were intimately connected with Shanghai, and he had himself received a personal assurance on the subject from a gentleman who had large trading transactions with Shanghai. [Mr. LAYARD: What I said with regard to the unanimous testimony of merchants and missionaries was with reference to the Taepings.] That was not what the hon. Gentleman had stated, because he had his words there, and they were to the effect that the policy of the Government in China had been approved of by the merchants in China. And besides, they must take the rebellion as it stood, and when the hon. Gentleman spoke of the policy of Her Majesty's Government in China they could not pick out this or that particular part of it. However, he (Lord Naas) distinctly affirmed that even the policy of the Government with regard to the Taepings, had been disapproved by all the authorities he had quoted. The hon. Gentleman had read a portion of a despatch from Mr. Burlinghame, the American Minister, as if he and the other representatives of the Foreign Powers approved of the policy of Her Majesty's Government. He (Lord Naas) had taken the trouble to discover that despatch, and he found that instead of being favourable it was perhaps the strongest thing that had ever been written against the policy of Her Majesty's Government in China. Mr. Burlinghame stated that he gathered together the representatives of the Foreign Powers in Peking in order to come to some joint understanding, the principal object being to alter the policy which had been carried on by Her Majesty's Government, and to return to the policy of total and absolute neutrality. And first he quoted the opinion of Sir Frederick Bruce to the effect that he did not wish that any English officer should lead troops against the Taepings; he would much prefer that the Chinese should take men from the smaller States of Europe, and relieve England from being considered the bully of the East. Mr. Burlinghame said that he was for a change of policy, declaring that the course of policy which had been pursued was wrong. This was in the very despatch of which the hon. Gentleman quoted a portion the other day to prove that Mr. Burlinghame and Sir Frederick Bruce approved the policy of the Government; and Mr. Burlinghame went on to congratulate his Government that he had been able to persuade Sir Frederick Bruce to write a despatch strongly disapproving the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and recommending an instant change. It was clear that Mr. Burlinghame expected that Sir Frederick Bruce's despatch would be published in England, and he hoped that they would soon have an opportunity of seeing it, for it would show beyond question that Sir Frederick Bruce disapproved of the policy of Her Majesty's Government in China. It appeared also that Mr. Burlinghame wrote to his Government to the effect that if he had known the constitution and nature of Captain Osborn's force, he would have objected to its employment, unless commanded by a mixture of officers, and not placed entirely at the disposal of an English captain. No one could read these despatches without being of opinion that they were opposed to the sense in which they were quoted by the hon. Gentleman the other evening. It was notorious that Sir John Hope did not approve Captain Osborn's expedition; and no doubt Captain Osborn would have as strongly condemned, had his opinion been asked, Major Gordon's contingent. He thought that he had now disposed of the various authorities which the hon.

Gentleman had quoted for his policy, and shown that they, one and all, concurred in strong condemnation of it. Any hon. Member reading the blue-books—and particularly the last blue-book—must be struck with the absence of any explanation on the part of the Government as to the various important questions which arose. It might be that European diplomacy had, within the last six months, overtaken the powers of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, but certainly he had found but little time to devote to the affairs of China. He could not help thinking, however, that American and Asiatic affairs were as worthy of attention as were the struggles which were being carried on in Europe. It was true that we had always supposed ourselves to be a first-rate European Power, though the events of the last six months might perhaps have changed that opinion. But in Europe we divided with other nations the supremacy of the Western world. In Asia the case was different. In Asia, England was all powerful, and its influence was paramount. England was in possession of an empire in India, by the side of which every other Asiatic Power was entirely dwarfed, and out of this state of things arose the relations of this country with China. When it was remembered that China contained 350,000,000 of inhabitants, those relations did certainly seem to him sufficiently important to justify the devotion to them of a large portion of interest and attention on the part of any one presiding over the Foreign Office. When it was recollected that during the last twenty years much of English blood and treasure had been spent in China with little honour, it behoved those who conducted the foreign affairs of this country to be, at all events, careful that nothing was done in China without their special and direct authority. But he had carefully read the last blue-books, and he did not find in them any indication of any policy whatever on the part of Her Majesty's Government. The affairs of China were left to take their course, and the consequence was, this country was drifted into difficulties and dangers in connection with that part of the world; and it was owing to good fortune, rather than to any other cause, that we had not found ourselves in a most serious scrape. This circumstance assumed importance when it was considered how necessary it was that, in dealing with a people so peculiar as the Chinese, the English should consistently endeavour to set them a good example. The Chinese were most jealous of foreign interference, and, until lately, they excluded all foreigners from China. Such being the case, it behoved us to be especially careful to show them that we had no political object in view but the promotion of our commerce; that we were not moved by any desire of aggrandisement; that our only desire was that they should faithfully observe the treaty they had entered into with us, and to show them how national honour also demanded the fulfilment of national obligation. He feared, however, that what had occurred since the Treaty of Tien-tsin had impressed the Chinese with a totally different opinion, and had tended not to remove, but to increase old jealousies. The belief was deep-rooted in the mind of Orientals that Europeans never undertook an enterprise without having a selfish end in view, and he regretted that our conduct had tended to strengthen them in such an impression. When they saw an Englishman at the head of their Customs; when they saw an army commanded by British officers—an army which had proved so successful that the Chinese had denominated them as the “ever victorious” troops, and when they saw a strong fleet coming into their waters under the command of a foreigner, he did not wonder that they thought they saw the footsteps of a Power which had upset so many Eastern monarchies. They saw the danger, and they took the alarm, and as soon as Captain Sherard Osborn appeared they made up their minds that they preferred their existing state to the prevalence of foreign dominion. There were three great Powers besides England which had a direct and very considerable intercourse with China—France, America, and Russia. The interest the Americans took in the affairs of China might be learned from the despatches of Mr. Burlingame, the American Minister at Peking. France had a great object in view in China. Her great object was not connected with trade or commerce, but was strictly ecclesiastical, but not on that account the less important. The French people, and especially the French clergy, took a deep interest in this matter. There was now a French force organized at Ningpo, with the direct view of watching over French interests. The Jesuit missionaries were labouring diligently in China, and had been forward to render their services in elevating the education of the officials of that country. But Russia had far greater interests. She had lately acquired a large seaboard in China, extending over nearly a thousand miles, and by means of telegraphic establishments, St. Petersburg was already within fourteen days' communication of Peking, and probably before long this would be reduced to three or four days. Besides this, it was the intention of Russia to form a large maritime and military station, and we might probably see before long a new Sebastopol springing up, furnished with all the defences which science could supply, and which would form a standing menace to our interests in the Pacific. If we persisted in lending our officers to the Chinese, why might not other nations do the same; and thus they might have a French contingent, a Russian contingent, and perhaps an American contingent. He hoped the Under Secretary would have announced the discontinuance of the employment of British subjects under the Chinese Government. With respect to the remarks of the hon. Member for Rochdale, he (Lord Naas) thought the policy he had indicated was hardly possible at present. Extra-territorial jurisdiction was no doubt an evil, but in China it was a necessary one. He believed it would be impossible to hand over British subjects to be treated according to Chinese law, though such an end might be kept in view. A large population had been drawn to the concessions, and at Shanghai there were about half a million of people living upon the British concession, and in some cases they had taken the opportunity of drawing off numbers of the inhabitants; but these foreign concessions required the utmost attention, or they might find that they would become fruitful sources of doubt and disputation hereafter. He was glad that the hon. Member for Rochdale had intimated that probably he should not take the sense of the House upon this question. The time for Resolutions had gone by. Some of the matters to which objection had been taken were now at an end. He found that the fleet which had been fitted out under the direct control of the Admiralty, and with the consent of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was wholly at an end, and he was glad to hear that the Order in Council had been revoked, and was not to be issued again. He should like to know how the revocation of that Order would affect the officers engaged in the Anglo-Chinese expedition. The policy of Her Majesty's Government had entirely failed in China. He had said last year, that their success or their failure would prove the subject of equal apprehension. They had witnessed the ignominious withdrawal of Captain Osborn's fleet, and they were apprehensive of the misfortunes that had probably overtaken Major Gordon, and he thought it would be inexcusable obstinacy to persevere in the same course, by which they would be further involving themselves in results which must lead to disappointment and disaster.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he thought the House were indebted to the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) for having given them an opportunity for the full discussion of this Question. After the able speech of the hon. Member and the eloquent remarks of his noble Friend the Member for Cockermonth (Lord Naas), he should not take up the time of the House, only it was due to the hon. Member that those who agreed with him should state their sentiments on this occasion. The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in replying to the speech of the hon. Member for Rochdale, quoted figures, the accuracy of which he for one disputed; but, assuming them to be correct, the hon. Member treated this Question too much as one of trade, and did not seem to regard it as one affecting the dignity, the honour, and the character of this country. He felt that the honour, interests, and character of England had suffered by the policy which our Government had pursued in the East. If he wanted a proof of the evil results of that policy he should find it in the fact that there was now crossing the sea the vessel that carried the revocation of the Order in Council of 1862-3, allowing British subjects to serve in China. That revocation had been sent out before we received the painful intelligence which appeared for the first time in the newspapers of yesterday morning. What, he asked, would be the effect produced in China when they learned the terms of the revocation, and that Major Gordon would not be permitted to serve any longer with the Chinese troops, and when they considered that this step had been taken suddenly following the great defeat which he had experienced? This defeat, it appeared, took place at a distance of only seventy miles from the city of Ningpo, the radius of which was thirty miles. The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs seemed to dispute that point; but any person who would take the trouble of reading the blue-book would find that thirty miles was the extreme radius. Whether the troops were Chinese or European it was quite evident that they were commanded by Major Gordon and other English officers, who became thereby responsible for the acts of the men under them. And what was the result of this battle? It was most serious as regarded this country, inasmuch as no less than 14 British officers and 115 men fell in the action, which had been severely contested, the rebels having defended themselves apparently with the courage of despair. Well, it was after those defeats, that the despatch had been forwarded requiring Major Gordon and the English officers to withdraw from the military service of China. Let the House consider for a moment what an effect the receipt of such a despatch would have on the prestige of our arms in China. That was one of the evil results of our intermeddling policy in the East. That policy had occasioned us much mischief, and never was it more mischievously carried out than in China. He had heard it said in that House that it was useless to discuss this Question, inasmuch as the events which they might have controlled had already occurred. It appeared, however, to him important that that House should express its opinion upon these matters in relation to which instructions had been sent out to China. The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs spoke of the benefits enjoyed by our trade with China; but he (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) should like to know what were the expenses we incurred in the various China wars in which we had been involved. It would be an interesting piece of information to learn what the losses were which this country had sustained by the policy of our Government; then to make a debtor and creditor account, and ascertain by the results whether this country had lost or gained by this meddling policy of our Ministers. It was a melancholy fact that not only had that policy resulted in positive evil to this country, but it had actually demoralized the Christian population in China. He believed that the whole of the East was against this policy. He would refer to two or three authorities, and they would find that those persons who were best capable of judging of the state of things in China bitterly lamented the misconduct of many of the British subjects in China, and he would venture to say of many British merchants there. The hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), who was deeply interested in the trade of the East, told the Government the other night that they must not be coming periodically to the taxpayers of this country for money to enable them to carry out their objectionable policy. Speaking to the merchants of Shanghai, Lord Elgin said—

“Neither our own consciences nor the judgment of mankind will acquit us. When we are asked to what use we have turned our opportunities, we can only say we have filled our pockets from among the ruins we have found or made. An eminent French writer has observed that it is one of the glories of Christian civilization that it has caused a sentiment of repentance to find a place in the hearts of nations; let us hope that it will not be by pointing this moral that Great Britain, when she comes to review her connection with the furthest East, will make good her claim to the title of a Christian nation.”

A gentleman, long resident in China, wrote in 1860—

“Our own advantage has been the regulating principle of our policy. We make exactions when it suits us, and do not exact them when inconvenient. Our diplomacy has resulted in confusion worse confounded. We shall probably now have to overthrow a Government we have been endeavouring to support. Had we been more considerate we should now have less to deplore.”

The misconduct of our traders was not a matter of yesterday. Two hundred years ago Dryden wrote of them—

“Industrious of the needle and the chart,
They rush full tilt to the Japonian mart;
Bereft of shame, and prodigal of fame,
Sell all of Christian to the very name.”

And these lines were applicable to the conduct of too many of our merchants still. This was the language of Sir Rutherford Alcock on this subject—

“We are threatened with the same dangers now, by persons wholly regardless of what may happen if they can only secure their own temporary advantage. But it is the business and the duty of all foreign representatives to prevent a few individuals thus endangering the relations and damaging the permanent interests of nations. It is better that there should be no trade than a trade carried on under such conditions as those which it has been attempted to impose. It is better that there should be no intercourse than relations of ill-will and conflict, threatening only war as a final result.

It certainly was very humiliating that periodically these lectures should be read to British merchants to teach them how to conduct themselves in their relations with foreign countries. The hon. Gentleman said, that Sir Frederick Bruce approved all that had been done in China; but such was not the fact. So far from Sir Frederick Bruce approving the policy of the Government, he had throughout conducted himself in a most able and proper manner, placed as he was in a most difficult position.

Writing in one of his despatches with respect to the conduct of our Consuls, he said—

"I have also to observe that the Chinese Government in employing foreigners in its Custom House is doing what Foreign Powers have advised her to do, and following a system of improvement which in other countries has led to the best results. I expect Her Majesty's Consuls to set an example to foreign communities of treating with respect the gentlemen who hold these important offices, and who are not inferior to them either in character or social position. It is your duty in this way to strengthen their influence with the Chinese provincial authorities, as it is to that influence that we must look for the peaceful execution of treaty privileges, and for the gradual introduction of progressive ideas into Chinese administration which will enable us to accommodate its maxims to the growing development of trade."

The hon. Gentleman was, therefore, greatly mistaken in supposing that our policy had the approval of Sir Frederick Bruce, though it might have the approval of a great many subordinate officials in China, and of those who were prepared to take advantage of the confusion which they created in that quarter. Mr. Burlingame, he might add, distinctly laid down, with Sir Frederick Bruce, the principles on which we were to interfere at all, which was simply to defend the treaty ports against the Taepings, but in such a way as not to make war on that considerable body of the Chinese people; and Mr. Seward, in reply to the despatch setting forth that policy, characterized it as wise and just towards the Chinese. And what, he would ask, was the cause of the rebellion in China? It appeared to him (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) that the manner in which we had conducted ourselves towards the Chinese Government on the question of the opium trade had given great force to the rebellion in China. Our policy at that time tended greatly to humiliate the Chinese Government, and thereby indirectly to give encouragement to the Taepings in their rebellion. Much had been said about the barbarities of the Taepings, but he thought that that was a mere assertion made use of by the Government and its supporters to excuse the course which they had taken against that people. He had read many works on the subject, and he could not find any foundation for the charges of cruelty and barbarity brought against the Taepings. The atrocities committed by the Chinese authorities were perfectly horrible. If the Taepings were as bad as they were represented to be, he did think that even then there was much to choose between the two parties; but on reading the other day a very interesting work on the subject he found a very different account given of the Taepings from that which appeared to be generally accepted as correct. Mr. Forrest, in a work published in 1862, said of them—

"It is impossible to live among the people a long time and not take an interest in them, and in a certain way to like them. I have met with not only civility, but actual courtesy from them, and shall never regret the time I have spent among them. Heaven forbid that England or France should ever make confusion worse confounded by interfering in the struggle now raging. After seeing a great deal of both parties, I must confess I have no better opinion of one than of the other."

Now, we might talk of a selfish policy and the necessity of pursuing a particular course in the interests of commerce, which seemed to consist in killing our customers; but let us not in support of such a policy as that which we pursued in China invoke the name of civilization and the interests of humanity. We seemed, in fact, to act on the principle of interfering everywhere, and our policy in the East was most ridiculous and inconsistent. One day we fought against a great Power in the East, and the very next allowed our fellow-countrymen to aid in strengthening it as much as possible. The plea of humanity was put forward in defence of the course which we took; but if that was the true ground of our interference in China, how came it to pass that we did not interfere in the struggle which was going on at the other side of the Atlantic? On the same principle on which our officers were allowed to fight the battles of the Chinese we might have permitted recruiting and interfered in the struggle in America. The reason of the difference which was made between the two countries was that America was a powerful and China was a weak one. If it was said that the Government had done what they had out of regard to the national honour and dignity, he replied that they might have interfered in a country nearer home, the sufferings of which had been caused by their foolish intervention and perpetual meddling. Allowing our men to go and fight in a quarrel in which they had no concern was nothing better than murder, and it was peculiarly disgraceful that we should adopt such a course at the very time when Switzerland, which in former times permitted its subjects to sell their blood to foreigners, had abandoned that practice. The House and the country were much indebted to the hon. Member for Rochdale for having brought this subject on after the two "counts out" that had taken place upon it, and for his clear statement and exposition of our policy in the East. If it should have the effect of putting an end to this kind of intervention, which was as criminal as it was objectionable, not this country only but the whole world and civilization itself would owe him a deep debt of gratitude.

MR. LIDDELL said, that after the indulgence the House had accorded to him on two former occasions he should not detain them long; but the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had used what he (Mr. Liddell) considered was an unfortunate expression that night, which required some answer. The hon. Gentleman said that if Her Majesty's Government had reversed their policy in China disastrous circumstances would have followed. He thought he should be able to show that Her Majesty's Government had reversed their policy in China, and that, nevertheless, disastrous circumstances had ensued owing to that erroneous policy. When the last accounts left China a distinguished officer, holding Her Majesty's commission, was lying severely wounded far in the interior of the country. He had lost a large number of his officers and many others were wounded. His assistance was cut off, and he was opposed by an army flushed with victory, and composed of the most warlike, ferocious, and hardy portion of the population of China, and they might hear by the next mail—which God forbid!—that that gallant officer and the whole of his force were cut off. That state of things, he contended, had been occasioned by the policy of Her Majesty's Government. The Government at first allowed British officers to detach themselves from their regiments for the purpose of joining the Chinese, but they had since rescinded that Order in Council. They were right in doing so, but their previous policy in employing English officers to lead the Chinese in the field had not met with the approval of any of the authorities in China. One of the worst features of that policy had been to teach the Chinese to distrust their own native leaders. The Taepings had discovered that native troops led by English officers triumphed over those led by native officers, and the consequence was that they had availed themselves of the services of adventurers, and he had no doubt it would turn out hereafter that the disasters they had recently heard of were to be attributed to the generalship of those foreign leaders.

Had General Burgevine remained in the ranks of the Taepings it was difficult to say what might have been the result. They might depend upon it that if this war continued—as there was too much reason to fear it would—there would be different bands of adventurers opposed to each other in that country, led by foreign leaders, which would have the effect of lengthening beyond its natural limits this unhappy internal struggle. The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs said that the rebels did not keep treaty engagements. He (Mr. Liddell), on the contrary, had always felt a strong conviction that we ourselves had not observed good faith in our dealings with the Chinese. An Englishman's word was his bond, and he held that it was the same with nations as it was with individuals. We pledged ourselves after the Treaty of Tien-tsin to observe a strict neutrality between the contending parties—and how had that pledge been carried out? But it was neither fair nor correct to assert that the Taepings—ruffians as they were according to the noble Viscount—had failed to keep their word. However low they might be in the social scale it should be remembered that we were a great civilized nation, and that it was our bounden duty not to lower our standard of political morality to the level of those degraded beings, but to raise them up to our own. So far as he had been able to ascertain, from study and careful examination, he believed that their conduct contrasted nobly in this affair with ours, and he challenged a contradiction of his statement. The supporters of the Government had placed the opposition to the Chinese policy on a false issue. The Opposition Members had never denied that it was the duty of Her Majesty's Government to protect our gigantic interests in China by a defence of the treaty ports, and if they had contented themselves with doing that it would have been all right; the rebels would have recognized our right to do so, and would never have attempted to interfere with us. But we had done otherwise, and had carried the war into the country, and had followed them into the middle of the silk districts, which was a great mistake. They had made enemies of people who were prepared to have been their friends; and ever since they had carried war into those districts the silk supply had fallen off. On the 14th April this year the silk from those districts was 350 bales for the fortnight against 800 bales for the corresponding fortnight last year, and 2,000 bales for the corresponding period in the year preceding. That was a tremendous falling off. The supplies of silk reached us regularly, as long as we did not interfere with the rebels. There was no doubt that we had supported the Chinese Government; we had re-established its authority; and the Taepings knew it; and having thus made enemies of these people they ravaged the silk districts by way of revenge. We had nobody but ourselves to blame for this result. The present stock of silk in hand was only 3,500 bales, against 8,000 bales at the same time last year. These were very serious things, and were the result of the policy of the Government—that policy from which they now receded, inasmuch as it had proved to be a mistaken one, and had indeed died a natural death. He wished only to say a word more before he sat down. He wanted to know for a certainty what the effect of the repeal of the Order in Council would be. He did hope that they would have a distinct statement that its application was retrospective, and not only prospective. Did it apply to Major Gordon, Captain Cooke, and those other officers who had permission given them by the original Order in Council to enter the Chinese service? He wanted to get rid of all quibbles, and to know whether it applied to all British officers serving at the head of Chinese troops. He hoped they would have an assurance to this effect. There was another important point which had never yet been cleared up. He wanted to know by what authority and at whose instance Major Gordon was appointed—because everybody in China whose opinions had any weight condemned that appointment. He desired also to know really and truly whether Major Gordon had ever held a commission direct from the Sovereign of the country in which he was engaged in warfare; because if he had not held a commission there he had been a filibuster, and was no better than a pirate on the high seas. He trusted that once for all we had done with British interference in the internal affairs of that country. He thanked the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) for lending the weight of his abilities, his commercial authority, and his high position as a statesman in this country, to this cause, which really was the cause of justice, the cause of humanity, and moreover the cause that was most likely to benefit the very trade which the policy of the Government was calculated to destroy.

Mr. GREGSON said, he had supported the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) in his agitation for free trade, but he could not concur in much that he had said with regard to our policy in China. The hon. Gentleman had said truly that our objects in China were simply commercial, and he (Mr. Gregson) would have been delighted that our relations with that country had never been otherwise. He concurred with the hon. Member that it would be desirable next Session to have a Select Committee to inquire into our commercial relations with China; but he could not agree with him in thinking that those relations were unsatisfactory, because, whatever might be the internal dissensions of that country we had maintained amicable relations with the Government de facto. The hon. Gentleman said that we were the cause of the present state of things in China, and that we should drive that empire into anarchy. But it had been often stated in that House that China had been in a state of anarchy for a very long period, and it was not owing to us that anarchy had prevailed, was prevailing, and, he feared, long would continue to prevail there. He did not, however, intend to enter into that question. His hon. and gallant Friend near him (Colonel Sykes) suggested to him that he ought to say a good word for the policy of the Government, as there was no one else to do so, and that was the reason why he stood up there to make a few remarks. He was afraid the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Rochdale with regard to opening small free ports would be impracticable. In the first place, by so doing they would have to derange all the present establishments, and in the second place they would have to get the concurrence of the Chinese authorities. Now, Hong Kong had been established as a free port, but as compared with Shanghai it had not been at all successful. The hon. Gentleman alluded to the recommendations made by the Duke of Wellington. Those recommendations might have been all very well for that time, but we had got far beyond that point now. The noble Lord (Lord Naas) in his very able speech had appealed to the opinions of the merchants in China. But he (Mr. Gregson) had taken great pains to ascertain from a large number of gentlemen connected with the China trade what their views were with regard to the proceedings and policy of the Government, and the answers he had received to a series of questions to several eminent firms were in general effect that the past policy of the Government deserved approval. With the permission of the House he would read to the House a few extracts from these replies. [The hon. Member accordingly read passages from the papers referred to, stating that the Imperial Government was the only established Government in the country, and that the Taepings were only marauders.] Notwithstanding the devastations of the Taepings the exports of tea and silk from China had largely increased, and last year not fewer than 160,000 bales of raw cotton was sent from China, and relief was thus afforded to the manufacturing districts of England. The trade with China was, besides, of considerable importance to the revenue of this country, for the payment of the duty on tea yielded a revenue of about £4,500,000 a year, and during the last thirty years the enormous sum of £160,000,000 had been paid into the Exchequer from that source. But he did not argue the case merely on commercial grounds. Our intervention was demanded on the ground of humanity and for the protection of British subjects.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he had refrained for the last two years from taking part in the China debates, because his predictions with respect to the policy of the Government had been completely verified, and because he did not see any way out of the difficulties into which that policy had led us. But little as he agreed in the course which the Government had adopted with respect to China, still less could he agree with the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) in his plan for extricating us out of our embarrassing position. He had always held that our policy in China should be to support the Chinese chiefs in the provinces where we traded, to support the Imperial Government, and not to break in upon the much cherished privacy of their capital and so destroy the prestige of the rulers of the country. Those bands of marauders who were now called Taepings, but who went under different names at different times, had long been the bane of China. When he first visited that empire, which was in 1820, he saw villages that those ruffians had set fire to, and the marks of their brutality on the bodies of those whom they had plundered. Brigandage was the normal condition of affairs in China. It was caused by the descent of hordes from the more sterile districts, in which the population became too numerous for the means of support upon the fertile valleys and their industrious populations. Somehow or another those hordes were kept down by the Government of China until our attacks had broken down its prestige, and he feared it would no longer be able to make head against these ruthless villains without European assistance. He did not believe the hon. Member for Rochdale's plan of free ports on islands practicable in China. The conformation of the Chinese coast, lined by an archipelago of islands, afforded a refuge to the piratical hordes which abounded there, and it would be impossible to trade with safety to our merchants unless these hordes of pirates were smoked out. It appeared to him that the only mode of carrying on commerce with China was through the treaty ports. We were bound to extend our protection to every man trading under the British flag; but, at the same time, he should like to see some general code of laws by which foreign nations could join in such protection. He should like to see itinerant magistrates, who, searching out evil-doers, should let the Imperial Government know that justice had been vindicated. Besides this, in concert with our Allies, we ought to adopt active measures to put down piracy in the Chinese waters; and there was no reason why we should not have a treaty in respect to that great navigable river in China which, under God, would, he believed, afford us the means of introducing European civilization into the heart of the Chinese Empire. It was said in the theology of China, that when making the world the Creator took a pair of bamboo compasses, and putting one leg into the spot where Pekin now stood drew a circle, and so marked out the world, which was China. The hon. Member for Rochdale drew a circle of which he made Manchester the centre. But his speech was a repetition of speeches that were delivered when the removal of the East India Company's charter was under discussion in that House. It had been found that the Chinese would not take our woollens. The reason was, Russia sent into China woollen material more suitable to the tastes and habits of the Chinese. He had never believed that the introduction of the opium trade was a disadvantage to China. The food of the lower classes of China—a great deal of pork, sour vegetables, and vinegar—was of a character to produce intestinal disorders, and the little whiff of opium which they took after their meals was of great benefit to them. It was perfectly impossible for a man to make a beast of himself on opium under £120 a year. He hardly saw his way clearly out of the position into which our policy in China had brought us. It certainly was impracticable to adopt the course recommended by the hon. Member for Rochdale; but by taking up the matter with a strong hand and undertaking to curb the disorderly spirits who had been attracted to China by the love of gain, and who plundered the poor Chinese, by establishing a police force of gunboats along the rivers, we might produce some effect. By no manner of means ought we ever to have anything to do with the Taepings, for a more bloodthirsty, horrible set of scoundrels never existed on God's earth. Nothing had ever shown that they were likely to establish a form of Government. They had no idea of anything but rapine and licentiousness. Certainly he would be no party to recommending the Government to abandon the footing we had in China, but no doubt the Committee suggested by the hon. Gentleman opposite might be useful in devising a remedy for the evils of the present state of things.

Mr. WHITE thought the policy which had been recommended by the hon. and gallant Member (Sir James Elphinstone) must lead to a considerable augmentation in the expenditure we had already incurred in China. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had certainly kept his constituents in mind. He had often told the House of the gunboats which were lying at Portsmouth doing nothing, and if his advice were adopted there soon would be plenty for all of them to do. [Sir JAMES ELPHINSTONE: They are all rotten.] He could quite believe the hon. Member for Lancaster (Mr. Gregson) that many gentlemen having a large stake in China praised highly the noble Lord and his policy; but what the House had to consider was, not the interest of a single class of traders, but of the British taxpayers. He could not but take notice at what a cost had our trade with China been purchased. In his Budget speech of 1863, the Chancellor of the Exchequer told the House of Commons that they had to face a war expenditure of £8,800,000, of which in round numbers £7,000,000 was caused by the war in China; and it was no exaggeration to say that our Chinese policy at the very lowest estimate cost us an extra half million yearly. If on one side were set the trade we had gained, and on the other the sum it had cost us, it would be seen that there never was a policy which gave such barren results for such an enormous expenditure. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs would find on inquiry at his own office that his figures were ludicrously fallacious, and his facts were pretty much of the same value. At the same time, he could not altogether concur in the course recommended by the hon. Member for Rochdale. At the time of the Treaty of Nankin it was practicable, and he himself had urged the adoption of a similar policy upon Sir Henry Pottinger at that time. The course which the Government ought to pursue was to dissociate British subjects as much as possible from all connection with the Chinese Government. To accomplish that, within a certain area, Shanghai, Ningpo, Canton, and the other ports should be deemed free, and so leave the native merchants to make their own arrangements as to duties with their own Government on both imports and exports.

Mr. KINGLAKE said, he thought that the noble Lord the Member for Cocker-mouth (Lord Naas) at the close of his speech had used a phrase which might, perhaps, be understood in a sense very different from that intended. The noble Lord spoke of "the ignominious withdrawal" of the force under Captain Sherard Osborn. He felt assured that the noble Lord in saying so meant only that the policy which had originated the expedition had totally failed, and did not express any condemnation of the skill and ability of Captain Sherard Osborn personally. [Lord NAAS: Hear, hear!] If there was any fault which a microscopic mind could discover in the conduct of Captain Osborn, it was that he might, perhaps, be deemed too scrupulous as to the point of honour, and too resolute in determining to escape from a position in which he might have been subjected to orders which he thought no British officer could execute without loss of reputation. Great credit was due to the gallant officer for his behaviour in that respect, and also for the success with which he had brought home his force—a feat which could not have been accomplished except by a man possessed of high personal qualities and ascendancy of character. There lay before Captain Osborn and his men the prospect of much fame, and of wealth to a very large amount indeed; but these things could not tempt him, and such was his influence with his force that, of 500, less than thirty failed to return with him to England. He was sure the noble Lord would be glad of an opportunity to correct any misapprehension as to his meaning on this point.

LORD NAAS said, that nothing was further from his mind in the language he had used than to utter anything in the least disrespectful towards Captain Sherard Osborn. His remark applied not to the commander, but to the expedition generally and the policy on which it was based, intending to convey that he did not think that an expedition sent out under the control of the Government could be withdrawn without ignominy. He thought the whole conduct of Captain Osborn from the beginning to the end of the transaction was beyond all praise. He had shown an utter absence of selfishness, and a sense of what was due not only to himself as a British officer, but to the interest and honour of England.

COLONEL SYKES complained of the policy pursued by the Government, and hoped that neither the House nor the country would be misled by the fallacies put forward by the Under Secretary of State. The hon. Gentleman had tried to delude the House into the notion that the other Powers represented in China were pursuing the same policy as ourselves. On the contrary, while our policy was one of direct intervention on behalf of the Imperialists, and slaughtering the Taepings, the other Powers were resolved not to take any active measures, except in defence of the treaty ports when attacked, and not to allow any of their officers to serve under the Chinese. All that he had shown in Mr. Burlinghame's despatch of the 30th June, 1863, to the American Congress, in the counted out debate of the 21st May, and he would not go over the facts again. The hon. Gentleman was in the habit of describing the Taepings as a sort of human locusts, who destroyed the fertility of the countries through which they passed. Since May, 1860, the Taepings had been in possession of the two great silk provinces of Chekiang and Kiang-su, embracing a vast area of country, and a population of upwards of 60,000,000 souls, and a large proportion of the silk used in this country had been drawn thence. This could not have been possible if the assertions of his hon. Friend had any foundation in fact. He had, he might add, in his hand, monthly Returns of the exports of silk from Shanghai, part of which he had quoted in a former debate, and he found that while those exports amounted in 1860 to only 69,137 bales, they went on increasing until in 1864 they amounted to 83,264. And it had been stated in the evidence of European witnesses, the agents of Messrs. Hart and Co., of Ningpo, who were travelling in the districts to purchase silk, that from Ningpo up to Way-ho-kow, which lay on the verge of the thirty miles' radius of Shanghai, the country was flourishing and the inhabitants happy and contented, while within that radius its aspect was described as that of a desert. The crops in the neighbourhood of Soochow were reared by the Taepings, and the country was in a flourishing condition, to which numerous eye-witnesses bore testimony. Surely with such testimony the House must be satisfied that the Taepings could not be the devastating barbarians they were represented to be. In relation to the case of Major Gordon, it was painful to find that an officer in Her Majesty's service should have exposed himself to the odium which was heaped on that gentleman in China. The North China Herald, The Friend of China, and The Hong Kong Daily Press lamented that Major Gordon had condoned the treachery of the Futai of Shanghai, and had taken service with him again. Other newspapers had also condemned the conduct of Major Gordon in speaking of him as an "unprincipled soldier," and as a "mere mercenary;" and he regretted that Major Gordon, who had felt his position to be so irksome, and had tendered his resignation at one time, had not adhered to his resolution and come home. That gallant officer, in a letter addressed to a missionary, said that if half the pains had been expended upon the rebels which had been wasted upon the Imperialists the country would have been at peace long ago; and Admiral Hope, who had been cited as the direct opponent of the Taepings, in a letter dated 15th October, 1862, admitted that they had well observed agreements which they had entered into with him not to approach within thirty miles of Shanghai for a period of twelve months, and not to molest bona fide British vessels on the Yang-tze river. A friend of Major Gordon's, in a letter to The North China Herald, of the 27th February, 1864, says he only condoned the Futai's treachery when

"He had made him pay up to the last farthing some £27,000 for the wounded, and publish a proclamation taking the whole blame of the Soochow affair off his shoulders, and admit that he (the Futai) had acted wrongly."

This receipt of £27,000 before again taking service, to say the least of it, has an ugly look. It was said that, if the insurgents came to Shanghai, there would be an immense destruction of European life and property; but the fact was that they were for five months in possession of Ningpo, and during all that time they allowed trade to go on without molestation, and inflicted no injury upon Europeans. The Taepings had repeatedly offered to us the hand of friendship, but their despatches had been returned unopened, and we had never taken the trouble to ascertain whether we could make any arrangements with them or not. Our motive for maintaining the Imperial Government was based upon the selfish desire to secure the payment of the indemnity of eight millions of taels, about £1,300,000 of which still remained unpaid. Our acts in China in short had been dishonourable and disastrous, and were likely to be still more so in the future.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I am anxious to say a few words before the House comes to a determination on the Question which has been proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale. There has been this remarkable character in the discussion—that while my hon. Friend took a very wide view of the subject according to his notions, those who have followed him have taken a narrow and confined view of it, and have limited their observations chiefly to the recent transactions of the Government with regard to their policy in China. I will, in the first place, deal with the remarks made by the noble Lord (Lord Naas) and those who agree with him. What they have blamed has been the course which Her Majesty's Government have taken latterly in regard to the expedition of Captain Sherard Osborn, the employment of Major Gordon, and the engagement of civilians to assist the Chinese Government in the collection of their customs duties and other matters of that kind. Now it was, I think, almost unnecessary that they should express their opinions with regard to the expedition of Captain Osborn, or the employment of Major Gordon and others; because we stated on a former occasion that the Orders in Council under which those officers were employed had been revoked, and that there was no intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government to renew them. Therefore that policy is at an end. I differ entirely from those who condemn it. I think that we were perfectly justified in the steps that we took; because it is evident that the more we can contribute to the internal pacification of China, the more that trade which everybody agrees to be the main and proper object of our intercourse with China would flourish, and it is quite obvious that in proportion as the interior of China is laid waste by civil war and rebellion, in that proportion must our trade suffer impediment and obstruction. I am very glad that the noble Lord had an opportunity of explaining the expression which he used as to the "ignominious" failure of the expedition of Captain Osborn. There was nothing ignominious either in undertaking that expedition, or in the grounds upon which Captain Osborn declined to continue his services. On the contrary, as was stated by my hon. Friend, and admitted by the noble Lord, the whole conduct of Captain Osborn, from beginning to end, did him the highest possible credit, and reflected honour upon the country to which he belongs. If by allowing British subjects to enter the service of the Emperor of China, we had been the means of strengthening the hands of the Chinese Government and enabling them to put down the rebellion or in any degree to diminish its scope, I say we should not only have been rendering a service to China, but should have been promoting those objects for which alone our intercourse with that country ought to be carried on. Those measures have failed. I am sorry for it. They have failed not from any fault of those who planned, not from any fault of those who were engaged in them—they have failed from the effect of those national jealousies which are too apt to prevail in many countries, and which have peculiar force in China, owing to the long established feeling of hostility to anything that is foreign and does not belong to the country. So much for that part of the subject. Then, Sir, I will take the more extensive view which was taken by my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale. He blames the whole policy of England—not the policy of one Administration but of all—in regard to our intercourse with China. He finds fault with different wars in which we have been engaged. Now, Sir, the history of our intercourse with China is the natural and usual history of the relations of a highly civilized with a half civilized people. It invariably happens that where a highly civilized race comes in contact with a half civilized race you find that they act upon different rules of conduct. The highly civilized race expects good faith, justice, fulfilment of engagements, honour, and an absence from wrong-doing. The half civilized race, on the other hand, are in habit totally different—they apply to the civilized race that principle of conduct which they themselves recognize, but which cannot be submitted to by those who are accustomed to a different mode of proceeding. Hence quarrels arise; wars follow the quarrels; engagements, treaties, and conventions put an end to this war; the conventions and the engagements are broken; further quarrels arise; and in that manner relations are embittered, until the superior strength and ascendancy of the civilized race assert themselves, and then the other nation, feeling that they cannot with safety or success practise their own rule of conduct, acquiesce in the regulations imposed upon them by their more powerful antagonists. And then comes a peaceful and friendly intercourse. That has been exactly the course of the relations between this country and China. Now, was our intercourse with China sought for simply by the Government? If the monopoly of the East India Company had continued up to this time, if our trade with China had been confined to that Company, in all human probability none of these wars would ever have broken out, because the intercourse would have been very restricted, nobody would have gone to China except persons under the control of the Company, and the policy of the Company would have been to submit to any indignity which might from time to time be offered. There would have been no national honour at stake, no interest save that of the Company would have been concerned, and they would have thought it better to submit to any little indignity and wrong than to break off commercial intercourse without after all having the power to redress these injuries. If, therefore, I say, the monopoly of the East India Company had continued, we should have lost that increased trade with China which many hon. Members think of national importance, but we should have avoided the contests which have taken place between the two countries. But it was not in the choice of the Government of the day to continue that system. The whole country cried out against the monopoly of the East India Company. They said it was intolerable that such a trade should be monopolized by a single Company, and that monopoly was therefore abolished. Well, then, there was also a general feeling that in proportion as the industry and wealth of the country increased, in that proportion we ought to seek for new markets and new customers. It was said that the nations of Europe were so wedded to their protective system, that our intercourse with them must necessarily be limited, and that we must, therefore, go to other countries where the same impediments did not exist, and find out new markets and enable the commerce of the country to acquire its full development. When the monopoly of the East India Company was abolished, there came a series of contests. Injuries were inflicted by the Chinese Government. Our merchants were imprisoned and threatened with starvation, in order to extort from them their opium. The representative of the English Government, Lord Napier, was cruelly treated, and may be said, indeed, to have been killed by the Chinese, for when he was attacked by a severe fever, the Chinese surrounded the junk on which he was living with other junks, on board of which, under the pretext of doing him honour, gongs were sounded every hour of the twenty-four, and he died in consequence of not being able to obtain the rest necessary for his recovery. One outrage followed another. Again there was war. Next came an agreement. That agreement was afterwards broken—conflict ensued. And so, step by step, we arrived at the Treaty of Tien-tsin. My hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale was very sentimental as to the objections made by the Chinese Government to allow a British Resident at Peking, and he said it was very touching to read the arguments of the Chinese Government against it. But I take leave to say that if we had had a Minister at Peking at the outset of these disputes, it is probable that none of these wars would have taken place. It was because we were debarred from communication with the Government of Peking—because we were at the mercy of provincial Governors, who committed acts of injustice, knowing that they could do so with impunity, and could render their own accounts of what passed, stopping all communications and remonstrances to the central Government—it was on this account that we did not obtain that redress which would have prevented war; and, therefore, it was that war arose. I venture to say that nothing has been done of more importance, with a view to the maintenance of friendly relations between this country and China, than the admission of our Minister as a Resident at Peking. Well, then, I say I take the larger view of my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale. I think that this House and the country ought to consider, not the policy of one particular measure affecting our relations with China, but ought to consider the great features of our policy, commencing with the abolition of the monopoly of the East India Company, and ending with the residence of an English diplomatic agent at Peking and the establishment of direct diplomatic relations with the Chinese Government. The benefit resulting from this policy had been immense. We are told—and I agree with the statement—that our object in China is simply trade. We do not want conquest—we want trade. But the trade must be protected by treaties. Was the extension of our trade by means of treaties a matter of indifference to the nation? Why, we all remember the pressure put upon the Government for the abolition of the monopoly of the East India Company; and we also remember the enthusiasm excited in this country by the treaty signed by Sir Henry Pottinger, and the vast expansion of commercial intercourse which was anticipated from it. That treaty was made in consequence of instructions which it fell to my lot to draw up, and was concluded almost entirely in accordance with those instructions. One stipulation of importance, however, which I had placed in the draught, was, to my great regret, omitted from the treaty—the provision that if any dispute arose as to the interpretation of any article of the treaty, it should be settled according to the English and not according to the Chinese version. What happened? The Chinese inserted in their version a stipulation which was not in the English version, and upon that stipulation disputes afterwards arose. This bears upon the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale, that certain ports of certain islands should be occupied as places of free commerce, for the stipulation which the Chinese fraudulently inserted into the treaty was that there should be no communication with Hong Kong except from the five treaty ports, that there should be no communication commercially between Hong Kong and any other part of the Chinese coast. This very much diminished the value of Hong Kong, and showed that the Chinese would have been very little disposed to tolerate an English settlement like Singapore, free to communicate with any part of the Chinese empire; and unless it had that freedom its value would not be that which my hon. Friend attached to it. But let me recall to the House the great delight of the country on the conclusion of the treaty signed by Sir Henry Pottinger, and the great anticipation of commercial intercourse which would result from it. I recollect rather endeavouring to moderate the fervor of expectation in this House by reminding the House and the country that, though undoubtedly there was an ample field for the ultimate development of commercial intercourse between the two countries, the development would probably be of gradual growth, and that we ought not to be too sanguine of great results at a very early period. But trade has gone on increasing since then. My hon. Friend has quoted figures which have been disputed, but which are perfectly correct, and one remarkable fact is that the amount of our imports from China greatly exceeds our exports to China. In 1863, I think, the value of our imports from China was about £14,000,000; while the value of our exports was not above £3,000,000 or £4,000,000. The balance was of course to be made up by opium from India or by specie sent out. But how was that opium paid for? The Chinese did not send us £14,000,000 of goods without payment, and those who received those goods must have sent out commodities of some sort to India in order to get the opium by which the difference was to be paid, or to get the specie by which the balance of trade was to be redressed. Well, Sir, I must say that I very much agree with the description of the Taepings given by my hon. and gallant Friend (Sir James Elphinstone), if he will permit me to call him so. There can be no doubt that a civil war waged under such circumstances of cruelty by both parties—though the balance of the crime is very much on the side of the Taepings—must place the country in a much worse state than would be the case if peace were established. Whether peace will be speedily established in China it is impossible for any man in this country to predict. We know that for 3,000 years China has been the seat of turbulent disorders, of revolts, and rebellions, and it is, therefore, rather sanguine to expect an entire termination of the war, though information received a short time ago gives the expectation that the rebellion is reduced within very narrow limits, and may be entirely extinguished at an earlier period than had been supposed. It has been said that our objects in regard to China have been purely selfish—and, no doubt, they are so, taken in a national point of view. But those who view this question only in the aspect which it bears upon the interest of the particular merchants who export to China, and who have establishments in that country, take a very narrow and limited view of the question. Those merchants in reality only form the outfalls by which the thousand rills of upland industry in this country find their way to the great ocean of the markets of the world. These merchants are persons who convey to foreign countries the results of the industry of hundreds of thousands of our working classes; and those who wish to change the policy at present pursued, to narrow our foreign markets, and to stifle the development of our foreign trade, are doing their best to take the bread out of the mouths of our working classes, and to deprive them of their means of sustenance. [Mr. BRIGHT: Oh, oh!] I beg pardon—it is true and demonstrable. What is your export trade but the carrying the industry of this country to foreign countries? And if access to those countries be debarred, the industry of our working class is checked, and they are deprived of the sustenance which they derive from the industrial operations of this country. For that reason I do not admit the expression that our policy has been a selfish one in the sense in which the word is sometimes employed. I say it is the duty of the Government to endeavour by every means in its power to extend the commerce of this country—not for the mere purpose of revenue, or the advantage of those particular merchants who may be engaged in trade with any particular portion of the world, but for the purpose of aiding in the development of the general industry of the country, and thus enabling those industrious classes who produce those different commodities to carry their industry on with success, and so to render our own people happy and prosperous at home. Well, Sir, I claim the credit of this view for the policy of the Government—and I do not claim it for the present Government alone, because the other Governments have been parties to treaties with the Chinese as well as ourselves. The policy which the Government of this country has pursued from the period of the overthrow of the monopoly of the India Company to the present time has been eminently successful, and the object is deserving the exertions of the Government and the approval of the country. I am persuaded that, having attained the great end of entering into friendly and direct relations with the central Government of China, our position will not easily be shaken; and that with the establishment of those peaceful relations we shall find our commerce and intercourse with that country increasing year by year. I am also most firmly persuaded that, if we can get an unrestricted commerce with so large a population as that which occupies China, we shall have succeeded in effecting an object of great importance to the industry and prosperity of this country.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, the noble Lord, I think, is more sanguine than the House generally is upon this Question; for, on looking over the debate which has taken place to-night, it appears to me that with but little exception there has been expressed nothing but general condemnation of all that the noble Lord has done and approved of with regard to China during the last thirty years. The hon. Member for Lancaster (Mr. Gregson) has that sort of confidence in the noble Lord which might have been reasonable in him some sixty or sixty-five years ago towards any person older than himself, for he follows the noble Lord with a docility which is perfectly charming; and, I suppose with a view of supporting the policy of the noble Lord, he has been touting in the City for the opinion of China merchants that might support the noble Lord's policy. I understand there are from 120 to 150 English merchants in China, some of whom have very extensive business connections, and some not very considerable. Well, the policy of the noble Lord which the hon. Gentleman supports, requires that there should be at least one ship of war from this country to sustain each three of those mercantile houses. That is not the state of things with regard to English commerce in any other part of the world; and I suspect that there is some radical error in this particular branch of our commerce, or in our politics connected with it, which it is worth the while of the House carefully to consider. Now, the hon. Member told us, that some of these gentlemen who have been writing—I must term them, uninteresting letters, and I am not sure the hon. Member did not provide them when he sent the questions with the answers, because the answers were so very much alike, and I should not be at all surprised if it were a sort of Treasury circular or something of that kind—but he told us that those houses had a great stake in China. No doubt they have so much stake of their own in China that they do not care very much for anybody else's stake; but the people of England also have a great stake in this Question; and looking back over the last thirty years, perhaps there is scarcely any portion of the annals of this country during that time of which we have less cause to be proud than those portions of them which are connected with our relations with China. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite the Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) did not agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale, nor did he agree with the noble Lord (Lord Naas). He has prophesied everything would come to pass exactly opposite to what the noble Lord has prophesied; and now his only defence of the Government appears to be, that the Government have got them into such inextricable confusion that it is hardly worth while doing anything to get them out of it; and the hon. and gallant Gentleman proposes this most incredible plan—that on the banks of that great river, the length of which nobody knows, but which, as he says, is infested with every kind of ruffian who can make his way to China from every other part of the world, or within its banks, he would have I do not know how many gunboats—more than those which now lie rotting at Portsmouth—and he would establish, I suppose, a sort of travelling assize, consisting of magistrates like those we have presiding in our police offices in London, who would have to travel all over the empire of China wherever any European or American ruffian happened to have settled himself, and carry out in China, not Chinese laws, but English laws; and thus we are to have within the empire of China an administration of justice which has nothing to do with it, and owes no allegiance to the Chinese Government, but dependent altogether, I suppose, upon the Secretary of State for the Home Department in Downing Street. I say a more ludicrous—I do not wish to be thought offensive—a more absurd—a more impossible scheme was never submitted to Parliament. Now we may come, I think, to the conclusion that the House—with the exception of the two Members to whom I have referred and the noble Lord—universally condemn the policy which has been pursued. [Mr. KINNAIRD: No, no.] I beg pardon, I did not see the hon. Member in his place. A Member of the House asked me this evening in the dining-room whether anybody had got up to defend the policy of the Government in China, and the answer I made was, that the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird) is not in the House, and therefore there is no one to defend it. Why, the policy is condemned by men of every party in the House. Will anyone say that there was anything in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale that exhibited party feeling against the Government, or personal feelings against the noble Lord. Take the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Coker mouth (Lord Naas)—a speech which, I think, every Member who heard him make it will say that it did him infinite credit—a speech of great research—in which the facts and arguments were placed before the House in the clearest manner, while it expressed sentiments of the very highest order. Well, but that was not a speech of which any Member of the Treasury bench could complain. Take the speech of the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Liddell)—take the speech of the hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. B. Cochrane)—and the same applies to all the speeches that have been made. There has not been the slightest evidence of party feeling of any kind, and yet, from all sides and from every quarter of the House, there has come the same general condemnation of the policy of the Government, and there has been what I may call a universal lamentation expressed at the faults that have been committed during the last thirty years. It is not in this House only, but at Pekin, Sir Frederick Bruce has shown himself to be even disgusted at and weary with the policy he was expected to pursue, and we know perfectly well that this policy is directly in the teeth of the most emphatic expressions on this side of the House, only a few years ago, by the noble Lord who is now the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and it was condemned in language if possible more emphatic by the right hon. Gentleman, whom I do not now see in his place, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. And I think I can answer for it that other Members of the Government, if they were not silent under the influence of their position in this House, would be ready to express in language equally decided their condemnation of the course which the Government have pursued in China. Well, but we have now got into a state of such difficulty and embarrassment that nobody seems to know exactly what is to be done. The noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) has been, in connection with this question, I think, remarkably reckless and unguarded in the statements that he has made, and I think that every prophecy that he has pronounced in past times has now proved to have been wholly baseless. He admits to-night, and, in fact, it is a part of his defence, that everything that he has done in regard to the more recent policy has been a failure. [Mr. KINNAIRD: No, no.] The hon. Member for Perth was not here, and did not hear the speech of the noble Lord opposite. [Mr. KINNAIRD: I did.] Then I beg pardon. Well, but the noble Lord at the head of the Government rather blamed the noble Lord the Member for Portsmouth for speaking upon points of which it was not necessary now to say anything, for they had failed. The noble Lord expressed his great regret that they had failed, but I do not think the House or the country has any reason to feel any regret that the policy in question has failed. But the noble Lord said the failure is no blame to them. No, the failure is no blame; but the conception of plans so absurd and impossible is a blame to them. And when these plans which the Government told us were to be so advantageous to our interests in China have failed, surely it is proper for a Member of this House to take note of that failure, and to ask the Government what pretence they have for asking the House to trust them further on this question after their failure is patent and clear to all the world. Now, the noble Lord treated us to an observation which is very common, and I have no doubt many of those Chinese marauders—I mean European and American marauders in China—would use exactly the same argument. The noble Lord said that the natural history of all contact between a highly civilized and a semi-barbarous nation is that unpleasantnesses arise, disputes are occasioned, wars follow disputes, and after wars have been carried on till such a length of time as the highly civilized nation has battered pretty nearly to pieces the semi-barbarous nation, then the semi-barbarous nation becomes entirely submissive, and nothing can possibly be more friendly and harmonious than the future relations of the two nations. This is what the noble Lord has told us. But the noble Lord has not told us that one consequence of his policy as representing a highly civilized nation has been to bring into a state of decrepitude and almost absolutely to destroy the Government of that nation which enjoys the most ancient civilization existing on the globe. At this very moment those horrors of which he has spoken, and which so many Members of the House have referred to, have their origin mainly in the policy of the noble Lord. The hon. and gallant Member for Portsmouth, I think, only said what was true when he said that our insisting upon entering their great cities, and especially upon breaking the seclusion of their capital city, had, as it were, peeled off the mysterious and awful character which prevailed with regard to their Government. In point of fact, it has succeeded in shattering the whole political and social system of an empire comprising one-third or one-fourth of the whole population of the globe. Well, if I were in the position of the noble Lord, I durst not get up in this House or anywhere else and speak boastfully of the policy I had pursued, if results so grave and so disastrous had happened to so great a portion of the human race. But the noble Lord had, I will say, an audacity beyond that, for he charged my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale by implication with having no regard for the condition and interests of the industrious classes in this country. He attempted to persuade the House that the trade with China—the most miserable trade in the world when compared with the magnitude of the population—was of so great importance to the working classes of this country, that it was worth while to indulge in the policy which he has carried on, and to encounter the great expenses which have been incurred. Now, I will venture to say that our trade with China—I speak of our exports from England to China—for many years back—I believe for thirty years—has not left one single farthing of profit, if you will pay out of it the cost of the wars, of the intermeddling, and of the military and naval forces now apparently permanently established there. The thing is very easy to calculate. There are fifty ships of war for the protection of an export of less than £4,000,000 a year. If all our export trade required to be protected at an equal expenditure we should require 2,000 ships of war to give that sort of guardianship to our foreign commerce which the noble Lord thinks is necessary to support our trade in China. The people of this country manufacture cotton and other goods which are sent to China; but the people of this country also pay taxes, and I believe that whatever interests they have in the way of employment and wages in the trade with China is at least counterbalanced by the excess of expenditure and Government taxation which they have to pay in consequence of our policy in that country. I waited to hear what the noble Lord would say of the future. He pointed to the past. He went to the East India Company. He told some very imperfectly narrated stories about our transactions with China. He admitted that his policy for some years past had been a total failure. He does not deny now that the country is in a state of absolute anarchy. He has English officers fighting out there, and he has sent out orders that they shall no longer fight. He maintains, notwithstanding, an army—I do not know exactly the number of the force—he maintains more than forty ships of war, and altogether I believe more than fifty ships belonging to the country—and he has not a single word to say to give us any hope that there will be any change in future. Does he intend to fight until the empire of China is restored and the Taepings are utterly put down? Or if the Taepings should get the ascendancy, will he join them and endeavour to establish another Government at Peking? What does he propose to do? Is it not clear to every Member of the House that a policy of intermeddling in China is a policy of idiocy? Here we are a small island on the opposite side of the globe, with a population so small that we are told we have not an army that we could transport to Denmark—yet we some how or other take within our great ambition this vast empire of 300,000,000 or 400,000,000 persons; we are to influence the dynasty that shall sit upon its throne; and, in point of fact, we are to direct the whole affairs of that empire as if it were some small neighbour close to us. I do not know how such an idea could ever get into any man's head; but having once entered into the head of the noble Viscount it has taken absolute possession of him, and I suppose at his time of life that he cannot get rid of it. But I protest against it. Let the noble Lord take the course which has been recommended to him to-night by several hon. Members, of abstaining religiously from the slightest interference between two parties in China; of teaching—I will not say the merchants but that other class, none of which I hope are to be included in the list of English merchants, I mean those rude and unprincipled adventurers who abound in China—that it is not the intention of the English Government that the English army or navy shall take any step in China to defend them from whatever misfortunes may happen to them. It is a monstrous folly that the population of this country, so hard toiling and so suffering in comparison with us who are here, as millions of them are, should be taxed year after year to carry on a policy which for thirty years has covered us with discredit and has wholly failed, and that this policy should be carried on only to please a curious crotchet which the noble Lord at the head of the Government has taken upon it—a crotchet which is not participated in, I believe, by a single member of his Cabinet, which this House is willing wholly to repudiate, and which, I believe, in every society in England where the question is discussed receives the condemnation which it has received in Parliament to-night. I do hope the noble Lord will now, when he sees this entire failure of all his plans and all his prophecies, for once come to the conclusion that he is not infallible, and that good sense and that wisdom which springs from experience, and which have been shown in the discussion to-night, ought rather to govern a great question of foreign policy like this than the violent prejudices which the noble Lord has so passionately cherished for thirty years that they seem at last to have got the better of his reason and his judgment.

MR. COBDEN: With the leave of the House I will withdraw my Motion.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS moved for leave to introduce a Bill to facilitate the traffic of the Metropolis by improving the communications across the Thames. The street traffic of London was now exceedingly great, and the Southwark and Waterloo Bridges, being toll bridges, were comparatively little used by the public in consequence. The object of the Bill was to give to the Metropolitan Board of Works power to purchase those bridges across the river Thames by agreement upon which tolls were now levied, and to throw them open for public use free from toll—it being a direction in the Bill that the Board should endeavour to agree for the purchase of Southwark and Waterloo Bridges before purchasing any of the other bridges. The proprietors of Southwark Bridge were anxious to dispose of their property at a very reduced sum. It cost about £700,000 with the approaches, and they were willing to sell the whole for £200,000. That, he thought, was an opportunity which ought not to be neglected. Waterloo Bridge cost about £1,000,000; and both structures had turned out complete failures to the proprietors. The Bill proposed that, for the purpose of enabling the Board of Works to purchase any bridge, they should be empowered to levy a rate of not exceeding 1d. in the pound for twenty years, in the same way as the Main Drainage rate was levied; and that the City of London should contribute a sum of not less than £50,000 out of the Bridge House estates, towards the purchase of Southwark Bridge. Considering the great advantage to be gained, he thought the public would not grudge the small charge which the Bill proposes to levy on the metropolis.

SLAVE TRADE (WHITE NILE).

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. WYLD said, he rose to move an Address for Copies of all Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and Mr. Petherick, Her Britannic Majesty's Consul at Khartouma, relating to Slavery and the Slave Trade that exists on the White Nile, from the year 1860 to the present time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of all Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and Mr.

Petherick, H.B.M. Consul at Khartouma, relating to Slavery and the Slave Trade that exists on the White Nile, from the year 1860 to the present time:

"Of all Correspondence between the British Consul General of Egypt and Consul Petherick on the same subject, and during the same period:

"Of all Correspondence between the Foreign Office and any other Departments of Her Majesty's Government and the British Consul General in Egypt, upon the same subject, and during the same period:

"And, of the Charges, and of the Correspondence connected with these Charges, sent by the people of Khartouma to the British Consul General in Egypt, accusing Consul Petherick of having been engaged in Slave Trading on the White Nile, together with the British Consul General's Reply to these people's accusations, and of his representations (if any) made to Consul Petherick on the same subject."—(Mr. Wyld.)

MR. LAYARD said, the only objection was that the letters for which the hon. Gentleman moved had been given in the Slave Trade papers laid on the table of the House. With regard to the correspondence which might clear Consul Petherick's character as to his connection with the slave trade in the Upper Nile, none had yet been received. Despatches had arrived that day from Consul Petherick; but he had not had an opportunity of seeing them. Any information upon this subject he would give when it came to hand if the hon. Gentleman would defer his Motion.

EDUCATION (INSPECTORS' REPORTS).

NOMINATION OF COMMITTEE.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON rose to propose the nomination of the Select Committee upon Education (Inspectors' Reports). The composition of the Committee would not be so satisfactory as he had hoped to make it, as his right hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) had declined to serve upon it. He proposed that the Committee should be constituted of the following Members:—Mr. Bruce, Sir John Pakington, Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. G. Hardy, Mr. Dodson, Mr. Adderley, Viscount Enfield, Lord Robert Cecil, Mr. Walter, Mr. E. Egerton, Mr. Clay, Mr. Hennessy, Mr. Baxter, Mr. A. Mills, and Mr. Buxton.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Bruce be nominated one of the Members of the Select Committee on Education (Inspectors' Reports)."—(Viscount Palmerston.)

MR. CLAY said, he regretted that the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) would not serve on the Committee. He believed the right hon. Gentleman made it a point of honour not to be a judge in his own case. Every one's honour was in his own keeping, and there was no man whose honour was in safer keeping than that of the right hon. Gentleman. But it appeared to him (Mr. Clay) to be very difficult to divest this Committee of a character more than usually personal, and whenever that had been the case, and when the functions of the Committee had been of a judicial character, it had been very much the practice that the Committee should be named by the General Committee of Elections. That was the proposal which he should venture to make on the present occasion, and he should make it avowedly, but he hoped without offence, which it was far from his intention to give, with the view of excluding from the Committee alike the accused and the accusers. He knew it had been said that the character of the right hon. Gentleman had been sufficiently vindicated by the statement which he had made in that House, and that there was no longer any intention of making a personal attack upon him; but it was not the less true that one of the ablest Members of the Government had been driven from the position which he had occupied and from the duties which he had discharged greatly to the benefit of the schools and to the economical administration of the funds of his Department. He had not the honour of being one of the right hon. Gentleman's friends; nor had he the regret of having been one of his assailants; but if he had been one of the former, and still more assuredly if he had been one of the latter, he should not have been satisfied until he had done all in his power to rescind the Resolution which that House had undoubtedly arrived at upon a misconception of the facts. Even in the humble position which he had the honour to hold in the House, he did not sit easy under that degree of blame which attached to each and every one of them for the decision they had come to, and which he could not but consider very unfortunate. If that were so, it was impossible to divest the proposed inquiry of a personal character, not only as regarded the right hon. Gentleman, but also as regarded some of the subordinates in office, who seemed to have forgotten those sentiments of loyalty and honour which happily distinguished our public service; and personal also, inasmuch as it was an attack on one of our public Departments through the heads of its administration. Now, under such circumstances, it was the usual, he might say the invariable course, that the Committees should be named by the General Committee of Elections. If it was argued that the General Committee of Elections was not the proper body, and that exclusion was wrong in principle, all he had to say was that, as far as his memory went back, the principle of exclusion had been frequently adopted. He recollected that when the conduct of Sir James Graham, then Secretary for the Home Department, was called in question, the Committee was proposed by Sir Robert Peel on the principle of exclusion—exclusion both of the accuser and of the accused. Sir Robert Peel even said that he would have every lawyer also excluded, lest by squabbling about the meaning of some Act of Parliament, they should prevent a plain decision upon the merits of the case being arrived at; and he would also exclude all persons who had been in office or who were supposed to be expectants of office. In the case of the charge brought against the Marquess of Exeter for interference in an election in 1848, a Committee of five was named by the General Committee of Elections. In 1852 there was another case—it would be fresh in the recollection of hon. Members without further mention. In 1853 there was another; and in 1854 there was the case of Mr. Stonor, which was quite in point, inasmuch as it involved a personal question between that gentleman and the Duke of Newcastle, then Secretary for the Colonies; and more recently in the case of Signor Bertolacci and Earl Granville a similar course was pursued. The Committee of Elections named a Committee of five, with two assessors to conduct the case, but without power to vote. There was a very great number of similar cases, and it would be in the recollection of the House, that what he now was about to propose was the usual course. He had consulted some gentlemen who were specially acquainted with the usages of the House, and they told him he was not wrong in the view he had taken. It might be said that he himself had shown that he had opinions which disqualified him from sitting upon this Committee; and whilst he had full confidence in his own impartiality, he could assure the House that it was far from his desire to be named upon the Committee.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the said Select Committee do consist of five Members, to be nominated by the General Committee of Elections."—(Mr. Clay.)

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, his objection to the Amendment which the hon. Member had just moved was, in the first place, that he believed the course proposed to be entirely unprecedented; and, in the second place, that it would make an inquiry absolutely futile, and would not get at the truth which the House desired to obtain. It was unprecedented, because the instances cited by the hon. Member were wholly beside the point. The practice of the House he believed to have been this, where a personal charge of corruption had been made against any Member of that or the other House of Parliament, or where there had been a charge connected with the electoral law of the country, in such cases, and such only, it had been assigned to the General Committee of Elections to select a Committee of five to inquire and judge. But there was another class of cases to which the present case belonged—a class with which the House had commonly to deal where great neglect or misconduct was imputed to a Department of the State, where Members sitting on both sides of the House were necessarily concerned; and he maintained if they searched the annals of the House they would scarcely find a single instance—certainly not a majority of instances—where a Committee of fifteen had been abandoned and a Committee of five substituted. Was the case of the Dover contract, where great misconduct was imputed to a Department, and in which the character of individuals was deeply concerned, sent to the General Committee of Elections? No, it was sent to a Committee of fifteen selected without any particular regard to the absence of partisanship on the part of its Members. Take the Crimean Committee, which had to investigate the alleged misconduct of a great public Department—that was nominated by the House. So they had had Committees on the Ecclesiastical Commission, on the Board of Trade, on the Admiralty, on the Foreign Office, in which charges more or less distinct had been brought against officers of the State, and the House had never renounced the practice of nominating those Members whom it thought best qualified to conduct the inquiry; and it seemed to him that the House had acted most wisely in pursuing that course. The hon. Member wanted five Gentlemen who were absolutely impartial. Well, on questions that were keenly discussed, impartiality implied that the persons of whom it was predicated had not taken any very lively interest in the subject. They would go into Committees free from any bias. Yes, but free also from any knowledge; and when they set themselves down in the chair to examine into the case, they had nothing to guide them, they did not know what witnesses to call, what evidence to look for, what places they were sent to probe. And, therefore, it seemed to him that the practice which the House had invariably pursued up to this time, of appointing a few of those who attacked and of those who defended, with a majority of those who were impartial, was the best and surest way of attaining truth in the examination, after a fair discussion had taken place. He would frankly confess, if the Committee were appointed by the Committee of Selection, he should have confidence in its fairness but not in its competence. No confidence could be attached to the decision to which it would come. They would be satisfied with the mere assertion of the officers of the Department; but the abuses which prevailed in it would not be thoroughly probed, as the House and the country had a right to expect. He should support the Motion of the noble Lord at the head of the Government.

MR. DENMAN said, that the objections taken by the noble Lord (Lord Robert Cecil) were really worth nothing, looking to the way in which this question had arisen. The noble Lord's first objection was that the course which his hon. Friend the Member for Hull (Mr. Clay) recommended would be unprecedented. But they were driven to take an unprecedented course where the case was in itself unprecedented; and he apprehended there was no precedent whatever for the case which had rendered it necessary to appoint this Committee. He had sat night after night, and heard all that had taken place with reference to this subject. He had heard it with great regret, because it appeared to him that the character of the House was greatly compromised by what had taken place. He had the misfortune to be present at the division which had ended in the retirement of his right hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) and he observed with grief the character of the attack. His right hon. Friend was defending himself against a charge of mutilating Reports, and was stating that upon his honour he had never mutilated Reports. While his right hon. Friend was on his legs making that statement, the noble Lord, unknown to his right hon. Friend and unseen by him, was showing first to one Member and then to another a paper which he held in his hand. He had in his hearing asked a question of his right hon. Friend, whether Reports had not been sent back marked in the margin; and that being denied, the noble Lord handed about a paper to half a dozen Members, pointing to it, the implication of course being this, "You see that what he is stating is not according to the proof I am presenting to you." That was the noble Lord's mode of proceeding. Had it occurred in a Nisi Prius Court, had it been resorted to in the Old Bailey by any member of the profession to which he belonged, some of whom were capable occasionally of acts not altogether defensible, he could only say there was not a member of that profession whose opinion was worth a farthing who would not repudiate it as unworthy of the profession. He was obliged to say this because he thought it did show that the attack was made in a spirit and manner which was not fair; and any one who could make such an attack in that way could not be a fair and impartial judge. On this Committee he saw the name of the very noble Lord who took that course. Did he mean to intimate that the Committee would be inefficient if his name was not on it? He rather gathered that the noble Lord wished to remain on the Committee in order to make out his own case. He repeated that the way in which this case had originated being unprecedented, it was desirable that they should not be altogether fettered by precedent. But if they went to precedent, surely the precedent of the Post Office, to which his hon. Friend the Member for Hull had referred, was more close than any stated by the noble Lord. But the noble Lord stated this inquiry would be insufficient if those were not on the Committee who had already taken a strong view of the question. He apprehended that was utterly fallacious. A Committee of five Members would start with unbiassed

minds—that was a great thing; and they would have quite as much intelligence as any one who had applied his mind to the question before. There would also be this great advantage—that they would not run the risk of being led astray by the noble Lord, coming with his own story and hearsay evidence, obliging them to listen to what had been told him. They would compel the attendance of those who had instructed him; these would be subjected to cross-examination, and it would be possible then to ascertain whether the statements they made were fallacious and erroneous, as some of those they had supplied to the noble Lord had turned out to be. Of course all the House wanted was the truth in this matter, and by far the most likely way to arrive at it would be to have the Committee formed of Members of unbiassed judgment, who would listen in an impartial and judicial manner to anything that might be said on either side. The noble Lord adduced cases in which grave misconduct had been imputed; and had not grave misconduct been imputed in this case? Nothing could be more strong than the implication that his right hon. Friend the Member for Calne had been guilty of falsehood in denying that he had mutilated these Reports. It did appear to him that this was just one of those cases in which the ordinary course ought to be departed from, and there would be a much greater feeling of satisfaction on the part of the House, and much more reliance might be placed on the Committee, if it were appointed in the manner recommended by his hon. Friend the Member for Hull. He should certainly vote with him if he should divide the House on his Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought the House was in some danger of forgetting the question which was really before it. It was not a personal question. The personal question, as affecting the character of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) had, in the opinion of all the Members of the House, been closed by the statement which that right hon. Gentleman had made. The question affected the past conduct of the Education Department with reference to the Inspectors' Reports and the future mode in which they were to be treated. How stood the facts of the case? Some time ago, certain Reports were not forthcoming, and he asked why they were not produced. The explanation made by the right hon. Gentleman was not deemed satisfactory. A Motion was made by the noble Lord, expressing the opinion of the House that such was not the mode in which the Department of Education should manage this important branch of their business. That Motion was carried. The hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Clay) supposed that the vote on that Motion was entirely governed by what he would venture to call a most subordinate part of the question, as affecting some two or three Reports, but he did not believe that affected the votes of the large majority. The Resolution was passed. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) thought it his duty, considering that a vote of censure on his Department had been passed, to resign his office—a step which occasioned the general regret of both sides of the House. But the Government thought fit to ask for a Committee to inquire into the grounds on which the House came to that conclusion. If the decision of the Committee was very much to affect the policy of the Department in future, it was clearly a public, not a private question. If it were merely for the purpose, which was altogether unnecessary, of inquiring into the truth of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, the terms of the appointment ought to have been different. The terms were that the Committee should inquire “into the practice of the Committee of Council on Education with respect to the Reports of Her Majesty’s Inspectors of Schools.” Surely, if the Committee had been for such a purpose as the hon. Member for Hull supposed, the Motion would have been for a Committee to inquire into the statement of the right hon. Member for Calne, and not for a Committee of Inquiry on a public question. The practical difficulty of leaving the nomination of the Committee to the Committee of Selection, was that the Committee of Selection acted on the principle of appointing Gentlemen having little previous experience of the subject to be inquired into, in order that they might have no possible bias. But if all who had a bias were excluded from the Committee, then all those who took an interest in and had studied the question submitted to the Committee would be excluded. If there should be no person representing the Educational Department on the Committee, then it would be a dangerous thing for the office that its future conduct should depend on the Report of a Committee in which it was not represented by any Member; or, if there should be included in the Committee some one representing the office, then there would be the unfairness of including in it a person having an official feeling with respect to education, and excluding others who took an active, independent, and unofficial view of the subject. This Committee was moved for in the usual way by the Government, for the purpose of making what they considered the amende to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne, and it was to be presumed that the Government considered that the Committee was a fit one for the purpose. He joined in the regret which had been expressed, that the right hon. Member for Calne had not thought fit to allow his name to remain in the list of members for the Committee; because, on a public object, his assistance would have been most valuable, and any private object did not properly enter into the consideration of the Committee. The present Amendment, if made at all, should have been made when a full discussion took place on the appointment of a Committee. At that time an Amendment was proposed by the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) to extend the scope of the Committee very considerably, and no one then disputed that this Committee was for a public object, and that its Report would very much affect the public conduct of the Department. He could not conceive a clearer case than that this Committee was for a public object, and therefore it should be chosen as Committees for public objects generally were.

MR. KINGLAKE said, he entirely agreed with the hon. Member who had just sat down, that the speech of the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) was so clear and convincing as necessarily to satisfy the mind of every hon. Gentleman. Nevertheless it must be remembered that the Resolution of the 12th of April still remained on the records of that House, and the question to be determined was, what was the fittest manner in which the House should prepare itself to decide whether that Resolution should remain or be rescinded. He was one of those who thought that the moment the right hon. Member for Calne concluded his speech, the House was placed in a situation which enabled it without the slightest hesitation to rescind the Resolution. However, that was not the course taken by the Government. The noble Lord the Prime Minister had given notice of his intention to move for this Committee before the speech of the right hon. Member for Calne was delivered; but his belief was that if the noble Lord had heard the speech of the right hon. Member for Calne before giving his notice, he would have come down and moved to rescind the Vote without taking the preparatory step of asking for a Committee. As the object in view in moving the appointment of the Committee was to know whether or not the Resolution of the 12th of April was to be retained or rescinded, the question was of what materials should the Committee, who were to advise the House on this judicial question, consist? He ventured to think that the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil) gave an answer to the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Clay) which confirmed the views of that hon. Member, for the noble Lord said that those who formed the Committee should enter on the inquiry with such a knowledge of the subject as would be sufficient to guide their judgment. [Lord ROBERT CECIL: Some of them.] Well, the previous knowledge which was to guide the judgment of men who were to form an opinion on a subject of this kind was that which in the English language was called prejudice, and unless it was desired that the Members of the Committee should be guided by prejudice, the House could not refuse to accede to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hull.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that this was not a question of rescinding a Resolution of the House. If any Member thought that the Resolution of the 12th of April ought to be rescinded, it was competent for him to bring the subject before the House; but that would be a grave proceeding, and ought to be done in a frank, open, and straightforward manner. He thought that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Clay), and the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Tiverton (Mr. Denman), were founded on a complete misapprehension of the nature of this Committee. The hon. Member for Hull said that when a Committee was appointed to investigate a charge of personal misconduct, it was the practice of the House to refer the appointment of the Committee to the Committee of Selection. The cases of Lord Exeter and Sir James Graham were personal charges; but was that the case now? He denied it altogether. He did not understand that the Government proposed, or that the House adopted, the appointment of this Committee with any intention of discussing a personal charge against the right hon. Member for Calne. He agreed in the opinion which has been expressed, that the explanation given by the right hon. Member for Calne removed from the minds of hon. Members any idea that a Committee was necessary to investigate his conduct, even if any such idea had been previously entertained. This was perfectly clear, that if the noble Lord at the head of the Government had supposed that a Committee was necessary to investigate a personal charge, he would have in the outset moved for the Committee in a different form. It was a Committee to inquire not into the conduct of the right hon. Member for Calne, but into the practice of the Committee of Council on Education with respect to the Reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, and he challenged the hon. Member for Hull to show that a Committee to inquire into the practice of a public Department on a particular point was ever appointed in any other way than by the House itself. The noble Lord at the head of the Government expressed regret that the names in the list of members for the Committee had been changed, and he shared the noble Lord's regret, so far as the right hon. Member for Calne was concerned. He knew no reason why that right hon. Gentleman should not be a member of the Committee; but no satisfactory reason had been given why the usual practice of the House in appointing a Committee to inquire respecting a public Department on a particular branch of their duty should not be adhered to. This was a subject which every friend of education ought to attend to with the greatest jealousy. It was his firm belief that the cause of public education had been retrograding under the present Administration, and that, under an imperfect system of administering the grants of that House, the system had become so costly that the Government were desirous of diminishing the expense. Under these circumstances, as Government had proposed no better plan or substitute, the House should view with particular jealousy any change on the part of the Educational Department which tended to diminish the valuable information which that House had hitherto received from the Reports of the Education Inspectors. He was very desirous of seeing the practice of the Department on that question fairly investigated. He believed it might be much amended. Valuable as the Inspectors' Reports had been, the House ought to know the principle on which they were hereafter to be made. This was essentially an inquiry into a question of public policy, and no sufficient reason had been assigned for their departing from the usual practice. He therefore trusted that the noble Lord would adhere to the Motion he had made, and that the House would not sanction the innovation proposed by the Amendment.

Mr. MASSEY said, he was not present either at the debate or the division which had given rise to that discussion, and therefore the only information he possessed on the subject was derived from the records of their proceedings. It had been stated both by the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) and the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Pakington) that no personal question was involved in that matter. Now, the Resolution adopted by the House on the 12th of April was in these terms—

“That, in the opinion of this House, the mutilation of the Reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, and the exclusion from them of statements and opinions adverse to the educational views entertained by the Committee of Council, while matter favourable to them is admitted, are violations of the understanding under which the appointment of the Inspectors was originally sanctioned by Parliament, and tend entirely to destroy the value of their Reports.”

Well, if mutilations had been made they must have been made by somebody, and if the heads of the Department had made them they deserved the censure that had been cast upon them. If, on the other hand, the subordinates of the office were responsible, it was highly desirable that their conduct should be inquired into. But he could not understand how it could be said that no personal question was involved. The hon. Member for Bradford had read the order of reference as if it stood alone; but when that order of reference was made it was connected with the Resolution of the 12th of April, and therefore the two must be read together. It had been the general and the better practice of the House, though not its invariable practice, to discriminate between Committees appointed to consider particular questions of policy, and Committees appointed to inquire into personal matters. In the former case the Committees were chosen from the representatives of various opinions entertained in the House and out of doors, and proceeded to collect the materials of a report on which future legislation might be based. In the latter case, the investigation being of a judicial nature, the Members consisted not of persons who went into it with political predilections, but of those who were fitted for the task intrusted to them by their experience and impartiality. They had to inquire, not into opinions, but into specific facts, which were to determine the status of an individual or the character of some particular transaction. To the latter category the present investigation properly belonged. It was said there was no precedent for the proposal of the hon. Member for Hull. Now, soon after he entered that House there occurred the inquiry into the alleged abuse of the patronage of the Admiralty Board in connection with a general election, and that inquiry was referred to a Committee, not of fifteen, but of five members. On a more recent occasion, when the conduct of a Member of that House was involved, a Committee of seven was appointed. It had been the practice sometimes, when it was necessary to investigate matters inculcating an hon. Member or the officials of a Department, to include in the Committee both the Member who was impugned and his accuser, as assessors, but not to vote; and if the present Amendment were adopted, it would be for the House, after the Committee of Selection had nominated five members, to follow that course in this instance should it think fit, and to add two members as assessors. Gross misconduct was imputed by the Resolution of the 12th of April to some person or persons connected with the Board of Education; and he hoped that the House for its own credit, as well as from a sense of what was due to the incriminated Department, would take care that the Committee should assume a judicial and not a political character.

Mr. WALTER said, that it was at all times anything but an agreeable task to have to defend one's own appointment on a Committee, or to express any opinion as to one's fitness to serve on an inquiry. Certainly, as far as he was personally concerned, he would have preferred that this matter should have been permitted to drop altogether, without being referred to a Committee at all, as it was true wisdom in many cases to allow things to pass into oblivion, and not pursue them ad infinitum. But he had felt all along that if a Committee were to be appointed, and he were nominated to serve upon it, it would be his duty to accept that nomination, as being one of those who had taken an interest and borne some part in the discussion which had led to the present Motion.

It appeared to him that the only question before the House was, what kind of a Committee was really likely to be the fairest and most impartial tribunal in this case. They knew that Election Committees did not receive credit for impartiality from the public at large. The endeavour, indeed, was made to make them impartial by nominating two members from either party, and a Chairman, with a casting vote, who was supposed to be specially qualified for the post assigned him; but it was, nevertheless, commonly believed out of doors that perfect confidence could not be placed in the impartiality of such a tribunal. He thought that a Committee of fifteen, consisting mainly of Gentlemen who were not supposed to have taken any active interest in the matter, and also of a minority of those on both sides who had taken an interest in it, was more likely to extract the greatest amount of information from the witnesses, and to decide upon it in a more impartial manner than a Committee of five, constituted upon the principle of Election Committees. And when the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Pakington) a few weeks ago proposed to enlarge the scope of the inquiry, he declined to vote with him expressly on the ground that he conceived himself to be a very proper person, if the House so determined, to be nominated for such a Committee as that, but one who was by no means qualified to deal with that much larger question which the right hon. Baronet proposed to refer. It seemed to him that the great object of appointing fifteen members was to secure the services of the noble Lord (Lord Robert Cecil) and my hon. Friend who sits near me (Mr. W. E. Forster), and, perhaps, himself likewise, as having been the seconder of his noble Friend's Resolution. He could only say that if such a Committee as that now proposed would not command the confidence of the public, he did not know that they were likely to be satisfied with a small Committee; and he should suggest that it would be far better to let the subject drop altogether than refer it to such a tribunal. Some hon. Members appeared to think that an inevitable result of the inquiry would be to rescind his noble Friend's Resolution; but he (Mr. Walter) was by no means clear that such would be its effect. It was perfectly true that his right hon. Friend the late Vice President of the Education Department, as far as he was himself concerned, had satisfied everybody who required satisfaction on that subject that he had had no part in suppressing or mutilating the Inspectors' Reports. Nobody ever accused his right hon. Friend of doing so, as far as he had ever heard. ["Oh!"] Certainly it had been far from his intention to make any such accusation against him. But he had no doubt that the Reports had been—he hardly knew what word to use, or whether he should say "garbled" or "tampered with;" but, at all events, he was now as much persuaded as ever he was that they had been dealt with in such a manner that passages had been suppressed because they contained matter which was unpleasant to the Department. Very heavy charges had also been brought against those Inspectors who had supplied the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, himself, and others with information on this subject. They had been accused of baseness, disloyalty, and a great many other serious offences expressed in hard language. Probably those gentlemen had some right to claim that the Members to whom they furnished information should be present to watch over their interests, and see that they were fairly dealt with. That was one reason why he thought the noble Lord and himself should be members of the Committee. If the House was of a different opinion, he believed the public would be better satisfied to see the subject left where it stood, without any imputation upon his right hon. Friend the Member for Calne, than to have such a Committee as that proposed by the hon. Member for Hull.

MR. KINNAIRD said, it was all very well for the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) to suggest that the matter should be dropped; but, in justice to the right hon. Member for Calne, it was only fair that there should be an inquiry by a Committee. For his own part, he was disposed to agree with the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich on the public question; but the right hon. Member for Calne had been charged with an offence of which he was totally incapable, and hence the necessity for the Committee assuming a judicial form. He hoped the Government would assent to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hull, for every precedent was in favour of the nomination of the Committee by the Committee of Selection.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON thought there was a great deal of force in the arguments used by the hon. Members for Hull and Salford; and, as the House generally seemed in favour of the Amendment, he was disposed to accept it.

MR. HENNESSY submitted that, after what had occurred, it was the duty of the House to adjourn the debate. The noble Lord at the head of the Government had made a proposition to the House, and in doing so had made no reference to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hull, though he must have seen it on the paper. No sooner had the noble Lord resumed his seat than several hon. Gentlemen sitting behind the Treasury Bench, and well known as strenuous supporters of the Government, got up and spoke against the Motion. The hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird) had made his maiden Opposition speech. There was something very remarkable about the whole transaction. Besides, the subject itself was one of such importance, and it had assumed so entirely new an aspect, that he thought the debate should be adjourned till it could be proceeded with in a fuller House. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the adjournment of the debate.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he seconded the Motion. There was strong reason to believe that some arrangement had been made between the Government and the hon. Gentlemen behind them. He suspected that the Government had thought it necessary to make the proposal submitted by the First Minister, but on the distinct understanding that some of their habitual supporters should feel the pulse of the House, and endeavour to obtain its consent to a different proceeding, with the view of getting a late Member of the Government out of a scrape. Nothing more astonishing had occurred for a long time than the speech of the hon. Member for Perth against the Government. The noble Lord might have said to the hon. Member "Et tu, Brute?" but he had not done so, and the reason probably was that the whole affair had been arranged beforehand.

(Mr. Hennessy.)

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, there was another reason for the adjournment of the debate, and that was the absence of the right hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Adlerley), who had preceded the hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), in the office which he recently held. The right hon. Member for North Staffordshire ought to have been present, and to have acknowledged that he had pursued a course similar to that charged against the right hon. Member for Calne. Believing the Committee proposed by the noble Lord to be properly constituted, he should vote for the Motion.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that the right hon. Member for Staffordshire had frankly admitted on a previous occasion that, when he held the office of Vice-President, he commenced a practice very similar to that subsequently adopted by the right hon. Member for Calne. He had always regretted that his right hon. Friend took that course, and the fact that he did so strengthened his wish for an inquiry, not into the conduct of any individual, but into the system pursued in the Education Office.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the statement made by the right hon. Member for Staffordshire was that the practice originated by him went far beyond that which existed now. For his own part, he had always thought that there was no personal question involved in the proposed inquiry; but the discussion of to-night had changed his opinion. The hon. Baronet the Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer), had distinctly asserted that Ministers were acting in concert with Gentlemen sitting behind them for the purpose of getting a late Member of the Government out of a scrape. It thus appeared that there was a personal question remaining, and, if suspicion still attached to the conduct of the right hon. Member for Calne, justice demanded that the Committee should be impartial. It could not be impartially constituted if, while his accusers were upon it, the right hon. Gentleman himself was excluded.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER explained that he drew his inference as to the Government desiring to get one of their number out of a scrape entirely from their own conduct.

MR. W. E. FORSTER trusted that the noble Lord would recognize the necessity of adjourning the debate. It was impossible to suppose that the noble Lord had put on the paper a Motion which he did not mean to press to a division; but if the matter were now pressed, many Members would feel to-morrow that a decision had been taken on the question rather by surprise. It was well known that hon. Members did not usually remain till so late an hour, when it was not expected that any contested business would come on. It was understood that the arrangements as to the Committee had been settled between the Government and the Opposition, and that they would act together. Consequently, many hon. Members had gone away, believing that even if a division took place there would be a sufficient majority without them. It now appeared that the Government had changed their mind since the morning; and it was only fair that the House should have an opportunity of considering the matter under its new aspect.

Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 64: Majority 34.

COLONEL DICKSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Colonel Dickson.)

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I really think the course of proceeding on the other side of the House is not called for by the occasion. The most formal notice was given of the Amendment, and it is impossible to say that the House has been taken by surprise. This is not a new subject. It is one which every Member must have had in his mind; and I do not see what is to be gained by adjourning the debate. The question can be decided now as well as to-morrow or the next day, and there ought to be no unnecessary delay. The character and feelings of individuals are concerned, and the matter ought not, therefore, to be hung up from day to day, when the House is perfectly able to decide on it at once.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I can retort on the noble Lord, that the proceedings on the other side of the House are such as very naturally to excite on this side the suspicion of a surprise. The noble Lord having given notice of a Motion, a Member not connected with the Government put an Amendment on the paper; but no one had any reason to suppose that, without any warning, the noble Lord would withdraw his own Motion in favour of the Amendment. To-night, also, we have seen the Tellers of the Government telling in a division against the Motion of the Ministers. A more remarkable deviation from the usual practice of the House, or a more decided case of surprise, I do not recollect. It is a case in which independent Members on this side have a right to protest and complain. I appeal to the noble Lord, under these circumstances, to consent to an adjournment.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I am sure the right hon. Baronet would not willingly state what is not correct. He is mistaken in saying that the Government Tellers have been telling against the Government. The division which has just taken place was on the adjournment of the debate, and in voting against the adjournment we cannot be said to have been voting against our own Motion. I must repeat that the change of intentions on the part of the Government arose out of the debate. Charges of a personal character have been made, and while they remain, is it fair that the Committee should be appointed with three of the chief accusers as members?

LORD ROBERT CECIL: Now it is the right hon. Gentleman's turn to misrepresent facts. ["Oh!"] The statement of the hon. Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer), on which the right hon. Gentleman professes to ground the sudden change of opinion and conduct on the part of the Government, was not made until after the noble Lord had announced his intention of supporting the Amendment. Notice was given of the Motion for this Committee last night, but it was not moved. It was put off. [SIR GEORGE GREY: For a reason assigned.] And then secretly notice of an Amendment was given by the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Clay), but no notice was given for that summons of forces necessary on such occasions. The summons, however, took place on the other side ["No!"], although not on this. If the noble Lord perseveres in taking so unjust a course, I, for one, will do my utmost to resist it.

MR. DENMAN said that, so far from there having been a summoning of forces, he was accidentally present when the Motion came on. On the first night on the debate upon this subject he thought the character of the House was deeply compromised: and he believed it would be still more compromised if it consented to the Committee containing three avowed accusers of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. CLAY observed, that the noble Lord the Member for Stamford had accused the Home Secretary of a misrepresentation of facts without adopting the ordinary courtesy of giving credit to the right hon. Baronet of not intending to misrepresent. The right hon. Gentleman did not say the opinion of the Government was changed by the speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for Dundalk. What he said was that it had been changed by the tone of the debate, and he referred to the speech of the hon. Baronet in illustration of that tone.

Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

The House divided:—Ayes 32; Noes 62: Majority 30.

MAJOR KNOX then moved the adjournment of the debate.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: As it is evident that hon. Gentlemen opposite wish to keep us here, and as I am sure the decision of a much fuller House will confirm the opinion which the majority has expressed to-night, I shall not object to the adjournment of the debate.

QUESTION.

MR. J. TOLLEMACHE said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General a question with respect to the Birkenhead Iron-clads. It appeared that these vessels had been sold to the Government for £220,000, although the sum at first asked for them was £300,000. He believed, however, that the whole transaction was conducted by the owners of the ships, and not in any way by the builders. He wished to ask his hon. and learned Friend, Whether the offer to sell the Birkenhead Iron-clads at the price of £300,000 was made to the Government by the owners, Messrs. Bravay, or by the builders, Messrs. Laird?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, said, the offer was made by the gentlemen representing themselves as the owners, namely, the Messrs. Bravay. No such proposal emanated from the builders, Messrs. Laird.

TESTS ABOLITION (OXFORD) BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. TREFUSIS: I hope, Sir, that the great importance of the Bill, the details of which we are now asked to discuss, the great difference of opinion which existed at the time of the second reading, and the different views which were taken by the principal supporters of this measure as to its bearing and effect upon the University of Oxford, will be reasons sufficient to justify me in asking the House once more to consider, whether it will assent to its further progress during the present Session. The arguments against the Bill have already, on a former occasion, been very fully stated, so that I can promise to be brief. I shall endeavour also, in the few observations which I shall address to the House, to imitate the fairness and moderation with which the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Sussex has conducted the discussion on this Bill, and which have contributed so much, in my opinion, to raise a question which might easily be made the subject of angry controversy, far above the level of a mere party conflict, and to place it in such a position before the House that its merits and demerits may be calmly and temperately discussed. The question itself is necessarily one of those the discussion of which is attended with some inconvenience in this House, because it involves allusions to those differences of religious opinion which it is never desirable to bring prominently forward; but when these questions are forced upon us, it is necessary to meet them boldly and to argue them without reserve, and at the same time to meet them, as I feel sure they may be met and argued, without anything approaching to ill feeling or animosity towards those with whom, on such important subjects, we may happen to differ. Now, Sir, this Bill has been recommended to the House partly on the ground that it introduces no new principle, but that it is merely a completion of the work which was commenced at Oxford in the year 1854; but I maintain, and I shall endeavour to show, that it does seek to introduce an entirely new principle into the constitution of the University of Oxford, that it takes a step far in advance of the legislation of that year, and makes an important alteration which Parliament at that time distinctly refused to sanction. For when religious tests were abolished in the case of those who sought admission to the University, and of those who took the first degree of Bachelor of Arts, this alteration was supported by an argument of this kind: it was said that inasmuch as, since the repeal of the Tests and Religious Disabilities Acts, public offices and places of all kinds in the State were open to all persons irrespective of their religious opinions, the State had a right to demand that the University should give to all who chose to avail themselves of it, the benefit of the best education the country afforded; but this argument ceased to have any weight when it became a question of the abolition of tests in the case of the higher degrees. This step Parliament refused to take, and for this obvious and, as I think, sufficient reason; that when a Member of the University has passed his B. A. degree the educational course as far as he is concerned is concluded. On taking the M. A. degree he ceases to be in statu pupillari; he is admitted into Convocation, the body which passes the laws and appoints to nearly all the offices in the gift of the University: so that if you abolish the existing tests at Oxford you introduce this new and, as I think, objectionable principle, that you give a share of the government of the University to those who are not members of the Church of England. But it has been one of the complaints against the present tests, that it is unjust to exclude any one from the benefits of an academical education on account of his religious opinions; and to sustain this complaint it is necessary to assume that the University education is not complete until the degree of M.A. has been taken; whereas the truth is, that the very fact of an Undergraduate becoming a Bachelor of Arts is a proof that his education is completed, and the degree of Master of Arts is not a mark of any greater proficiency, but merely a sign of some additional academical standing. Now I confess I think that unless there is some very strong necessity and some very urgent demand founded on very good reasons, it is not desirable that Parliament should interfere to make a compulsory alteration in the regulations of our Universities. I do not deny the right of Parliament to interfere in these matters; that right has been exercised already on more than one occasion, but I do think that it ought to be exercised with the greatest caution, and only with the authority and on the responsibility of the Government. I cannot think that the necessity has arisen; nor can I find, judging from the petitions which have been presented to this House, that there is any demand for this Bill, either on the part of the University itself, or of those most likely to be affected by a measure of this kind. There is one important petition against this Bill, to which I think due weight has not yet been given in the discussions on this subject—namely, that from the University of Oxford, presented by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in which the petitioners (the Chancellor, Masters and Scholars of the University) say, that

“This Bill would destroy to a great extent the existing securities that the government, teaching, and discipline of the University and of its Colleges and Halls shall be intrusted to members of the Church of England: that, as to the Colleges generally, it would remove the most important of these securities, whilst with respect to the University as a whole it would abolish them altogether.”

Such a petition, coming from those who would be principally affected by the passing of this Bill, is entitled, I think, to some attention from this House: on the other hand, I find petitions in favour of this Bill from various Educational Establishments in the country not connected with the Church of England, namely, from the Professors and Students of Spring Hill College near Birmingham—from the principal Professors and Students of Manchester New College, London—from the Professors and Students of the Countess of Huntingdon's College, Cheshunt, in the county of Hertford, and from Professors and Students of the Independent College in the county of Brecon. Now, Sir, it would be interesting to know whether any religious test or qualification is required from those who receive their education in these and similar institutions, or are admitted to their government or the management of their affairs ; because, if there is, I think that they are not justified in coming to this House and endeavouring to force upon the University of Oxford a system which in their own case they are unwilling to adopt. But there does not appear to be a single petition from those who are said to be especially aggrieved—namely, those who having taken their first degree of Bachelor of Arts are prevented from proceeding to the higher degrees by the necessity of subscribing the Thirty-nine Articles and the three articles of the 36th Canon. Now this is somewhat remarkable, and can only, I think, be accounted for in one of two ways: either there are no persons in this position, in which case the grievance is a mere theory and has not yet assumed a practical shape, or else those who are in this position do not sympathize with the objects of this Bill ; they are satisfied with the benefits of the education they have received, and they feel that their prospects in life are not marred by their exclusion from the privilege of writing M.A. after their names. I am aware, Sir, that there was a petition presented last year in favour of the abolition of religious tests at Oxford from certain Professors and others at that University, which was the subject of debates both in this and the other House of Parliament ; but I believe that the most that could be said for that petition was, that it was signed by a few eminent men, but it was in no sense a petition from the University, and did not represent the opinions of even a considerable minority of the resident and non-resident members of Convocation. If then there is no demand for this Bill, and if persons of all religious persuasions are admitted to the educational advantages of the University, I must consider for a moment an objection which has been urged against the tests themselves. It has been said that they tend to provoke religious disunion, and add fuel to religious discord, and that if you remove them peace and harmony will be restored. We are told that the tests are useless because they have failed to produce unanimity of opinion on religious subjects—that there are theological differences already at Oxford, although those who have been admitted to full academical privileges must have signed these tests before they could obtain them. Well, Sir, that may be true to a certain extent, and no one can lament it more than I do; and it is precisely because I do lament it, and because I do not wish to see these evils aggravated, that I oppose a measure which will admit persons of every shade of religious belief and unbelief (for the Bill makes no exceptions) to the control of the studies, education, and government, and may place them in positions of authority and influence in the University and in the Colleges. At this stage of the progress of the Bill, it is important to consider whether, in the event of its becoming law, we may hope that we have seen the last of the demands which will be made upon our Universities in this direction. Our former experience on this subject is certainly not encouraging. First of all, in the year 1854, we had the Oxford University Act, by which the education of that University was thrown open to all persons irrespective of religious distinctions. Then, two years afterwards, came the Cambridge University Act, which abolished oaths or declarations for admission to the higher degrees, but coupled with the important restriction that a declaration of bond fide church membership should be signed before a Master of Arts could become a Member of the Senate, and so take part in the government of the University. Eight years pass, and we have the Bill now before us, seeking to abolish all tests, and to give to all admission to the higher degrees, and a share in all the powers of government and discipline at Oxford ; and, as if that were not enough, we have hanging over us the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), by which he proposes to abolish the necessity of subscription to the Liturgy of the Church of England by those who become Tutors or Fellows of Colleges. But let us suppose that this Bill is passed into law ; we know that it will not satisfy its principal supporters, who think, with my hon. Friend the Member for the City of Oxford (Mr. Neate) that “ this measure will be useless unless it pave the way to a full admission to all emoluments and professorships both in the University and in the Colleges ; ” still less, if it pass, in the modified form which has been suggested, will it satisfy those petitioners in its favour, who pray for “ equal rights to participate in the honours, offices, government, and emoluments of the Universities.”

But, Sir, argue as we may on the provisions of this Bill, as it is presented to the House, there can be no doubt that there is a far more important question at issue than the mere abolition of a religious test. By our decision on this Bill, we shall decide whether the University of Oxford is to continue any longer in connection with the Established Church; whether it is to hold out to the country the advantages of a definite system of religious teaching. There are some persons, no doubt, who think that our Universities would be better without a religion; but I cannot understand upon what principle of reason or of justice they would force them to abandon that connection with the religion of the country, which has been the cause of the confidence which is felt in their teaching, and the source of the infinite blessings which they have conferred, and are still conferring upon the whole country. In these days, too, when the principle of religious liberty is so thoroughly established, and the right of all sects and denominations to hold the religious opinions which may be most agreeable to their feeling and conscience is so fully recognized, will those who dissent from the doctrines of the Church of England deny to the University of Oxford that privilege which they claim so loudly for themselves? Is the University of Oxford—a national institution charged with the instruction, not of the laity only, but of the clergy also, for service of the National Church—not to be allowed to profess a definite creed, and to fence it round with those safeguards which it considers necessary to preserve it in its purity and its integrity? We live, Sir, in times when doubts and difficulties are raised on the most sacred subjects, and when scepticism and infidelity are openly avowed. It will not tend to allay doubts nor to check infidelity, if the University of Oxford, which should be a guide in these matters, show itself indifferent in questions of doctrine, and becomes indistinct in its religious teaching. I do hope, Sir, that the House will consider seriously the tendency of this and similar measures; and if it appears that this Bill, introduced as it is by private Members, who have not yet agreed as to their own wishes and intentions with respect to it, is an undue and uncalled for interference with the University, that it will lead to a severance of the connection between the University and the Church of England, and that, in whatever shape it may be passed, it is merely an instalment of farther and more extreme measures, I trust that a majority of the

House will support the Motion which I now beg, Sir, to place in your hands—"that the House will, on this day six months, go into Committee on this Bill."

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Trefusis.)

—instead thereof.

MR. LEATHAM said: Mr. Speaker, the objection of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Trefusis), which relates to that portion of this Bill in which as a Nonconformist I feel more especial interest, is comprised in the assertion that if passed it will sever the connection between the Church of England and the governing body of the University. I have listened attentively to the speech of the hon. Member and to those which have been delivered on previous occasions by hon. Members opposite, and I find the same reiteration running through them all, but without any very formidable attempt to justify it by an appeal to reason, and without even the rudiment of an attempt to support it by an appeal to fact. But hon. Gentlemen seem to think that they can make up for the disuse of reason by the abuse of a sister faculty. They have made powerful appeals to the imagination, and have told us, that if this Bill should pass it will be necessary to establish another University with "cardinal and fundamental features of exclusion which shall shut out the sons of Dissenters." Now, Sir, I am aware that hon. Gentlemen, when they discuss Church questions or quasi-Church questions, have by long usage established for themselves something like an ancient right of being as courageous and nearly as illogical as they please; but I do think that the use of such an argument as this amounts to an abuse of even the right which they have of being illogical. It seems to me to be all of a piece with the argument of the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord R. Cecil), who, when my right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock brought in his Bill last year, assured us, with a gravity befitting the occasion, that it was calculated to lead to the election of a Jew Vice Chancellor, and afterwards proceeded to argue that when the Jew Vice Chancellor was elected, the University would cease to pay, because the upper classes would cease to frequent it. Now when the noble Lord made this astounding communication to the House, I cannot say that I experienced much surprise, because we are not unaccustomed to hear that kind of argument from the lips of the noble Lord; nor was I much surprised when the hon. and learned Member for the University (Mr. Selwyn) indulged in his great flight of imagination the other day, because there seems to be something about these questions which, when they are discussed by hon. Gentlemen opposite, however logical or candid or able they may be at other times—just in proportion as it excites the irritability of their belief—impairs the vigour of their understanding. Take, for example, their opposition to this clause. It is opposed on the ground that it will sever the connection between the Church of England and the University, and yet in the same breath every speaker of eminence who has addressed himself to that side of the question has told us, that nineteen-twentieths—some go so far as to say ninety-nine-hundredths—of those whose social position enables them to avail themselves of an University education are members of the Church of England. Now is this logical? How can this possible sprinkling of Dissenters destroy the supremacy of the Church at the University? And yet this is a very fair sample of the kind of argument with which hon. Gentlemen are content to discuss these questions, and to which a long and melancholy experience has inured, I will not say reconciled, this part of the House. Why, Sir, the history of religious freedom in this country is the history of the systematic disregard of these sepulchral prophecies. What was it that was said when it was proposed to repeal the Test and Corporation Acts, to admit the Jews to Parliament, or to emancipate the Roman Catholics? Was it not said that you were polluting the pure stream of legislation at its source, that you were severing the connection between the Church of England and the Legislature, that you were inaugurating in this House a conspiracy against the Protestant religion of this country? And how was it that an enlightened Churchman of that day dealt with these delusions? "If all the seventy members," said Sydney Smith, "were of the Catholic persuasion, they must still plot the destruction of our religion in the midst of 588 Protestants. Such terrors," he proceeds, and his words seem strikingly applicable to the present terrors of hon. Gentlemen opposite, "such terrors would disgrace a cookmaid or a toothless aunt; when they fall from the lips of bearded and senatorial men, they are nauseous, anti-peristaltic, and emetical." And, Sir, when this clause is passed (and it will be passed, whether you pass it to-day or not), the Dissenters who will be admitted to the Senate will have to plot (if, indeed, Dissent and conspiracy be convertible terms), will have to plot the downfall of the supremacy of the Church at the Universities (by hon. Gentlemen's own showing) in a minority of twenty to one—some of them say of a hundred to one—and such is the estimate which you have formed of the ability and the vigilance and the constancy of those who constitute this vast majority, that you dare not intrust to these tremendous odds the maintenance of your system; but the moment the Dissenter is in imagination within the walls of the Senate House, that moment you propose to haul down the flag, to abandon the University with all her rich spoils and her immemorial renown, and build elsewhere another University possessing those "cardinal and fundamental features of exclusion," which shall satisfy the anxious minds of the fathers of families, that the fragile and exotic faith of their offspring shall not be blighted by the breath, I do not say of scepticism, for you have that already in abundance, and you do not talk of abandoning your University on that account, but of that other pestilential thing which is so much more formidable than scepticism—Nonconformity. But, Sir, I feel as though I were abusing the patience of the House when I treat seriously such arguments as this. And yet if they cannot be treated seriously why are they advanced? What are they worth? What possible harm can come of our disregard of them? What harm has ever come of our habitual disregard of them? Dissenters, Catholics, Quakers, and Jews sit in Parliament, hold offices of trust all over the country, and the Church of England still exists; the Church not only exists, but the repeal of every intolerant statute which you have repealed has served to consolidate her power, and every grievance which you have removed or abated has been an element of danger taken out of her path, and yet with all this experience at our command we are still hesitating and deprecating and prophesying and romancing; we sweep the whole horizon for danger whenever it is proposed to take a single step forward in mention was made of a Duke of Argyll having been beheaded on a Monday, whilst another account stated that he was hanged on a Tuesday, but no one doubted the fact of the execution having actually taken place. Although there was some discrepancy in point of time relative to the action recently fought off Heligoland, no one doubted that the action had taken place. According to the new creed, Paley was a heretic. But Paley and all his followers were branded as heretics by the extreme party of the Church, and were exposed to what the right hon. Member for Bucks had once called very aptly "the humdrum persecution of Oxford University." Nothing in his opinion could be more fatal to the interests of the Church and the interests of true religion than to lay down the proposition that the truths of religion and the course of science were at sharp issue, if on the one side there should be all the intellect and genius of the University, and on the other numbers should be called up at the boatswain's whistle. He objected to all attempts to stigmatize science as being opposed to religion. He did not care from what party the attempt came—whether in a pastoral letter from Cardinal Wiseman or a Protestant bull from the Earl of Shaftesbury. It had been stated that the passing of the Bill would not conclude the question, and that the Dissenters would ask for more—that this was merely an attempt to drive in the thin end of the wedge. Now, if it should be found necessary, he was prepared to go further. He was disposed to act on the broad principle that all our legislation for many years had been in the direction of civil and religious liberty, and if any one blot, any fancied disability which acted as a stigma on the Dissenters could be pointed out, he should be glad to see it wiped away as a disgrace to our present age and civilization. The arguments by which the hon. Member for Devon endeavoured to persuade the House to reject this Bill were those of antiquated fear. They were very much those which Dryden, in his poem The Hind and the Panther, placed in the mouth of the "spotted beast," who represented the Church of England. The poet made her say

Our tests exclude you from all benefit."

And then the Panther went on to talk of the great ocean of rebellion, which,

Mr. C. C. Clifford

These words, which were put ironically in the mouth of the Church of England by Dryden, were much the same as those used by the hon. Member for Devon and his friends. He certainly was not a friend of any ocean of Dissent coming to sweep away the tower and spires of Oxford. He believed that that great ocean would prove but an insignificant dribble of a stream, and he treated the fears which existed as a mere idle chimera. It had been truly said by the hon. Member who had moved the rejection of the Bill that these were critical times. That was an additional argument for the passing of the Bill. If the Church had to enter into a warfare with rationalism and scepticism, let her not enter into the contest clogged with these tests and formularies, which provided no security for true religion. Let her not go into the battle with one arm shackled, but let her rely on the truth, and fight the battle fairly and honestly.

MR. MORRISON pointed out that after the Bill had been deliberately discussed on the second reading, and affirmed by a majority, it rested with those who opposed it again at that stage to state what new reasons had arisen for inducing the House to change its opinion. As, however, the supporters of the Amendment remained silent, it must be presumed that they confessed that the weight of argument rested with the supporters of the Bill, and that they meant to rest solely on the vis inertiae of numbers; in fact, to use a phrase which had become historic, "to fight it out on that line if it cost the whole summer." The principle of the Bill was not novel. As had been stated by the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Dodson) it was contained in one of the recommendations of the University Commission, and it was a necessary supplement to previous legislation. Hon. Gentlemen opposite had in fact long since given up the substance, and were now fighting only for a mere shadow. But the principle of the Bill had more than that to recommend it. It formed part of a movement which had been going on for some time past. Time was when the word clerk was synonymous with an educated man, and the education of the community, not only in this country but abroad, was entirely in the hands of the clergy, and it was well known that they kept it to themselves. Gradually a change took place, inaugurated by the Reformation; but it was not until lately that laymen were permitted to hold professorships at Oxford. Until very recently efface his attachment to Nonconformity ; and, when to all these allurements you add the removal of those disabilities which at present rankle in his mind, keeping up the irritation with which he regards the pretensions and exclusiveness of the Church, and which is the true safeguard of his Nonconformity, the temptation is complete—the trap is baited with an art and a power which will enable you to capture nine out of ten of those who enter the University as Nonconformists. Well, then, it may be asked—and it is a very fair question—why do I, who am a Nonconformist, support this Bill? Because, Sir, there are some things which, to my thinking, are greater than Nonconformity. What is it that underlies all Nonconformity? What is it that redeemed all its uncouthness and extravagance 200 years ago, when the prisons were full of it? It was the protest which it has ever borne to liberty of conscience—to the great and cardinal principle that the consciences of men are free—that you may swaddle them as you will in creeds and catechisms, you may bind them as you please with tests and Acts of Parliament, you may allure them as you like with emolument and honour ; but there is something in the soul of man which refuses to be dwarfed, and bound, and tempted ; there is something so high and so free that it laughs, not only your tests and your Acts of Parliament, but, if need be, your prisons and your scaffolds to scorn. And, Sir, it is because this Bill touches, although it may be only the very edge of this great principle, that whatever may be its effect upon Nonconformity, I am for the Bill of my hon. Friend.

MR. C. C. CLIFFORD said, it was erroneous to suppose that those who supported the Bill were inimical to the University of Oxford. He was peculiarly identified with that University ; and, so far from considering the Bill was prejudicial to it, in reality he believed it would be of great strength and advantage to it. He had no wish to be relieved from his subscription to the Articles. He believed few men had taken more oaths than he had himself, and he could assure the House his conscience was perfectly easy on that score. It had never been his wish to promulgate any doctrine contrary to the Church ; and, indeed, the peculiar emphasis with which he had pronounced the words “horrible and damnable doctrine,” and the sternness with which he had regarded the Proctor, who at that day was supposed to be inclined to recreancy, had induced the Vice Chancellor to request him to act as his fagelman in putting the oath on other occasions. There was no manner of doubt that the multiplication of these tests at a time of life when young men were most inclined to lose themselves in theoretical speculations often drove into the ranks of Dissent men who might otherwise have become zealous defenders of the Church. Nothing could be more absurd than to attempt to check in such a manner the free progress of opinion. In secular matters it had been found impossible to stop the growth of opinion, and in spiritual matters not all the councils, synods, universities, or boards in the world would have any effect. He had read with very great, and at the same time painful, interest, the Apologia pro Vita Sua, by Dr. Newman. Dr. Newman was, perhaps, the man of all others who had inflicted the most deadly stabs upon the Church of England, and had caused the largest number of persons to secede from that Church, and so far from saying one word against his character he (Mr. Clifford) would bear his public testimony that he believed him to be an honest and conscientious man. He had referred, however, to this work for the purpose of showing how absurd and ludicrous it was to try to check the growth of opinion at Oxford, even within the walls of the University, and amongst its teachers. It was impossible to prevent the growth of opinion within the walls of the Church, and Dr. Newman left it, not on account of having subscribed the Articles, but on account of the Donatist controversy, of which no one was more ignorant than himself. The hon. Member who had moved the rejection of the Bill had said, that it was time for the Church to take a decided line. One party in the Church had moved and taken a very decided line, and he was glad that there was a House of Commons, and that there were courts of law ready to stand against the narrow-minded bigotry of a certain party in the Church. If the question was asked, who wrote the most distinguished work in defence of the Christian religion, the answer would be “Paley.” That writer admitted that there were certain discrepancies in the memories of a time antecedent, and he relied upon those discrepancies for the purpose of showing that the books were written without concert or conspiracy, and that they were genuine. He compared them with the events of profane history, and stated that mention was made of a Duke of Argyll having been beheaded on a Monday, whilst another account stated that he was hanged on a Tuesday, but no one doubted the fact of the execution having actually taken place. Although there was some discrepancy in point of time relative to the action recently fought off Heligoland, no one doubted that the action had taken place. According to the new creed, Paley was a heretic. But Paley and all his followers were branded as heretics by the extreme party of the Church, and were exposed to what the right hon. Member for Bucks had once called very aptly "the humdrum persecution of Oxford University." Nothing in his opinion could be more fatal to the interests of the Church and the interests of true religion than to lay down the proposition that the truths of religion and the course of science were at sharp issue, if on the one side there should be all the intellect and genius of the University, and on the other numbers should be called up at the boatswain's whistle. He objected to all attempts to stigmatize science as being opposed to religion. He did not care from what party the attempt came—whether in a pastoral letter from Cardinal Wiseman or a Protestant bull from the Earl of Shaftesbury. It had been stated that the passing of the Bill would not conclude the question, and that the Dissenters would ask for more—that this was merely an attempt to drive in the thin end of the wedge. Now, if it should be found necessary, he was prepared to go further. He was disposed to act on the broad principle that all our legislation for many years had been in the direction of civil and religious liberty, and if any one blot, any fancied disability which acted as a stigma on the Dissenters could be pointed out, he should be glad to see it wiped away as a disgrace to our present age and civilization. The arguments by which the hon. Member for Devon endeavoured to persuade the House to reject this Bill were those of antiquated fear. They were very much those which Dryden, in his poem The Hind and the Panther, placed in the mouth of the "spotted beast," who represented the Church of England. The poet made her say

"Our penal laws no son of yours acquit,
Our tests exclude you from all benefit."

And then the Panther went on to talk of the great ocean of rebellion, which,

"——— with resistless sway,

Mr. C. C. Clifford

These words, which were put ironically in the mouth of the Church of England by Dryden, were much the same as those used by the hon. Member for Devon and his friends. He certainly was not a friend of any ocean of Dissent coming to sweep away the tower and spires of Oxford. He believed that that great ocean would prove but an insignificant dribble of a stream, and he treated the fears which existed as a mere idle chimera. It had been truly said by the hon. Member who had moved the rejection of the Bill that these were critical times. That was an additional argument for the passing of the Bill. If the Church had to enter into a warfare with rationalism and scepticism, let her not enter into the contest clogged with these tests and formularies, which provided no security for true religion. Let her not go into the battle with one arm shackled, but let her rely on the truth, and fight the battle fairly and honestly.

MR. MORRISON pointed out that after the Bill had been deliberately discussed on the second reading, and affirmed by a majority, it rested with those who opposed it again at that stage to state what new reasons had arisen for inducing the House to change its opinion. As, however, the supporters of the Amendment remained silent, it must be presumed that they confessed that the weight of argument rested with the supporters of the Bill, and that they meant to rest solely on the vis inertiae of numbers; in fact, to use a phrase which had become historic, "to fight it out on that line if it cost the whole summer." The principle of the Bill was not novel. As had been stated by the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Dodson) it was contained in one of the recommendations of the University Commission, and it was a necessary supplement to previous legislation. Hon. Gentlemen opposite had in fact long since given up the substance, and were now fighting only for a mere shadow. But the principle of the Bill had more than that to recommend it. It formed part of a movement which had been going on for some time past. Time was when the word clerk was synonymous with an educated man, and the education of the community, not only in this country but abroad, was entirely in the hands of the clergy, and it was well known that they kept it to themselves. Gradually a change took place, inaugurated by the Reformation; but it was not until lately that laymen were permitted to hold professorships at Oxford. Until very recently a lay classical master of any pretensions was the greatest rarity, and no layman would ever have thought of opening a private school for higher classification. That feeling had had great effect in retarding the progress of opinion in this country; for there had always been a tendency among the clergy to set themselves against freedom of thought. It was not for the advantage of the Church of England, or of the clergy and youth of the Church of England, that these theological considerations should be allowed to prevail for the future. Every one must admit the defects that exist at Oxford even in classical learning, and as to modern history and law the number who qualified themselves to take high places was very limited indeed. He did not mean to say that all this was to be ascribed to the exaction of the subscription; but no one acquainted with the position of affairs at Oxford could be ignorant that it was not a mere theoretical grievance which this Bill sought to remedy; and as far as the remedy was concerned, no member of the University of Cambridge would say that the course which had been adopted there had injured the Church of England. It had been said that one part of the Bill was a very small question, and, perhaps, the right to put M.A. after one's name instead of B.A. was not a very large one. Still, the great mass of mankind did think much of such distinctions, and there were very few people indeed who did not believe that M.A. meant some very superior degree of learning, and not merely some additional payments. The question whether Nonconformist Masters of Art should have a share in the Government of the University was of more importance. But how many Nonconformists were there at the University now, or what appreciable number was there likely to be for years to come? What was the reason he could not say; but it was certain that both in this country and in America the great mass of the upper classes belonged to the Church of England, and when Dissenters rose in the world there was always a tendency among them to join the Church. Why, then, should any sharp line of demarcation be drawn which would make it almost a point of honour with them not to go over to the Church. By granting this concession they would do away with a grievance. For a number of years to come the number of Dissenters or Roman Catholics obtaining a vote in convocation would be very small indeed. If a majority of convocation should ever consist of such persons, it would imply that a great change had come over the people, and that the great bulk of the intelligent, wealthy, and influential classes of the country had become alienated from the Established Church. The true policy for the Church of England to adopt was, he contended, that of concession, and those he believed to be in reality its worst enemies who would hedge it round with an artificial system of protection. For these reasons he should vote in favour of going into Committee on the Bill.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House had stated that the principle of the Bill had been accepted by the House on the second reading on the 16th of March, and that they ought not to attempt to reverse the decision at which the House had then arrived. But he (Sir Stafford Northcote) contended that the principle of the measure had not been accepted by the House on the 16th of March. The fact was that the Members who then voted for the second reading were not agreed among themselves as to what was the nature of that principle; and many of them had declared that they would not support it if it were really what it had been described to be by those Members who had gone out with them into the same lobby. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary had stated upon that occasion that they should regard the Bill as an objectionable measure, and would vote against the third reading if they thought it to be of the character which the hon. Member for Huddersfield had just described. They added that if certain Amendments were introduced into the Bill they should continue to give it their support, and it was expected that in the interval which had since elapsed the Government would have made up their minds as to the plan upon which they would recommend the House to proceed, and would have placed upon the notice paper the Amendments which they deemed to be necessary in order to make the Bill what it ought to be. Instead, however, of that having been done, the House stood exactly at the present moment in the same position in which it was placed on the second reading, no indication having been made from the Government or any other quarter as to the Amendments which it was expedient to introduce. Now, considering the importance of the subject, the matter was one, in his opinion, in which the Government ought to have taken the initiative with the view of guiding the action of the House. The question, he might add, was one which went beyond the mere points of detail which had been dwelt upon by the speakers who preceded him. It raised the issue whether Parliament was prepared to go on continually tampering with our Universities whenever the salary of a Professor, a vote in Convocation, or similar occasions for comment arose. Was that House to be perpetually endeavouring to rectify every mistake into which the authorities at those great establishments might be supposed to have fallen in the discharge of their minuter duties. That was not the policy on which they had hitherto proceeded in legislating for the Universities, and, in his opinion, it was a policy which they ought not to adopt. They had some time ago entered into a general review of the whole condition of the Universities; it was very right that they should from time to time undertake such a task; but were hon. Members, he would ask, prepared to go back again and to re-open questions which it was supposed had then been settled. The hon. Member for Huddersfield, indeed, was anxious to move on in the interests of the Nonconformists, and the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight seemed to think that whenever any difficulty arose in the Universities about a matter of faith it should be made the subject of discussion in the House of Commons; but, if their views and those of the hon. Member for Plymouth were accepted, there was no reason why persons not being members of the Church of England, having been admitted to the degree of M.A., should not turn round and say, "Why shut us out from Convocation and all the honours and emoluments which the Universities can confer?" That being the state of the case, it was extremely expedient that hon. Members should know the exact nature of the measure for which they were asked to vote, for the only principle decided on the second reading of the Bill was that most mischievous principle, that it was desirable to keep moving. It was most important, too, that it should be borne in mind, that it was a great fact in the constitution of this country that we had an Established Church, and that that Church was intimately connected with our Universities, so that they were not simply lay but to a great extent Church Universities also. In conclusion, he would observe that he objected to the restless action of the promoters of the Bill, who, while refraining from showing their whole hand, raised questions of enormous magnitude, and for those reasons he thought his hon. Friend (Mr. Trefusis) had done quite right in giving the House another opportunity of expressing its sense upon the principle of the Bill. They took the principle of the Bill as they found it, and in justice to themselves they must refuse their assent to going into Committee.

Mr. ROEBUCK said, he for one had no objection to show his whole hand. The proposition before the House was to do away in certain cases with the use of tests. Now he objected to the use of such tests, and he would state the reason why. A test was the means to an end, but what was the end sought—to preclude the admission of persons to the privileges conferred by the great Universities who were not members of the Church of England. But did the test in question, he would ask, effect that purpose? It was true it excluded some persons, but it was a sort of cobweb which let through the large flies and caught only the small. There was a large body of educated men in this country who did not believe in the Church of England, but who said to themselves, "We will not incur the imputations which are invariably cast on men not of the orthodox creed, and, as we do not much care about the matter, we will conform." Could one single man of that class be excluded under the operation of the test? He would, in illustration of his argument, advert to two cases which just occurred to him. There were two men well known in English literature who, as everybody was aware, had not a particle of faith in the doctrines of the Church of England—he alluded to Gibbon and Hume. Could Gibbon have been excluded by the test—he did not mean when he was a boy, and might have some conscientious scruples on the subject, but when he became a man? Could Hume have been excluded? Not a bit of it. He would have laughed at the test, and said after his own fashion that it was a bigoted contrivance which he would cast to the winds. The case, therefore, stood thus, that while the most thorough infidel and sceptic might obtain admission into Oxford, conscientious persons like the hon. Member for Huddersfield, who might be influenced by scruples, were kept out. And what harm, he would ask—seeing that into that House Jew, Infidel, or Christian might come—could there be in surrendering at Oxford the petty obstruction which it was sought to remove? Oxford would change, and all our institutions might change, but as there was no danger of change in the people of England, and as the obstacle in question hurt the feelings of a large number of estimable men, he would entreat the House not to refuse to comply with their wishes.

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, when the hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. Morrison), in his able and temperate speech, observed that all the arguments on the subject of this Bill had been exhausted, he was disposed to concur with him. But the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down had imported into the consideration of the question an argument which he believed had never occurred to any other Member. The hon. and learned Gentleman had fallen into a transparent fallacy in losing sight of this fact, that all human legislation would break down at some point or another if they did not give mankind some credit for honesty. It was true, as he had argued, that there might be persons entirely without honour whom it was in vain to hope to exclude by any test whatsoever; but that argument, he was happy to think, was not applicable to the case of all men. The tests, he might add, were imposed in the particular instance under discussion not to preclude those who were not members of the Established Church from being educated at the University, but for the purpose of maintaining there on the whole a certain current and tone of religious teaching. He should not, however, have risen to speak on the subject, but for the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down. He wished to press upon the House what had been already put by the hon. Member for Stamford (Sir Stafford Northcote), that they were not taking any unusual or unfair course in asking the House to re-consider the decision they had taken on the second reading. He would place before the House the actual position in which they now stood. On his side of the House they were contented with the present state of the law; nevertheless, some hon. Gentlemen said that if the Bill were amended in certain directions they would, though unwillingly, be disposed to assent to it. On the other side, the hon. Mover and some of his Friends repudiated entirely the amendments suggested. They certainly said they would consider them, but they never gave the slightest intimation that they would assent to them. Then another most important section of the House, who supported the Bill, stated distinctly that they would not accept the measure if it were amended as proposed in respect to the exclusion of the governing body from its operation. It was not for the opponents of the measure to be content with the alternative of rejecting the Bill, or of waiting for the amendments and reject them. The amendments had not been proposed, and the inference was that they found the Bill was not one which they could amend satisfactorily. Either they could not produce the security they desired for themselves, or if they did so it would be unacceptable to those who brought it in, and they did not think it worth while to try it. He called upon the House to reject the Bill.

MR. SCULLY said, he had an Amendment on the paper to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, and he trusted the hon. Gentleman who had moved that the House go into Committee on the Bill that day six months, would accept his (Mr. Scully's) Amendment, because if he did not he would be prevented from taking the opinion of the House upon it. If the hon. Gentleman's Amendment was carried, the Bill would be done with, and if it was not carried the House would at once go into Committee, and he would thus be prevented from moving that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. In his opinion the Bill promised but a miserable instalment of privileges to which the great bulk of the people were entitled to admission. It was not reasonable, he contended, that the bona fide members of the Church of England, who did not constitute one-third of the population of the United Kingdom, should monopolize all the advantages of our Universities. The evidence given before the Oxford Commission in 1853 by a gentleman who was now a senior Fellow at Balliol, showed that it was from the admission of students into the University without being connected with any college or hall, that the greatest good to the University itself, the Church, and the country, was, in the opinion of one of its own members, to be expected. The spirit of the University Reform Acts, which were passed in the years 1854 and 1856, was that Dissenters and Roman Catholics should be admitted to both the Universities; and in accordance with that spirit all the emoluments and offices of those seats of learning ought to be thrown open. The Bill only asked for a small instalment, which would not satisfy the Dissenting body, and in his opinion it would be better if they were to demand at once all to which they were entitled. The scheme for the establishment of licensed halls unconnected with the Colleges had entirely failed. Only one had been established at each University. That at Cambridge, which was intended for the benefit of medical students, had only three pensioners, while in that at Oxford there was only one gentleman commoner. But even if that scheme could be carried out, and if halls were established, the Colleges ought to be opened; and that opening ought, in his opinion, to be provided for under this Bill. The objection to the existing system of tests was, that it excluded two-thirds of the people of the United Kingdom, and at the same time it admitted many who were not bona fide but only professing members of the Church of England. The evidence taken before the Commission and the Report of the Commissioners both stated that the test was accepted by persons without consideration and without study. Without discussing the doctrines contained in the Thirty-nine Articles, it was clear that there were many things in them to which some tender consciences might object; and certainly there were portions to which no Roman Catholic or Dissenter could subscribe. The Bill proposed to substitute a test to which some consciences might still more strongly object. Subscription to the Articles might be submitted to with a mental reservation, but there could be no mistake about the declaration that a person was a bona fide member of the Church of England. That would shut out even more persons than did the existing test. The only way to avoid the evil was to do away with the tests altogether. Why should not an accomplished Jew participate in the emoluments of the Universities which were unconnected with the Church? Some of the most distinguished members of the University of London were Jews, and one of them, Mr. Solomons, had just gained the Inns of Court studentship. Why should that gentleman have been excluded from the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge? In his opinion, the only way in which these difficulties could be met, and the Bill could be satisfactorily dealt with, was by referring it to a Select Committee. If they went into a Committee of the Whole House upon it, there would be sure to be a great deal of wrangling about clauses crudely framed and as crudely opposed. Mixed education was forced upon Ireland, but how could any one believe that it was intended bona fide, unless it was also introduced into England, and carried out in these Universities? The people of the United Kingdom were divided into a great number of religions, which appeared in a great measure to follow the distinctions of race. The Scotch were Presbyterians, the Welsh or ancient Britons were Methodists, the Irish were Catholics, and the English were Protestants; the governing classes, who might be taken to represent the conquering Normans, were Government Protestants, and the other classes who represented the Saxons were Methodists or Nonconformists. ["Question!"]

MR. SPEAKER intimated to the hon. Gentleman that he was passing away from the Question before the House.

MR. SCULLY said, that he should cheerfully submit to the authority of the right hon. Gentleman; but, for his own part, he thought that the differences of religion which prevailed in the United Kingdom and their origin were matters which were closely connected with the Question. It was true that the best and highest education was to be obtained at the Universities, but it was equally true that the worst and lowest education was also to be acquired there. The late Mr. Thackeray was strongly convinced of the necessity of University reform, and said in one of his works—

"I should like to know how many scamps"—Mr. Thackeray used a stronger word—"I should like to know how many scamps our Universities have turned out, and how much ruin has been caused by that system which is called in England 'the education of a gentleman.'"

He desired the admission of the body of the community into the Universities, in order that they might be reformed, and that the evils to which Mr. Thackeray referred might be abolished. He was anxious that the Universities should stand upon the highest pinnacle of greatness and efficiency. If they were not reformed, however, they would go from bad to worse, and if their doors were not opened by that House, they would be opened by the public.

MR. MOOR said, that although he was unwilling to intrude himself on the attention of the House, yet, in the position in which he was placed, he could not give a silent vote. He had voted for the second reading of the Bill, because he conceived that it was time that the Roman Catholic and Nonconformist should be enabled to enjoy the privileges and rights of obtaining a degree at Oxford. But in his own mind he felt that it would not be right that those Masters of Arts should have a voice in the governing power of the University; and he was confirmed in that opinion by the observation that was made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that unless some restrictions were placed on those Masters of Arts with reference to the governing power, he should vote against the Bill on the third reading. Well, he (Mr. Moor) had looked into the paper to see if any Amendment had been proposed in that direction. He had listened to hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, but he had found no indication that such restrictions would be introduced by way of Amendment. The supporters of the Bill had stated that day that there was to be no restriction on the privileges of the Masters of Arts; and, under these circumstances, much as he should regret that Dissenters should be prevented from obtaining that degree, he should feel it his duty to vote against the further progress of the Bill. He made that statement in order to explain to the House the course he was about to pursue in voting at present in opposition to their going into Committee, although he had on a former occasion supported the second reading of the measure.

MR. NEATE said, he must admit that there was a prima facie case for the opposition of the hon. Member for the University to the further progress of the Bill at that stage. Still he thought that the Amendments ought to come from the other side, and that the promoters of the Bill could not be fairly expected to mutilate their own measure. The principle of the Bill, and the only one which the University had a right to insist upon, was, that the religious teaching and the religious worship of the University should be those of the Church of England. Whether those objects would be best secured by a test was a very doubtful matter. He thought that the University would not greatly object to an Amendment which he had intended to propose, giving to all nominal Masters of Arts the power of opening halls without taking a test. Every hall must be conducted by a Master of Arts, and, as the statutes now stood, every Master of Arts must have subscribed the Thirty-nine Articles. The Amendment to which he referred would be a great relief to those who, like his hon. Friend beside him (Mr.

Scully), wished to send their sons to the University. His hon. Friend was going down to Oxford with him (Mr. Neate) next Saturday to find the most convenient place for his son, and he was therefore surprised to hear him speak of the University in such a tone. He should be happy, however, to help his hon. Friend to place his son where he would receive the least detrimental education. With regard to the Parliamentary franchise, he thought it only right that those who had passed three years in the University, and had obtained a degree, should have a voice in the representation of the University, and he believed there would be very little disposition on the part of the University to contest this privilege. He believed it would be a great advantage to have a more liberal spirit introduced into the politics of Oxford. He did not know whether the attention of hon. Members had been directed to a recent banquet in that city, at which the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil) had been a conspicuous speaker. ["Question!"] If there was any Member of that House who was particularly well qualified to take care of himself it was the noble Lord the Member for Stamford; and he would, perhaps, be regarded with something like compassion while he stated that he was about to make what might be called an attack upon that noble Lord. But hon. Members need not fear that he would in any way exceed the limits of Parliamentary courtesy upon that occasion; and he was sure the noble Lord would feel that in anything he might say he would not treat him with personal disrespect. The noble Lord and his friends in order to stir up the dormant Toryism of the University, had held a sort of politico-theological revival. He confessed, however, that when he first saw the speeches in the newspaper account of that meeting he was excited to a feeling of considerable indignation. That indignation, however, before long subsided, and at present he only looked at the matter with a feeling of satisfaction in contemplating a decided failure on the part of his political opponents. A more deplorable failure than that banquet, in which the noble Lord the Member for Stamford took so conspicuous a part, he never recollected. [Cries of "Question!"] There was never any occasion on which the absence of those who alone could give value and importance to such a meeting was more conspicuous. ["Question!"] He was speaking within the limits of the Question, because it was an illustration of the sort of education which those who opposed the moderate Bill wished to instil into the minds of the youth of Oxford. They often had occasion to admire the political and moral courage of the noble Lord, which would not allow him to shrink from expressing himself in somewhat strong and dictatorial language. He (Mr. Neate), however, wished to call attention to one statement made by the noble Lord, which he never would have the moral courage to utter within the walls of that House. The noble Lord told the youth of Oxford that a good Conservative was a good Churchman, to which sentiment he (Mr. Neate) would offer no objection; but the most perfect Conservatism was that which promoted every reform in ecclesiastical as well as in temporal affairs. He might have doubted the fact that every good Conservative was a good churchman, because he believed there had been a great many distinguished men in the Conservative party whom the Church could not have looked upon with such admiration and faith as the noble Lord. [Cries of "Question!"] He submitted that he was speaking to the question when he was calling attention to that singular specimen of the noble Lord's teaching. When the noble Lord went on to say that every good Churchman was a good Conservative, and that no good Churchman would vote for that Bill, he told the noble Lord that he used language which he dared not utter within the walls of that House. Would the noble Lord say that there were not many men on that (the Ministerial) side of the House, who were conspicuous for their attachment to the faith and worship of the Church of England, but who were nevertheless not to be considered good Churchmen unless they were prepared to vote with the noble Lord. If the noble Lord would not make such an assertion in that House, why did he go down to the country for the purpose of using such language to the inexperienced youth of Oxford? Why should he have taken advantage of his great talents to instil into their minds the poison of such political doctrines—doctrines which were formed from a combination of religious intolerance and party animosity? What might be the result of the noble Lord's visit to Oxford, and how far his hopes and prospects might be promoted by his movements on that occasion, no great distance of time would reveal. It might be that the noble Lord would succeed in his object; it might be that that sort of combination which the noble Lord supported might succeed in driving from his seat the present distinguished representative of the University of Oxford. If the noble Lord and his party should succeed in driving the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in sheer weariness of spirit to renounce the honour which he had so long and deservedly enjoyed—the honour he had so long conferred—if he should succeed in driving the right hon. Gentleman to transfer to some constituency the lustre of his name, the right hon. Gentleman would carry with him the regrets of all those gentlemen who were conspicuous in the University for their learning and piety. He was, however, one who, by no means, gave up the hope of retaining the accomplished Gentleman in his present position. Wherever the right hon. Gentleman went he was quite sure that he would carry with him those same principles which he had so long advocated, and which had so long recommended him to the confidence and affection of those whom he might have left, but would not have deserted. If the difficulties that now threatened the Church should increase in their menacing aspect—and they would increase, if the Church should be persuaded to add to its difficulties the damage of the noble Lord's disastrous advocacy; if the time should come—and he believed the time would come—when the Church should be in danger, who was it that the true sons of the Church would look to in their time of need? Was it to the noble Lord the Member for Stamford? Was it to the hon. Member for Durham, or the hon. Member for Northamptonshire? Was it to the hon. Member for Leominster? He singled out those Gentlemen because he regretted to say that they took an active part with the noble Lord at the recent meeting at Oxford. Or was it to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire? He took the liberty of mentioning the name of the right hon. Gentleman, because it was imputed to him by the party with which he was associated, that he was the great champion for the maintenance of those principles enunciated by them. No, it was not to the noble Lord or his friends that the Church would look for advice and assistance when the time of danger should really arrive. The Church would look to one who had always kept religion apart from politics. She would look to that right hon. Gentleman who had always kept religion a sacred thing apart from politics, who had always loved and respected the Church too much to make her the instrument of a party, who had given to her that which no political combination could give—the assistance of a great intellect humbly submitting to her doctrines, and who, more than any one in connection with that Church, had a right to say of himself—

Defendi possent, etiam hac defensa fuissent.*”

LORD ROBERT CECIL: Sir, I received last night, by the courtesy of the hon. Gentleman, an intimation that he intended to attack me to-day about our late visit to Oxford. Well, I am tolerably familiar with the word “attack,” but I confess I was utterly puzzled to think what possible connection there could be between the question of this Bill and the harmless, simple, and obvious Conservative truths which I had uttered at Oxford; and I was still more puzzled to know how any attack upon me in reference to the late meeting could possibly be introduced upon the Motion for going into Committee upon this Bill. Still, as the hon. Gentleman has thought fit to take this occasion for announcing the strength of his own party in Oxford, which he thinks requires an advertisement of this kind, and as he has composed for the occasion a sort of political epitaph for the Chancellor of the Exchequer in anticipation of the dissolution which he evidently sees in more than one sense to be impending, I suppose it is necessary for me, though I feel it is somewhat irregular in discussing the question immediately before us, to notice the hon. Gentleman’s remarks. In the first place, I beg to assure the hon. Gentleman, that if he was present at the meeting to which he refers he would not have talked of the dormant Toryism of the University of Oxford—he would have seen with his own eyes that the Toryism of Oxford was as wide awake Toryism as any he had ever seen in his life. The hon. Gentleman says that the banquet was a failure, because the people with whom he sympathizes were not present at it. I am afraid that if they had been present and had expressed such opinions as those which have fallen from the hon. Gentleman, their persons would not have survived the banquet, inasmuch as that dormant Toryism of which he spoke was in that condition that I do not think it would have endured without some very practical manifestation of vigour the presence of those with whom the hon. Gentleman sympathizes in opinion. But, Sir, I am happy to find that the banquet is not such a failure as the hon. Gentleman thinks, as I gather from his speech, and for two reasons. In the first place, he thinks that the founding of a Conservative association in the University of Oxford is a thing likely to have so much influence on the future political course of that body, and likely to produce so much effect on those on whom its influence is brought to bear, that he has thought it necessary to take this course to add his little mite to contribute to its defeat. In the second place the hon. Gentleman appears to anticipate with no doubtful eye, that the result of the founding of this association will be to make the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer a fit subject for the epitaph which he has pronounced upon him. I can only say now that the right hon. Gentleman’s name has been introduced into this debate, that I had no intention of entering into the merits or demerits of the right hon. Gentleman. Personally I admire him very much, but politically I am opposed to him. I consider it is highly indecorous and unadvisable to make this House the arena for discussing the electoral contingencies of the University, and therefore I pass over that question; but the House will understand that I do not do so for the purpose of shrinking from any subject of discussion, but because I believe I shall not be consulting the dignity and honour of this assembly in following the example which the hon. Gentleman has set. The hon. Gentleman rather startled me when he stated that I had said something somewhere else which I dared not say here. Now I do not think I have impressed upon any hon. Member that my fault is reticence of my opinions; but if the House desires from me a confession of opinion, in the most formal manner, I repeat that I do not think a man can be a good Churchman who is not a good Conservative. But it is possible that the hon. Gentleman and myself may differ as to what a good Churchman means. The Church to which we are attached is an Established Church, and he cannot be a good Churchman at the present day who does not support the Established Church; and he cannot be a good supporter of the Established Church unless he is a good Conservative. [Cheers and counter Cheers.] Well, the test is before you. From what part of the House come the cheers which accompanied the hon. Gentleman’s speech?

Who are they that sympathize with him? Who are they that sympathize with the great example of Liberal Churchmanship to which the hon. Gentleman appeals? Are they in the ranks I see before me? Is that where I am to look for the supporters of the Church who are not Conservatives? Is that the style of opinion which the hon. Member desires to present to the House as that which unites advanced Liberalism with devoted attachment to the Church? If that is what the hon. Gentleman and his friends call Churchmanship, I feel that not only is a Churchman not a good Conservative, but he cannot be a good Conservative if he is a Churchman of that kind. The hon. Gentleman knows that the battle which the Conservatives of the present day have to fight is for the Established Church, which our forefathers have handed down to us, and which is the foremost of the institutions of this realm. That Church the Conservative party are banded together to support. And there is no point to which its efforts are more consistently directed, or by which it has more thoroughly deserved the allegiance of the Conservatives of the country than in the efforts it has directed, and mainly so, to the maintenance of the Established Church. I had no intention of addressing the House on this question, having expressed my feelings on the subject on a similar occasion last year, and I should not have done so had I not been called up by the hon. Member; and in passing away from what the hon. Gentleman has said I hope I have sufficiently convinced him that in our opinion our demonstration at Oxford was not a failure, but that if he is still of opinion there is anything like a failure in it I call on him to consult the future for an answer. You cannot judge of the quality of the seed until you have reaped the harvest, and you cannot tell what the result of your political organization will be until it has borne its legitimate fruits. "Let not him that putteth on his armour boast as he that taketh it off." Let the hon. Gentleman not boast of the failure of that organization which, I freely admit, has come forward to oppose, and, if possible, to exterminate from the University the opinions which the hon. Gentleman entertains, until he has learnt by events that its failure is a reality.

Now, this Bill contains two parts. One part of it changes the tests of the Articles and the Prayer Book to a declaration of bona fide membership of the Church of England. The other part of the Bill is that which relieves all members of convocation forming part of the governing body from any test whatever. Now the first part, which is looked upon as a liberal measure, and is advanced by hon. Gentlemen opposite as such, is in reality a measure of a very exclusive kind. You are asked to relieve them from a test which they say is an embarrassment and a snare to tender consciences, because these tests contain propositions which some interpret one way and some another way. It is said these tests are vague, but it is proposed by this Bill to substitute for them another test so absolutely vague that I defy any hon. Member to tell me what it means. What, for example, is a bona fide member of the Church of England? And in considering it do not approach the question merely as men of the world, but fancy yourselves for a moment to possess one of those scrupulous consciences of which you have heard so much. Some men will think that a bona fide Churchman is a man who not only holds all the belief of the Church of England, but who also obeys her precepts, holds himself bound by her canons, fulfils her directions, and is a sharer of her communion to the full. That I grant is the natural interpretation of the word, and many of those who assent to the test put that straightforward common sense view upon it. But you profess to be legislating specially for the relief of tender and morbid consciences; but I assert that the test you offer is more ensnaring, because more vague and undefined than the one you are going to take away. There is another objection to this test. Many petitions have been presented from Scotland on this subject. Now, in Scotland, they say that as Presbyterians they can sign the Thirty-nine Articles with a perfectly good conscience, but they cannot declare themselves members of the Church of England, and the consequence will be their entire exclusion, if this Bill passes, from the University of Oxford, to which before they had the power of belonging. Therefore, I consider we ought to wait for some further information before we so hurriedly adopt the change offered to us. We have no information to go on, for we have had no inquiry into these morbid consciences, and do not know what they would like. The tests we are using have succeeded very fairly for two centuries, whilst the tests proposed in their places have only had a limited experience at Cambridge of four or five years. What is thought to be the most liberal part of the measure is in reality one of restriction, and such as the House ought not to adopt. This is not the moment for carefully examining the great question of tests. It has been referred to a Royal Commission, and, therefore, it will come before us in a larger manner, and then will be the time for us to examine it; but you must bear in mind that in opening the door of the governing body of the University to all Dissenters and people of all religions, you are putting into their hands the power of regulating absolutely the studies of the University. We have heard from the hon. and learned Member for Cork that an accomplished Jew and persons of all religions might find their way into Convocation under the provisions of this Bill, and regulate the examination. The whole of the collegiate system of education is necessarily moulded upon the subjects which are prescribed for examination, and therefore you are producing by this Bill an entire revolution. You are absolutely severing the connection between the University and the Church. You are turning what for centuries has been an institution for the education of youth in the principles of the dominant religion into a simple instrument for grinding Latin and Greek into young brains. If that is your intention, and you believe that in that way you best fulfil the objects the founders of the University had in view, and promote the moral and spiritual welfare of those over whom you are appointed to watch, then you will support the Bill; but if you desire to promote amongst the upper classes as you do amongst the lower classes a religious education, no man who votes for the existing system of education amongst the lower classes ought to vote for the Bill.

MR. SCULLY said, he had not intended to make any imputation upon the University. He had not interfered, because he did not wish to spoil sport; but as he had himself been called to order, he wished to know whether that disorderly discussion was to be continued.

MR. SPEAKER said, that if the hon. Member for Cork had thought there had been anything out of order, it was his duty to have called attention to it at the time.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he thought that the hon. Member for the City of Oxford had done good service by alluding to the speech of the noble Lord at Oxford. If it were said that the hon. Member for the City of Oxford had dragged the banquet into Parliament, it had been because Parliament had been dragged into the banquet. If Churchmanship was to cover the same ground as Conservatism, what would the noble Lord say to the Roman Catholic Members who sat behind him? [Lord ROBERT CECIL said he had confined his observations to members of the Church of England!] He (Mr. Goschen) was glad the noble Lord had retracted his statement, but he had seldom heard a broader statement made. He maintained that on that (the Liberal) side of the House as staunch friends of the Church might be found as on the other side. If the cry was raised on the other side, "The Church is in danger!" the same cry might be raised on that side—"The Established Church is in danger—the National Church is in danger!" because everything was done that was possible by hon. Members opposite to denationalize the union between Church and State. It was only the other day, when the constituted authorities of the Church made a declaration unpalatable to certain members of that Church, that those who professed to be the only true Churchmen circulated a new and unauthorized test distinct from that sanctioned by the constituted authorities. While they claimed to be an exclusively National Church, they repudiated that nationality and the connection with the State where it did not suit themselves. One of the questions connected with the Bill was certainly this—whether the Universities were clerical seminaries or Universities for the education of youth in the true sense of the word. He believed that there ought to be a religious education at Oxford, as well as at every other educational establishment. But he did not regard Oxford as a clerical seminary, and he did not think that the lay majority ought to be sacrificed to the clerical minority. It was not only priests and clergymen who were educated at Oxford, but English gentlemen and statesmen; and everything should be done to keep the education at Oxford in harmony with the spirit of the age and the nation. They had no Universities in the true sense of the term, unless Oxford and Cambridge were Universities for laymen as well as for the clergy, and therefore he did not think they were acting for the interests of the Church when they acted in the intolerant spirit of which the noble Lord had set them the example. The noble Lord had said that it was impossible to hear at Oxford opinions different from those of his friends, and that any persons that might have expressed them would be exterminated. But the point was this—if Oxford would not reform itself, it must be reformed by the Legislature. It had been said that the promoters of the measure advocated it from different motives. As his name was on the back of the Bill, perhaps the House would allow him to explain what he considered to be its principle. The principle was to abolish all tests for academical degrees, and with respect to the offices held by Churchmen, to substitute one test for those which were in existence. That principle was affirmed on the second reading. Incidentally the measure might give to Nonconformists a certain part of the management and government of the University. But that was not the principle though it might be the effect of the Bill. They would be members of the University in the same sense that other members would be members of the University. He did not advocate the measure because it would give a portion of the government to the Nonconformists. The noble Lord opposite said that the introduction of members who did not entirely agree with the doctrines of the Church of England would be to hand over the government of the University to the majority. That might be so, so soon as the intellect of the nation was no longer in the hands of the Church of England—so soon as the whole spirit of the nation was so far changed as to render such a change possible. But he had so much confidence in the Church that he believed that would never be the case. So long as the Church of England maintained its majority, its supremacy, its hold upon the intellect of the people of England, so long would there be no danger of admitting Nonconformists into the government of the University. The fact was, that in all cases only so many persons would be able to avail themselves of the admission as to give a fair representation of the different denominations, and therefore no danger was likely to arise. But there was a complete safeguard in the hebdomadal board. So long as the Church of England maintained its exclusive power over the authorities and officers, so long the terrible danger which was apprehended would not arise. The noble Lord had talked of “morbid” consciences. He (Mr. Goschen) did not wish to ask any personal question, but he perhaps might be allowed to ask whether the conscience of the noble Lord was a “morbid” one. When he used the expression “morbid conscience,” he applied it to those who did not wish for honesty of declaration. What could be said of a man who declared that he was going to study a subject for the purpose of coming to one particular conclusion? What would a tutor reply to such a “morbid” conscience? Why, he would say, “Give up your studies, or try to study conscientiously.” It was not a fair argument to speak affirmatively and disrespectfully of “morbid” consciences. Surely that ought not to be encouraged at Oxford. They ought rather to encourage the pursuit of truth, and it was in opposition to the spirit of truth to impose tests on all occasions. It discouraged theological studies to do so; but there appeared to be many hon. Members who would stifle those studies. Those who were good Churchmen, however, must hold that the more the doctrines of the Church of England were studied, the more people would be convinced of their truth. He trusted the House would go into Committee on the Bill.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he thought he could point out to the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Moor) an easy mode of escape from the extraordinary difficulty in which he found himself involved. The hon. Gentleman had voted for the second reading, thereby affirming the principle of the Bill; but since that time he had discovered from those who sat around him, that there was a portion of the Bill from which he, as a Member of the party opposite, was bound to differ, and he thought there was no possible mode of escaping the difficulty except by refusing to go into Committee. But if in Committee, where Amendments might be properly made, a proviso was introduced in the first clause, to the effect that the degree of Master of Arts would not constitute a qualification for being a member of Convocation, or holding any office formerly held by a member of the Church of England, the object of the hon. Gentleman might be attained. As an affectionate member of the University of Oxford, he (Mr. C. Fortescue) thought he could not give a better proof of the sincerity of his conviction as to what was the principle of the Bill than by saying that it was as a Churchman that he thanked his hon. Friend for having introduced the Bill, and for having given them an opportunity of getting rid of the bondage of subscription to the body of dogmatical doctrine contained in the Prayer Book. It seemed to him a tyrannical wrong to require the young laymen of this country to declare that they subscribed ex animo to every tenet of controversial divinity that was contained in the formularies of the Church. It was bad enough to require the subscription from clergymen of the Church. But nothing but hereditary habit could have so blinded our minds and hardened our consciences as to induce us to impose such a test upon the laity—a test not required by the Church for participation in her most sacred rite. The movement which was going forward in the Church had not originated in indifference to religion, but, on the contrary, was occasioned by the increased tenderness of conscience, by the growth of religious thought, and by the difficulty of swallowing, as a mere form, those dogmatic propositions which our forefathers accepted without thinking much about the matter. It was because he wished to see the members of the University of Oxford relieved from those tests, which were not required from other laymen who were in communion with the Church of England, that he should support the Motion for going into Committee.

MR. HENLEY: I hardly intended to take part in this discussion; at all events, I do not mean to say much. After the strange statement of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, I must allude to it. He has told us that he speaks as a Churchman when he says that it would be of great advantage to us to be relieved from the bondage of the Prayer Book and Articles. That is a strange statement. I cannot understand one, who, at a mature age, boasts of being a Churchman and speaks of the bondage of the Prayer Book and the Articles. The question now before the House is, whether we shall go into Committee on the Bill; but, indisposed as I generally am to take part in second discussions upon almost the same thing, I feel bound to say that the course taken upon the second reading by the authors of the Bill, what they stated and still more what they denied, gives me the strongest grounds for thinking that the moving of the Amendment was nothing more than fair and prudent Parliamentary action. The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) told us unmistakably that the Bill does not go far enough. The hon. Member for the city of Oxford (Mr. Neate), in equally plain terms, said that in his judgment the governing body of the University should be thrown open to Dissenters and Catholics. The hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), whose name is on the back of the Bill, said that he would have no compromise, and that Conformists and Nonconformists ought to be members of the governing body. The Bill on its second reading received the support of some solely on the ground that amendments would be introduced in Committee. But it is not for those who are opposed to the Bill altogether to attempt to amend it. That is quite contrary to Parliamentary practice. It is quite plain from the course of the debate to-day, and the arguments of the hon. Member for London, that the friends of the Bill mean to accept no compromise. I do not wonder at that, for they know that a great majority of the supporters of the Bill support it only as an instalment. If we were to make it what the hon. Member for Oxford city calls a harmless measure, the support of those Gentlemen would cease. Therefore it is that the hon. Gentleman the Member for the County of Devon was justified—no Amendment having been put on the paper—in raising the Question which he has done. The hon. Gentleman who last spoke told the hon. Member for Brighton that the introduction of a very few words in the Bill would do all that he wished. It is a pity that kindness was not known beforehand, and that some hon. Member was not instructed to give that notice, without which upon a question of so much importance persons acquainted with Parliamentary practice like the hon. Gentleman must know there is no chance of success. I am one of those who think that the Government of the University ought to be secure in the hands of the Church. The analogy raised between this great assembly and the governing body of the University is not a correct one. I cannot conceive a more certain way of leading to no religious teaching at all than to have conflicting elements in the governing body that has to regulate the studies of the University. We are not without experience in this matter. The common school education in America, as every one knows, was originally a religious education. Those who established it were men who would have a religious education and no other. Well, in the course of time differences crept in, and the result was they were obliged to give up altogether religious teaching in the schools. The same thing will take place in any body where security is not taken with respect to the governing body. That is a matter I should be sorry to have any hand in bringing about in our Universities; and for that reason I shall certainly support the Motion against proceeding further with this Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, as to the subject which had been discussed by the hon. Member for the City of Oxford and the noble Lord, he should like to say just one word. The noble Lord had fully vindicated his character for plain speaking in that House, without the possibility of being subjected to a charge of reticence, when he announced that no man could be a good Churchman unless he shared the political opinions of the noble Lord. He had the misfortune to differ from the noble Lord, and their difference, he believed, consisted in this, that they totally dissented from one another as to what constituted a good Churchman. He (Sir George Grey) believed that man to be a good member of the Church who, while listening to argument, was not opposed to improvement; who showed his attachment to the Church not by a blind adherence to everything that existed, but who advised, counselled, and was ready to make concessions when by concession a practical grievance might be removed; and who by conciliating the goodwill of those who were outside the pale of the Church invited them to come within its fold, while he firmly resisted every innovation that would tend to impair its stability. Having said so much as to the doctrine laid down by the noble Lord, he came to the subject immediately before the House. Having voted for the second reading of the Bill he felt bound to vote for going into Committee. The only ground upon which the Bill had been opposed on the second reading was this, that its principle was the severance of the connection between the University and the Church, because it would admit into the governing body of the University persons who were not members of the Church. But would his hon. Friend who made use of that argument, and who said but for that he would have hesitated to oppose the Bill, or would any other hon. Member, maintain that such a declaration as was now required ought to be exacted from a layman upon taking a Master's degree? It had been stated upon the second reading by those who had charge of the Bill, that it was perfectly competent for those who saw danger in the measure to give notice of Amendments. He (Sir George Grey) stated upon the second reading, and he would repeat it there, that the author of the Bill would do wisely in not pressing it in the form in which it stood. The principle upon which Parliament had hitherto legislated was this, that the governing body should be connected with the Church, and it would be unwise now to attempt to interfere with that principle. At the same time, he agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Oxford, that there were some powers now exercised by members of Convocation which might be safely confided to persons who were not members of the Church of England. He thought it would be a great advantage to the University if such persons were permitted to open halls—those who presided over those halls not being subjected to the test which was now imposed. He should be willing in Committee to consider any Amendments with a view to remove objections to the Bill, and he was, therefore, prepared to repeat the vote in favour of the Bill which he had given on the second reading.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that since the second reading of the Bill it had been represented to him that the test of bond fide Churchmanship which the Bill proposed to substitute for lay masters was liable to a construction which would render that test stringent in a far greater degree than the test which at present existed. Her Majesty was temporal head both of the Church of England and the Kirk of Scotland, and held that position on that ground. The profession of faith held by the two Churches was the same. The members of the Kirk of Scotland could subscribe to the Articles of the Church of England, and be admitted to the governing body of the University of Oxford; but if this test of bond fide Churchmanship were introduced it would involve, he had been told by those who had carefully examined the subject, an adhesion to the discipline as well as doctrines of the Church of England, and would thereby exclude the whole of the members of the Kirk of Scotland—a Church of which Her Majesty was as much the temporal head as she was of the Church of England. That was an illustration of the danger of those loose generalities. It showed that the hon. Gentlemen who proposed the Bill, in trying to escape from the tests which had hitherto constituted membership of the governing body of Oxford equally for laymen and ministers, were lending themselves to the purposes of a section of the Church whose ideas were directed towards the Church of Rome. The Bill, therefore, was liable to the imputation of introducing into the governing body of Oxford a distinction between those who were equally attached to the great truths of the Catholic faith as embodied in the formulas of the Church. That showed the danger which that House would incur of inflicting clerical tyranny if it were to adopt the proposal of the Bill, instead of maintaining the freedom of the laity, by maintaining a test of religious opinion clear from all questions of discipline—a discipline which might be rendered as tyrannical as was the discipline of the Church of Rome. The Church of Rome exacted no test of dogmatic belief, but she did exact obedience to an arbitrary discipline. For that reason he should resist the Bill, as tending to establish an arbitrary discipline such as had never yet been recognized in the Church of England.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he wished to set the hon. Member for North Warwickshire right on one point. The Bill was not regarded with disfavour by Scotchmen, as the hon. Gentleman seemed to think. They did not believe that the operation of the Bill would be to exclude them from the privilege of taking degrees at Oxford, which they now possessed. In fact, the academical body of the Universities of St. Andrew's and Glasgow had petitioned in favour of the Bill, and what they deprecated was the introduction of the Amendment suggested by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Chichester Fortescue), and by hon. Members on the other side, which, they said, if introduced, would make the governing body of the University more exclusive. He wished to enforce again upon the House to the best of his power, the point which had been so well put by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Louth, that this was not a question between Nonconformists and the Church of England, it was rather a question of the liberty of the laity of the Church of England, upon whom, by the present regulations of the University, not of the State, a test was imposed, upon the attainment of academical degrees, which was imposed upon no other layman within Her Majesty's dominions. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) that nine-tenths of the laity of a certain age in the Church of England would decline to take that test if they weighed every word of it. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman had lately refreshed his memory with the tests, but one of them, which was taken by a Master of Arts, was a declaration that the whole of the Prayer Book contained nothing contrary to the Word of God, and that he himself would use that book, and no other, in public prayer. Now, was there any layman in the Church of England who would voluntarily take that test if taken in all its weight and force? He might approve of the Prayer Book as worthy of the greatest respect on the part of the Church of England, and of everybody who regarded true piety properly expressed, and true devotional fervour; but to ask him, as a man arrived at a certain age, to maintain as a dogmatical position and to assert his solemn belief that the Book of Common Prayer, composed by a number of uninspired men like themselves, contained throughout the whole of it no one thing contrary to the Word of God, that was a test to which he, for one, would decline to subscribe. He took leave to say, in spite of the definition of the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, he did consider himself as warm, as attached, and as true a Member of the Church of England as the noble Lord himself, and when at Cambridge he took his degree he was not required to subscribe to that wide abstract declaration of belief insisted upon by the University of Oxford, but he did declare himself a bond fide Member of the Church of England; certainly not in the sense of the noble Lord, that he was a true Conservative. The truth was that the objects for which those tests were originally imposed had entirely failed, and a new object had been set up in modern times, which was never contemplated by those who framed the establishment. The test when first introduced, nearly 300 years ago, was part of one great system, the enforcement of uniformity of worship and doctrine upon all Her Majesty's subjects in England. It was attempted to be enforced by imprisonment, and by means of the Court of High Commission, but the system entirely failed. It had cost the country three Revolutions, and two changes of dynasty, to discover that to compel uniformity of belief and worship was impossible. It was evident that the enforcement of these tests had not secured uniformity of opinion at Oxford, or prevented religious discord. Within the last few years, the Tractarian controversy had originated at Oxford, resulting in a great schism from the Church of England. Had the tests secured religious harmony? The scenes which took place a short time back on the proposition to remunerate a distinguished Professor of the University of Oxford afforded a proof that the present system had not secured religious harmony. Let, then, another system be tried, and let an attempt be made to see whether the removal of exclusion would not, by introducing freedom of opinion and unfettered liberty of discussion, tend to promote the cause of truth, and thereby serve the best interests of the Church of England.

MR. DODSON said, that he understood some hon. Members to state that they took the unusual course of opposing the Bill going into Committee because they did not know why they voted against the second reading. It was also urged as an objection to the measure, that its promoters had given no notice of any Amendments with regard to it. The promoters introduced the Bill in the form which they approved, and it was not for them to give notice of Amendments, but for other persons who desired to see changes in the Bill. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire seemed to have discovered that there was some danger to the Church of England in the proposed declaration that the person making it was a bona fide member of the Church; but he was unable to follow the hon. Member in his views on that subject. For nearly 100 years that had been a test at Cambridge, and none of the effects which the hon. Member for North Warwickshire prophesied would result from the present Bill had been experienced at Cambridge. It was said that the declaration in the Bill was vague; but he was of opinion that a declaration of bona fide membership in respect to the Church of England was in the nature of a profession of allegiance to that Church, and was more in conformity with practical Christianity than a declaration of assent to a mass of theological dogmas. As to the assertion that the proposed declaration would be more exclusive than the existing tests, all he could say was that the Universities of Scotland did not think so, because they had petitioned in favour of the Bill. In reply to the question which had been asked, as to what the principle of the Bill was, he replied that the principle was the abolition of subscriptions at the University, subject to the preservation of the religious character of the teaching; and when a test was necessary for securing that object, the simplest test was employed. It was said that the Bill would sever the connection between the Church of England and the University. He emphatically denied that that was the object, or that such would be the effect of the Bill. Of this, however, he felt assured, that the extortion from a layman of an obnoxious test created dissension among the members of the Church, and needlessly irritated those who were without its pale.

ELECTIONS PETITIONS BILL.

[BILL 17.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. AYRTON expressed his opinion that the Bill deserved more discussion than it had hitherto received, but it was too important to be discussed at that late hour. The Bill was an attempt to improve the law relating to election petitions. There were already two Acts of Parliament on the subject, one regulating the presentation and trial of petitions complaining of undue elections, and the other dealing with the question of the withdrawal of election petitions. In the latter Act very careful provisions were embodied for the purpose of prosecuting an inquiry into corruption and bribery, when the original petition was withdrawn, and there was ground for suspecting collusion. It appeared to him that those two acts dealt with the whole question as far as was practicable. However, the hon. Member who introduced the present Bill thought that the existing law allowed undue facilities for the presentation of petitions for which there was no solid foundation. Still it would be impossible to legislate in the way proposed by the hon. Member, for if the right to a seat in that House was to be regarded as a personal right concerning the sitting Member, the electors, or unsuccessful Member, all litigation with regard to that right must be subject to the ordinary conditions under which all other rights were tested and decided—by judicial inquiry. The person claiming the right to sit in the House must have the unfettered power of asserting his right before the proper tribunal, and onerous conditions could not be imposed on him at the outset. But the Bill attempted to make a petitioner asserting his right, not only responsible, in case of failure, for the costs of his opponent, but also for any amount of costs on account of another investigation to which he might not be any party—namely, public inquiry into the question of bribery. The Act for the better discovery of bribery and corruption expressly provided, in the case of the withdrawal of a petition, for the examination both of the personal and public questions involved. He was afraid that the present measure, by throwing obstacles in the way of presenting petitions against election returns, would tend rather to hinder than to promote the discovery of bribery. These petitions were usually drawn up in a general stereotyped form, and did not contain libels against individuals. Their presentation, therefore, could not be supposed to do injury to anyone. In his opinion the sitting Member had no right to claim greater protection than he already enjoyed. The proposal now made, that when the Committee on a petition had made their report it should be considered by the House at large, would lead to the introduction of all sorts of questions, and would create much confusion. The Bill as it then appeared was more objectionable than that of last Session. It contained a provision, for instance, that the Committee should be at liberty to appoint an agent at the public expense if they thought fit, but he should like to know whether the Treasury had sanctioned that proposal. If not, then he apprehended it ought not to be proceeded with. He should have been prepared to move the rejection of the Bill had it not been for the remark made by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, when discussing the failure of justice in the Lisburn case, that the law relating to election petitions should be made the subject of investigation by a Select Committee. He had adopted that suggestion, and begged to move that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of amending the Election Petition Act (1848) and the Act for the better Discovery and Prevention of Bribery and Treating at Elections.

MR. COLLINS seconded the Motion. He opposed the Bill on the ground that for the first time it proposed that a plaintiff was to be compelled to prosecute his suit at the discretion of a third party. He did not think the House of Commons was the proper tribunal to decide what degree of right a petitioner should have when he presented his petition.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of amending the Election Petitions Act (1848), and the Act for the better discovery and prevention of Bribery and Treating at Elections,"—(Mr. Ayrton),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

FORTIFICATIONS—DEFENCES OF THE BRISTOL CHANNEL.—QUESTION.

LORD PORTMAN said, that their Lordships would remember that last year he had directed the attention of his noble Friend the Secretary of State for War to the defences of the Bristol Channel—a subject which had been in his mind for many years. Sir William Napier was of opinion that the Bristol Channel required more defence against a privateering enemy than almost any other part of the country, in order to protect Bristol, Gloucester, and the Severn. His noble Friend informed him, in answer to his Question, that the Government had purchased sites for the erection of defensive works on the shores of the Bristol Channel, but that no Votes had been taken by his predecessor (Sir George Lewis) for the purpose of erecting works on those sites. His noble Friend, however, said that the subject should receive his careful attention. He now begged to ask his noble Friend, Whether any progress had been made in preparing these defences?

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, he agreed with his noble Friend as to the importance of this subject. Sites had been purchased, and the Government were negotiating for others on which to erect works for defending both sides of the Channel, and this Session a Vote had been taken for the purpose of erecting the fortifications. A part of the works was in a forward state, and as soon as possible the remaining portion would be commenced. He hoped that the principal portion, if not all, the works would be completed in the course of the present year.

THE CIRCASSIANS.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE wished to ask the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary, Whether he could give the House any information he might possess relative to a subject which had excited great interest, by means of the narratives in the public press, which had given great pain to all who had perused them—the state of those Circassians who had gone into voluntary exile owing to the late successes of the Russian Government? The Circassians, during a number of years, had won universal sympathy and respect by their vigorous efforts to preserve their national rights against an encroaching Power. They had now been unfortunately obliged to yield, and rather than remain under a Government which they had so much reason to dread and detest, they had emigrated in large numbers, at the risk of their lives, and with no provision of any sort. He desired to learn if the noble Earl would furnish the House with any information upon the subject; and, above all, with respect to what had been done by the Russian Government to alleviate the suffering which they had caused, or as to what course had been pursued by the Turkish Government for the assistance of the sufferers. No one could regard the misfortunes of the Circassians without interest, because there were many circumstances which commended them to our consideration, and by no means the least was the bravery with which they sought to sustain their national independence. He should also be glad to know if the noble Earl had any objection to lay upon the table of the House any papers bearing upon the subject?

EARL RUSSELL was understood to say that he had no objection to furnish to the House any information upon the subject which he might receive. The details were very painful, and he feared that great barbarities had been committed.

MORTGAGE DEBENTURES BILL.

[NO. 99.] COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee read.

LORD REDESDALE, in moving that their Lordships go into Committee on the Mortgage Debentures Bill, said, he desired to explain that this measure had originally come before them as a Private Bill. But it appeared to him that the measure was of far too important a character to be properly considered a Private Bill—he had taken the liberty of bringing it up as a Public Bill. In that form, if its provisions were found to be dangerous or objectionable, they would be more open to the revision of Parliament than if they formed part of a Private Bill. Under these circumstances, not as adopting the provisions of the Bill with any great confidence, he proposed it as a public measure, taking the provisions of the company which originally promoted the measure as the basis of the Bill. There were some of the clauses which he thought demanded the attention of their Lordships.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee upon the said Bill.

LORD PORTMAN thought the thanks of the House were due to the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees for stopping the progress of the Bill as a private measure. It was another new move for facilitating the lending of money to the prejudice of the heir. He thought that many of its provisions required the cautious attention of the House.

EARL GREY said, he could assure the noble Lord that the Bill had been most carefully considered by the Committee which sat upstairs. There was nothing in it which would give any powers to the owners of settled property which they did not at present possess. The object of the Bill was to afford facilities to the owners of money on the one hand, and the owners of land on the other, to make arrangements for their mutual convenience; and it proposed to sanction the formation of companies for the purpose of carrying out such arrangements ; and they were authorized to issue mortgage debentures when they were shown to have capital sufficient to cover such securities. The majority of the Committee of their Lordships' House were satisfied with the securities provided in the Bill, and there was no reason to believe that they would be found insufficient. With respect to the necessity for some such measure, he might observe that trustees now experienced the greatest difficulty in finding eligible securities upon which to invest money under the strict terms usually contained in settlements. On the other hand, it was not an easy matter for landowners to obtain loans when they needed them. From various causes the great Insurance Companies now invested their money in other than landed securities, and consequently the amount available for the wants of the landowners was constantly diminishing. Unless some further facilities were afforded to trustees, there would be a continually-increasing difficulty in obtaining loans upon landed security ; and if the clause relating to trustees were struck out, the Bill would be wholly inoperative. He agreed with the Chairman of Committees that it was not right that such large powers should be given by a Private Bill, and the thanks of the House were due to the noble Lord for having introduced this measure. He thought trustees might invest trust money in land through the intervention of large companies, whose operations were carefully guarded by Acts of Parliament, even more safely than through the intervention of law agents. The expense which would be saved was also a very important object.

LORD OVERSTONE agreed with the noble Earl that it was extremely desirable that every facility should be given for the obtaining of money upon the security of land ; but, at the same time, he felt most strongly that Parliament ought to watch legislation on this subject very carefully, and not to encourage the formation of companies which might not deserve public confidence. He had several objections to the present Bill. The first was, that the debentures to be issued by these companies would go forth to the public as mortgage debentures, whereas they were in truth nothing of the kind. They were merely acknowledgments of debt on the part of a public company. His second objection was, that the indirect consequence likely to arise from these transactions was, that they would give rise to a wholesale system of registration. But registration would not give to the holders of these debentures any additional legal security. Thirdly, he thought their Lordships would never sanction the proposal that trustees, who were authorized by the parties creating the trust to lay out their money only on the best security, should be authorized by Parliament to invest it in debentures of this kind. The company itself must pay a full rate of interest to its subscribers ; then how could they afford to pay interest upon mortgage debentures as well, except by borrowing money on inferior classes of mortgage security ? He held in his hand an advertisement of the Land Investment Society, sanctioned by the high character and position of a noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough), which advertised that they were ready to lend money upon landed security, or upon houses in the course of construction, either with or without a deposit of the lease ; and then followed another advertisement by the same company, stating that they were prepared to issue mortgage debentures upon the security of houses in the course of construction with or without deposit of the lease. With regard to trustees who were empowered to invest in land, they were bound to invest in security of the best class. If trustees invested in these mortgage debentures their only remedy would be against the company, and if the company failed to pay, their only remedy would be to come in with the other holders of debentures upon the assets of the company. If the assets of the company were insufficient, the claim must ultimately be made against the trustees themselves. He did not think that such transactions were a proper way of discharging a trust—certainly the Bill gave no adequate protection for those whose benefit the trust was created. The noble Lord said, that if this clause were struck out the Bill would be virtually destroyed. Then, what other inference could be drawn than that this was a most objectionable Bill ? He trusted his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack would apply his acute and sagacious mind to this Bill, and say whether its provisions could be safely and properly carried out.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, the principle of the Bill seemed not to be well understood. The second clause of the Bill explicitly declared what the nature of the instrument should be by which the transactions of the company were to be carried on. It was to be a deed under the common seal of the company, duly stamped and signed by two directors, than which it was difficult to conceive a document of a more formal character. It would be, in every sense, a mortgage issued by the company, taking the form of a debenture. The real security which these companies offered to the public, and on which the mortgage debentures were issued, consisted of the property vested in them by virtue of the loans they made. Then there came an additional security in the shape of the company's guarantee fund, over and above all the other securities, and consisting of the property invested in Consols, Exchequer Bills, cash at the bankers, and finally, the uncalled share capital of the company. These companies would not depend for their income upon the small difference between the interest they paid for money and the interest they received on advances. Their profit would be derived from the commission charged on their transactions. Their advances would be made upon the report of competent surveyors and valuers, who would take into account all the circumstances of the property which constituted the security. It could not be fairly said that a company regulated by the provisions of that Bill was a company of a speculative character. Safeguards were provided by the measure against the aggregate amount of the debentures issued by a company at any one time exceeding the aggregate amount of the securities which it held. He thought that the country was indebted to the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees, for the suggestion that the measure should be treated as a public, and not as a private Bill; but he could not approve the alteration in the Bill which the noble Lord had suggested, because, if adopted, he believed it would render the measure nugatory.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that there was no necessity for an Amendment of which notice had been given by the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees, because the trustees contemplated by the terms of that Amendment already possessed power to invest their funds as proposed. This question of the investment of trust monies was, however, one of great importance. Many of their Lordships were doubtless aware that the rules of the Court of Chancery on the subject were most careful and most cautious. Their general principle was this—trustees who were authorized to lend money on real estate were forbidden to lend more than two-thirds of the value of the security. In the case of leaseholds the proportion was only one-half. Whether or no the powers of trusts hereafter created should be enlarged was a question worthy of consideration; but for his own part he could not consent to any enactment that would alter the provisions of any existing trust. At the same time, he felt bound to state that he had found, in his judicial capacity, that the greatest hardship and inconvenience often arose from the limited powers conferred upon trustees. Trustees were naturally and properly desirous to be safe, and, consequently, they were averse to laying out their money except upon securities expressly within the terms of their trust. Generally speaking, there was even an indisposition to exercise the powers which they actually possessed, and to keep to a course of investment about which there could be no possible anxiety. If, for example, they had power to invest their monies in the public funds or on mortgage, they would argue that there might be some little danger in adopting the latter course, whereas there was none in buying Consols. The result was that trustees were frequently disinclined to look out for eligible mortgages; and a limited income was often thus considerably reduced, or, at least, not improved, because the trustees did not choose to incur the risk of making a more profitable investment. So strongly was this evil felt, that in 1859 an Act was passed (the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35), which provided that wherever a trustee was not forbidden to invest trust monies on real security in any part of the United Kingdom, in Bank of England or Bank of Ireland Stock, or in East India Stock, it should be lawful for him to do so. It was doubtful whether that enactment referred to existing or future trusts, for there were conflicting decisions on the point; but the Act was a precedent for Parliament to interfere to enlarge the powers of trustees. With regard to companies under the present Bill, the security offered had been correctly stated by the noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough); but the reason urged by the noble Lord (Lord Overstone) against permitting trustees to invest in this kind of security was conclusive—that no assignment would be made to them of any portion of the company's assets, and he would consequently have no direct or personal remedy. All that he could do would be to call upon the company to realize its assets, to call up its unpaid shares, and to make an equal distribution amongst the whole body of its debenture-holders, and they would only rank with the whole body of creditors under similar circumstances. He thought that it would be most undesirable to permit trustees to invest trust monies in securities of that kind.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE observed, that every day the difficulty of obtaining money on the security of land was becoming greater, on account of the many other ways in which money could now be invested, and he thought that the clause which enabled trustees to lend money for the improvement of land would be highly beneficial.

House in Committee accordingly.

On Clause 32 (Investment of Trust Money on Mortgage Debentures).

LORD PORTMAN said, this clause enabled trustees to do what they were positively forbid doing under settlements, and he moved that the clause be omitted from the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH seconded the Motion.

After a few words from Lord CRANWORTH,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR suggested that the clause should now be negatived, in order that it might be brought up in an amended form on a future stage.

The Report thereof to be received on Tuesday, the 14th Instant, and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 107.)

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS AND REGISTRIES (IRELAND) BILL—(No. 96.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the second reading read.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF ARMAGH said, My Lords, there are four principal objects which we seek to obtain by the Irish Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries' Bill, which I now propose be read a second time—

1st. That the twenty-six Diocesan Courts and Registries be reduced to twelve, giving each Bishop one Court and Registry.

2nd. That the mode of procedure in the Provincial and Diocesan Courts be simplified and improved, and the ecclesiastical fees be made more uniform and placed on a more satisfactory basis.

3rd. That the number of Vicars General be reduced to twelve.

4th. And that Appeals from the Metropolitan Courts in Ireland, respecting matters of doctrine, should, instead of being made to the Court of Delegates in Ireland, be heard and determined in the same manner as appeals from the Metropolitan Courts in England are.

1st. Before the Church Temporalities Act was passed, there were four Archbishops and eighteen Bishops in Ireland. That Act united ten of the Bishoprics to ten of the remaining Sees. There was no provision made for the union of the Diocesan Courts and Registries as there was formerly, when Down and Connor were united by Killala and Achoury. The consequence is, that while there are only twelve Bishops, there are twenty-six Diocesan Courts and Registries. The Bishop of Meath alone has only one Court and Registry. The other Bishops have two and some three each. This is a source of inconvenience to the Bishops and clergy. In the diocese of Elphin, when a clergyman has to transact business with the Bishop, which requires a reference to some document in the Diocesan Registry, he has to travel to Elphin, which may be as much as forty miles from his residence, and then come on to Kilmore, which is forty miles more. If he has to be instituted or collated to a benefice, he has to bring the Registrar with him and pay his travelling expenses; whereas, by the provisions of this Bill, the Registry will be close to the Bishop's residence at Cavan, and the clergy be saved all this trouble and expense. The withdrawal of testamentary jurisdiction from the Ecclesiastical Courts has left them dependent henceforth on fees derived from marriage licences and church business. These are not sufficient to pay for twenty-six Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries. In the diocese of Killala and Achoury there are only twenty-six benefices; in the Diocese of Clonfert and Kilmacclugh seventeen; and in Kilfenora only six. It is quite evident that the fees arising from the transaction of ecclesiastical business relating to six parishes, or to twenty-six, would not remunerate a qualified ecclesiastical lawyer for acting as Vicar General, nor support a separate Registry. It is very desirable to adopt means to remedy these anomalies. To do this, it is proposed that the twenty-six Diocesan Courts and Registries be reduced to twelve, by uniting into one the several Courts and Registries under each Bishop. Such consolidation is not required in the diocese of Meath, where there is only one Court and Registry. In only two of the dioceses—Armagh and Dublin—are there suitable buildings belonging to the Registries for the safe preservation of the records, which, by law, are deposited in them. The Registries are kept at the houses of the Registrars, and are subject to many accidents. The Register Office at Kilmore was burnt down some eighty years ago, and many most valuable and interesting documents destroyed. The Registries have been so badly kept that there are few documents older than the Restoration. It is the duty of Government to sanction the concentration of the Registries, because the most important temporal rights of lay patrons and of the Crown itself may be dependent upon the safe keeping of the documents in these Registries. Each institution to a benefice recites upon whose presentation it is made. This record remains in the Diocesan Registry only. These records are evidences of the right of advowson. The destruction of these documents by fire or otherwise would destroy all legal proof of the right of presentation in many cases, and be a cause of great inconvenience in all. Many advowsons have been lost to the laity by irregularities in Bishops' Registries, and some have been lost to Bishops from the same cause. If the present Registers were at once removed from their situations upon the consolidation of the Courts and Registries, they would be entitled to compensation; but for this there is no fund available. It is, therefore, proposed that the present Registrars should remain in office as joint Registrars of the united dioceses, and should continue to transact their accustomed business and to receive their fees as heretofore; but that, on death or resignation of these Registrars, no new appointments should be made, until at length but one Registrar should remain for each united Registry. The working of the measure will be very simple. It may be illustrated from the dioceses of Armagh and Clogher. The Registries of these dioceses will be united into one Registry, to be called the United Registry of Armagh and Clogher. The principal office will be at Armagh. But the business of the diocese of Clogher will be transacted at Monaghan, until the Registry of Clogher becomes vacant, and then the business will be transferred to Armagh. If the Registry of Armagh becomes vacant before that of Clogher, the Registrar of Clogher will become Registrar of Armagh, and transact all business there. The papers and records of both dioceses will then be kept at Armagh. Provisions have been made for compelling all future Registrars to discharge their duties in person for transmission of records to the united Registries, and for the punishment of persons stealing or defacing such documents.

2nd. It is next proposed that the modes of procedure in the Provincial and Diocesan Courts should be simplified and improved, and ecclesiastical fees placed on a more satisfactory basis. To effect this, it is provided that the Archbishops of Armagh and Dublin shall make rules and orders subject to the sanction of the Lord Lieutenant in Council—for the custody and preservation of all records and documents in the United Diocesan Registries; for regulating times, forms, and modes of procedure before the Metropolitan and Diocesan Courts; for making alterations in the form and number of ecclesiastical instruments, and regulating their procedure and practice, especially in reference to fees. It is proposed that an annual report shall be made to Parliament of all rules and orders made during the preceding year, by which all these important regulations will be brought under the control of public opinion.

3rd. The reduction of the number of Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries necessitates the reduction of the Vicars General. It is proposed that the number of Vicars General be reduced to twelve, leaving one to each Bishop, and that those offices be possessed by persons properly qualified to exercise ecclesiastical jurisdiction. By these means the emoluments of those that remain (small at the best) will be increased, and persons duly qualified will be induced to accept the office. Of the twenty-six Vicars General now in Ireland eleven are clergymen. For the Metropolitan Courts it is intended by the proposed Bill that no person shall be considered qualified for such an office except he be one of Her Majesty's sergeants or counsel or a practising barrister of fifteen years' standing; and that no person shall be appointed a Vicar General unless he be a practising barrister of ten years' standing. The working of the measure may be illustrated by its effect on the united dioceses of Down and Connor and Dromore. The Vicar General of Dromore will be removed, but will for his life receive two-thirds of the fees. The Vicar General of

Down and Connor will be the Vicar General of Dromore, receiving one-third of the fees, and paying two-thirds to the retired Vicar General of Dromore. On the death of the Vicar General of Dromore all the fees will be received by the Vicar General of Down and Connor. The final effect of this measure will be, that there will be twelve Courts instead of twenty-six, and they will be presided over by barristers of ten years' standing; and there will be appellate tribunals at Armagh and Dublin, presided over by a Queen's sergeant or Queen's counsel or barrister of fifteen years' standing. There will be no demand on the Consolidated Fund for compensation or salary of the officers who have to carry out this Bill.

4th. It is proposed that Appeals in matters of doctrine from the Metropolitan Courts in Ireland should, instead of being made to the Court of Delegates, be heard and determined in the same way as Appeals from the Courts of the English Archbishops—namely, by the Queen in Council. Provisions have been made in the Bill for hearing appeals from the Diocesan to the Provincial Courts. Dilapidation cases are of a temporal more than of an ecclesiastical character, and it is proposed that all such appeals relating to the building or repairing of ecclesiastical residences shall be made to the Court of Appeal in Chancery, under the Chancery Appeal Court Act, 1856. Appeals from the Metropolitan Courts in matrimonial and divorce cases will continue to be made to the Court of Delegates.

Before I proceed to the provisions in this proposed Bill relating to the final decision in matters of doctrine, it may be expedient to call your Lordships' attention to the state of the law in reference to final Courts of Appeal in Church questions. There are four final Courts of Appeal in the United Church of England and Ireland.

1. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, with the Archbishops of Canterbury and York and the Bishop of London, for hearing appeals under the Church Discipline Act.

2. The Judicial Committee without any Bishop for hearing appeals on Duplex querela.

3. The House of Lords on appeals in Quare impedit, &c., from the Common Law Courts in England and Ireland—the Court of Delegates for appeals from the Archbishop Courts in Ireland.

Any given question of doctrine may, under certain circumstances, be brought before any or all of these Courts, and there is no provision against conflicting decisions.<sup>c</sup> Upon the subject, for instance, of baptismal regeneration, we might have in the United Church three wholly irreconcilable decisions by three Final Courts of Appeal. In the case of Mr. Gorham, the Bishop of Exeter's counsel argued that the doctrine of the Church of England, respecting baptism, is identical with that of the Church of Rome. The House of Lords might have decided upon Quare impedit, that the denial of this was a good cause of refusal. Mr. Gorham contended that the baptism of an infant affords no proof of its regeneration, and upon Duplex querela it was decided his doctrine respecting baptismal regeneration was not incompatible with the doctrine of the Church of England. The Courts of Delegates might have decided in favour of the doctrine in the Reformatio Legum, which is inconsistent with both. Many strong objections lie to the Court of Delegates as a Court of Final Appeal in matters of doctrine and discipline. Such Court ought to be uniform and consistent in its decisions, and not subject to be influenced by parties, popular clamour, or intrigue. The Court of Delegates fails in Ireland on these conditions. Such a Court constituted expressly for each case, and then falling to pieces, contains no provision for uniformity of decision, and it can have no experience. All its members are engrossed by other affairs, and in times of religious excitement the selection of Delegates would be open to intrigue, and seldom free from suspicion. The Court of Appeal in Chancery would not be a suitable tribunal to decide in matters of doctrine, because the Lord Chancellor of Ireland may be a Protestant Dissenter. In the Church Temporalities Act he is excluded from being an Ecclesiastical Commissioner except he be a member of the Established Church. It is much more important that a Judge, in matters of doctrine, should belong to the Church, than a person who is merely a manager of its temporal affairs. The Lord Justice of Appeal may be a Roman Catholic or a Dissenter; and it appears to me that these facts exclude the Court of Appeal in Chancery from being a proper final appellate tribunal in matters of doctrine and discipline. It is, therefore, proposed that every appeal from any Metropolitan Court in Ireland in matters concerning the doctrine, discipline, or worship of the United Church of England and Ireland shall be made to Her Majesty in Council instead of to the Court of Delegates in Ireland, and shall be heard and determined in the same manner as appeals from the Court of an Archbishop in England are heard and determined under the Church Discipline Act, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86. That such a measure is necessary appears to be acknowledged by all parties. In 1859 an Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries Bill for Ireland, in all essential features similar to this Bill, was brought into this House under the administration of the noble Earl opposite. The Bill passed through your Lordships' House without a division, and it was read a second time in the House of Commons without opposition, and was in Committee when Parliament was dissolved. In 1860 the present Government brought in an Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries Bill for Ireland. Both of these Bills proposed a uniformity of discipline between the Church in England and the Church in Ireland, and both proposed the same final appellate tribunal as does this Bill. The object of the Irish Prelates is to have one and the same Court of Final Appeal for the whole united Church, whatever that Court may be. We only advocate the adoption of the principle laid down both by the late and by the present Government, of dealing with the Church in England and the Church in Ireland as one Church, which is in strict accordance with the spirit of the Act of Union. I therefore recommend this Bill to your Lordships' consideration for many important reasons:—It will facilitate, cheapen, and improve the transaction of ecclesiastical business in Ireland; it will lessen the expenses of the clergy; it will prevent extortion, if there be any, and silence complaints of it if there be none; it will insure more competent Judges for our Ecclesiastical Courts; it will lead to the better preservation of our diocesan records; and it will reduce the Final Courts in the united Church from four to three, which is per se of great practical utility. On these grounds I recommend this Bill to your Lordships.

THE HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY.

QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any progress has been made in the negotiations between Her Majesty's Government and the Hudson's Bay Company relative to the establishment of telegraphic communications with the Pacific through British North America, and whether arrangements for the future management of the territory of the Hudson's Bay Company are still the subject of negotiation?

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he would also beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government exercise at the present moment any control over the territory claimed by the Hudson's Bay Company, and stated in their Prospectus issued in July last to comprise 1,400,000 square miles; and, whether it is in contemplation to establish a Crown Colony in any portion of this territory?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, at the present moment no authority was exercised over the territory in question except by the Hudson's Bay Company. Negotiations for some time past had been going on between Her Majesty's Government and the Hudson's Bay Company, having for their object the transfer of a large portion of their territory to the Crown, and the establishment of a Colony in Rupert's Land, and a telegraphic communication with the Pacific. Negotiations had been commenced last Session, but no satisfactory answer had as yet been received.

MR. SERJEANT PAYNE.—QUESTION.

MR. CLAY said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the sentence of ten years' penal servitude passed at the Middlesex Sessions on a man named White, for an act which, if an offence at all, appears to have been at most an attempt at a larceny; and whether also he has noticed unusual severity in the sentences passed not unfrequently at the Middlesex Sessions; and whether Mr. Payne's tenure of office was quamdiu se bene gesserit?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, my attention was called to this case by The Times newspaper of Saturday last. Immediately afterwards I received a letter from Mr. Payne, Deputy Assistant Judge of the Middlesex Sessions, stating the facts of the case as they appeared on the trial. The prisoner White was charged before him with stealing a roll of cloth, and from the evidence it appeared that he was acting in concert with another man who was not apprehended, and with a woman who was apprehended. Mr. Payne was of opinion that the verdict of the jury was fully justified by the evidence, and in passing his sentence he took into account the fact that the prisoner had been convicted in May, 1859, of a robbery of plate, and had been sentenced to five years' penal servitude. He had at that time been several times previously in custody and twice convicted of robbery. Under those circumstances, Mr. Payne, acting in exercise of the discretion vested in him by law, passed a sentence of ten years' penal servitude upon him. That sentence was subsequently respited until the next Sessions, in order that inquiries might be made as to the truth of the allegations made by the prisoner, of his having been persecuted by the police since his discharge from the sentence of penal servitude, and also as to his character and mode of gaining his living during that interval. In the meantime I had, before receiving Mr. Payne's letter, directed the same inquiries to be made, and the result has satisfied me that, as far as I can judge, the allegations of the prisoner are wholly without foundation. It appeared the prisoner was not known to the constable who apprehended him, and it was not known to the police of the division in which he resided that he had been previously sentenced to penal servitude. Nor was there the slightest foundation for the statement that the prisoner's brother had been discharged from his employment in consequence of the interference of the police, for his employer stated on inquiry, that he had discharged the prisoner's brother in consequence of gross misconduct. The result of the inquiry into the prisoner's conduct since his discharge from penal servitude has shown, what was not known to Mr. Payne at the time he sentenced him, that in November last, six months after his discharge, he was apprehended together with his brother on a charge of being found on private premises at Paddington at two o'clock in the morning for an unlawful purpose, and sentenced at the Marylebone Police Court to three months' imprisonment. In answer to the question, whether I have noticed any unusual severity in the sentences passed at the Middlesex Sessions I have to say, that I have not noticed any unusual severity in those sentences. It will be in the recollection of the House that frequent complaints have been made in this House of the lenity of the sentences passed at Assizes and Quarter Sessions, especially upon habitual offenders. No one can doubt that this man was an habitual offender. As to the tenure of Mr. Payne's office, I have to state that he holds no permanent office. Under the provisions of the Act of Parliament, Mr. Payne is appointed from Sessions to Sessions by Mr. Bodkin, as his deputy. The appointment was originally approved by the Secretary of State. I am bound to state that Mr. Payne informs me that he has filled that office for six years, and that during that time he has tried between 3,000 and 4,000, or 4,000 and 5,000 prisoners—I forget which. I am not aware that any just ground of complaint has ever been established against him.

ACCIDENT IN PLYMOUTH SOUND.

QUESTION.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the fatal accident which has recently taken place from Artillery practice in Plymouth Sound; and what measures he proposes to recommend in order to prevent the repetition of so painful a disaster? The accident took place on Monday last in Plymouth Sound while the Artillery were practising. A boat had landed passengers from the Warrior, and was coming back to Devonport, when a shot struck the boat on the starboard side and shattered both the thighs and the spine of one of the boatmen, who lingered for six hours. Another of the boatmen was only saved from drowning by a boat putting out immediately to his assistance. Many other boats, he understood, had been struck in the same way.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, in reply, that a Report of the accident had been supplied, but up to the present time no further details of the circumstances under which the boat had been struck had been received. A full Report had been called for as to the circumstances attending the accident, and also as to the precautions that ought to be taken to regulate the Artillery practice. In the meantime, orders had been sent by telegraph to suspend all further Artillery practice until that Report had been received.

DISCIPLINE AND DIETARY IN GAOLS.

QUESTION.

MR. BAZLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Government be now prepared to give effect to the Recommendation of the Select Committee of the House of Lords in reference to the discipline and dietary in Gaols, and whether the advice of the Visiting Justices of Prisons, which has been sought by Government, and any other inquiries in progress, were calculated to finally fix the dietary in County and Borough Gaols upon a sound and scientific basis; and who are the Gentlemen to whom the subject has been referred, and how has their inquiry been conducted?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in reply, that a Paper had been presented to Parliament giving the Correspondence between the Home Office and the Prison Inspectors in reference to the Report of the Lords Committee. A full and elaborate Report had also been received from the three medical men to whom the subject of the dietary of Gaols had been referred, which would shortly be laid on the table. The House would see in that Correspondence the manner in which the inquiry had been conducted and the measures taken by the Government.

MURDER OF MR. JAMES GREY ON BOARD THE "SAXON."—QUESTION.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has received the Report of the Court of Inquiry held on Acting Master Danenhoven, or Donovan, of the United States ship Vanderbilt, for the murder of Mr. James Grey, mate of the ship Saxon, at Angra Pequena, held at the Philadelphia Navy Yard, with the finding thereof; also the Proceedings of the Court Martial subsequently held upon him, with the remarks of the Secretary to the Navy of the United States, and the Correspondence of Lord Lyons on the subject; and if so, whether he will lay the Papers upon the table of the House?

MR. LAYARD said, in reply, that the Court of Inquiry held upon Acting Master Danenhoven or Donovan, of the United States' ship Vanderbilt, for the murder of Mr. Grey, mate of the ship Saxon, at Angra Pequena, was a private Court, and the Government had no official information as to what took place in it. The case was then submitted to a court-martial, but the verdict had not yet been sufficiently promulgated. All the information possessed by the Government was derived from the notes of a shorthand-writer who was engaged by our Consul. When the Government received information of the decision of the court-martial, he would see what papers could be produced.

ARMY—PERCUSSION CAPS FOR MILITARY PRACTICE.—QUESTION.

MR. MORRISON said, he wished to know, Whether the attention of the War Office has been called to the quality of the Percussion Caps issued for practice to the Army?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that complaints had been received of the Percussion Caps supplied to the Volunteers. No complaints had been received from the Army. An improved kind of Percussion Cap had been submitted to the War Office and was now undergoing experiment. Meanwhile, the Horse Guards had called for a Report on the quality of the present Percussion Caps.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Ordered, That the Orders of the day be postponed till after the notice of Motion relative to Education (Endowed Schools).—(Sir George Grey.)

EDUCATION (ENDOWED SCHOOLS).

RESOLUTION.

MR. ADDERLEY: I rise, Sir, to move that this House, having considered the Minute of the Council of March 11, 1864, on Endowed Schools, is of opinion that it does not meet the objections made to the Minute of the 19th day of May, 1863. The House will remember that, about three months ago, I brought forward a Resolution condemnatory of the Minute of May, 1863, which proposed on the part of the Treasury to appropriate to its own credit every single endowment belonging to all the schools in England and Scotland which receive aid from the Government, whether these endowments were the gifts of living donors or vested in charitable trustees for educational objects, or whether they were the actual concession of living claimants amongst the poor for the benefit of the education of their children, or whether they were endowments expressly left for the payment of school fees. That Minute proposed to sweep into the Treasury indiscriminately, and treat as public money, all the endowments belonging to all the aided schools in England and Scotland; and it was not surprising that the House so strongly supported my condemnatory Resolution—indeed, with the exception of the hon. Members for Leeds and Sheffield, I was unanimously supported in the proposition which I made. The noble Lord at the head of the Government found himself obliged to intimate to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne, the then Vice President of the Committee of Council, when in the middle of his defence, that he must instantly put about and beat a rapid and immediate retreat, which difficult operation the right hon. Gentleman executed in a manner worthy of his well-known ability.

MR. LOWE: I beg to say the right hon. Gentleman is mistaken.

MR. ADDERLEY: The right hon. Gentleman says I am mistaken, but I must repeat my proposition, and I do not think he will again contradict it, namely, that he came down to the House to oppose my Motion, and the commencement of his speech was apparently in opposition to it, but an intimation being made to him—[Mr. Lowe: No, that is not so.] Well, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman denies that an intimation was given him, but at all events the right hon. Gentleman in the middle of that speech found the House was unanimously in favour of my Motion, and he was obliged to change his tactics—if he likes the expression better—and beat a rapid and immediate retreat. The Minute which I am now bringing under the notice of the House, and which I hope the House will condemn as heartily as they did the other, was issued a few days after. The new Minute so produced offers to exempt from a general and indiscriminate appropriation of their endowments the small rural schools of the country, which are defined by the document as schools of 1,200 square feet area, as if poverty was to be measured by the square foot, and injustice by the capacity of endurance. Absurd as this mode of meeting the Resolution of the House is, it does not represent to the full extent the right hon. Gentleman's mode of evasion; for there is a proviso in the middle of the Minute, from which he would seem half-way to have repented of what he was about to do—that the endowments of those small rural schools should, if not wholly, be at least so far appropriated by the Treasury, that the endowments and the grant together should not exceed 15s. a head. Now I appeal to the House whether this is not a proposition for stultifying its former resolution, and whether it is not a cool proposition on the part of a Minister to set at naught the authority and rescind the decision of this House. Those who three months ago opposed the Minute of the 19th May of last year so unanimously cannot consistently accede to the Minute of March 11th. The host of petitions that was presented against the first Minute applies equally to the present one, and the patrons of schools throughout the country who asked their representatives to rally round their interests and defend them from the spoliation proposed in the first Minute can equally call upon them to defend them from the operations of the second. If there are any hon. Members who have schools near their own residences or amongst their constituencies which might escape the entire spoliation of their endowments under the new Minute, and are therefore content to allow the injustice which they have averted from themselves to fall upon the rest of the kingdom, I tell them to their faces that they do not know their duty or the constitutional principle of their functions in this House. [A laugh.] No hon. Member is sent here to represent his own private interests. I see a noble Lord opposite (Lord Henley) laughs at the proposition; but I hope he is not of those who, having protested against the first Minute, is ready to put up with the last Minute because his local school might come within it. No one, I say, is sent here to represent his private interests, or exclusively his own constituents, but to represent the interests of the kingdom at large, and therefore we are bound to discuss the Minutes by what their effect will be generally on the interests of the schools throughout the country. I was asked by the Government to delay taking the sense of the House on this Minute on the plea that a Return, moved for by the hon. Member for Berkshire, and likely to have a material effect in regard to it, was about to be presented; and I was thought by many to have acquiesced in that request too readily and almost too simply. I did, however, accede to the request, not on account of the alleged plea, but merely because I knew that the present Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education had barely entered into that office, and I therefore conceived that it would be only fair that that right hon. Gentleman, if he should be called on by his leaders to make his first essay in his new office by a Quixotic charge against all the endowments connected with the schools under his control, with a view to sweep them into the Treasury, should have time allowed him to get firmly seated in his saddle. That time has been allowed, and the Return I have adverted to is now before the House; and I confess I cannot conjecture what inference is intended to be drawn from it in favour of the new Minute. In the first place, the Return is most imperfect and most incorrect, and it is wholly inapplicable to the question before the House. It professes in three parallel columns to show the condition of the endowed schools receiving grants in 1862, as compared with 1863; that is to say, to give a comparative statement of their condition under the old and the revised codes. But, as the hon. Member for Berkshire must be aware, the revised code was not in full operation in 1863, and therefore the Return does not accurately represent the condition of the schools under that portion of the revised code in operation. In many particulars it will not come into operation for some years, as, for instance, in the payment of pupil-teachers, and, putting these special points out of the question, it will take some years for the revised code to get on a complete footing. It is well known that no schools received grants throughout the whole of 1863 upon the conditions of the revised code, and therefore the comparison is imperfect. If any information can be obtained from the Return, it is simply this—that even before the revised code came into operation a large reduction had already been made in 1863 in the income of the schools which relied upon grants from the Treasury. I do not condemn that reduction, but I say that schools that were suffering so great and sudden a reduction of income in the way of assistance from the State were unable to stand the second blow involved in the absolute confiscation of the whole of their endowments. The Return moved for by the hon. Member for Berkshire is also incomplete in this way, that grants before the revised code were calculated on the income of the schools, and in a great number of instances that income is not given, it being stated in a note that there was no Return of it. How could the office have calculated the grant without knowing the income which measured it? I also have to complain of the Return because it affords no test to judge, in any case, of the grant or endowment. I have heard some people say, what a large endowment such and such a school has; but large is a relative term, and unless the number of children in the school be stated, it cannot be said whether any endowment or grant is large. There is another feature of inaccuracy about the Return, inasmuch as in a great number of instances the endowment of the schools is stated at different amounts for 1862 and for 1863. The fluctuations in the statements go to the extent of 100 per cent. Now, if these endowments are fluctuating quantities they are not such endowments as are properly contemplated in the Minute, and they do not justify this strong and violent proceeding on the ground that they are fixed and not precarious incomes. A further feature of inaccuracy is, that several of the largest endowments stated in the Return are endowments, within my own knowledge, not simply for education, but also for the clothing, food, and maintenance of the children. One of that kind is St. Clement's Dane's Schools, which is mentioned in the Report as an endowment for education solely. I think I have shown that the Return, for which my Motion was postponed, is valueless for its purpose. Supposing, however, the Return correct, and as complete in every respect as no doubt the hon. Member for Berkshire wished it to be, I still am at a loss to conjecture what inference he or the Government sought to draw from it in favour of the second Minute. I can judge of the question just as well from any one case as from all, and accumulating cases in an aggregate form did not affect the matter. The question is one of right, and can be illustrated as well from one instance as from a thousand. But, perhaps, the hon. Member for Berkshire, or the Government, thought that they would be able to fish out of the Return certain cases, one or two, justifying the Minute. It is difficult to draw up any scheme of public grants which will not be liable to some cases of abuse, and I will suppose the kind of abuse the hon. Gentleman was searching for—the case of a school possessed of an endowment almost equal to its expenditure; or up to the extreme limit which an endowment could reach, and yet not disentitle the school to a grant, there being certain subscriptions entitling it to some payment of money from the Treasury. I admit that that would be abuse, because it would put the school in possession of an income beyond its requirements; but that case might be met by laying down a rule that in no instance should a grant be given to a greater amount than would make the aggregate sum formed of fees, subscriptions, endowment, and grant, more than 30s. per head in any school, which is the average expenditure. Such an arrangement would get rid of the abuse I have referred to, without any violent injustice, or the sweeping of endowments from schools into the Treasury; and the remedy I propose I feel confident would be agreed to by the House. This is not a matter of individual cases, for if the hon. Member for Berkshire can produce a few cases of abuse under the existing system, I can for every one he produces bring forward ten where much greater abuse would be certain to spring up under such violence and injustice as the Minute proposes. I will not repeat what I said on a former occasion, but I must remind the House that it is not a question of cases but of principle which is at issue. I and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne are at issue on principle, and I confess I was for some time utterly at a loss to conceive on what possible principle the right hon. Gentleman could have based these Minutes of which he was the author; but in his recent speech he for the first time gave a distinct enunciation of the principle upon which he based them, and upon which he based generally his conduct and by-legislation in his office. The right hon. Gentleman told us in his speech that he considered himself in his office as the trustee of an eleemosynary fund, in the distribution of which he was bound to consider the means of the recipients. He said he had to perform the duties of a relieving officer. Now, I ask the House to-day, as I asked them in March last, to take issue with the right hon. Gentleman on that principle; for I conceive that the right principle on which he ought to act is very nearly the reverse of that which the right hon. Gentleman says he has acted upon. It is true that in the distribution of the public funds for the relief of poverty and destitution you ought to consider the means of the recipient. Whether his means of relief arise from endowments, from subscriptions, from donations, or from charities of any sort or kind, you have no business to distribute a public fund for the relief of destitution, to give out of such fund on the score of destitution, when you know the recipient is in possession of other means of any kind to live upon. But when you are distributing a public fund given in aid of voluntary efforts for the education of the poor, instead of reducing the amount of your assistance by the amount of aid coming from another quarter, you ought rather to increase the assistance in proportion to the voluntary exertion. Your action in the two cases is precisely the reverse. The right hon. Gentleman, in the capacity of a relieving officer, was relieving the Treasury out of the funds of the poor, and not relieving the poor out of the coffers of the Treasury. But let me point out to him that though the parallel of the poor law is false, yet that even supposing there was an analogy between poor relief and a subsidy for voluntary education, the analogy would not bear him out in the defence of this Minute; for in the distribution of poor relief, although you take into consideration the means and the conditions of the recipient, I ask whether any parish would be justified in taking the endowments of the parish in reduction of the poor rates? As a Charity Commissioner I recollect a case very much in point of a parish in Herefordshire, where the guardians of the poor happened to be trustees of an endowment for the relief of the poor. The parish being in debt the guardians and trustees took upon themselves to pay off the parish debt by means of the charity property, and for that purpose they cut down the timber on the estate from which the endowment was made. And what ensued? The Charity Commissioners proceeded against them, and the case was decided against them as a fraudulent transaction; and the thing was stopped. Exactly in the same way I ask the House to stop the Treasury from relieving its own disbursements by the appropriation of the endowments of private benevolence. One word more as to the avowed principle of the Minute. I say if you allow the education minister to assume the position of a relieving officer, and to treat the fund at his disposal as an eleemosynary fund, you will be most utterly disappointed. You will find that instead of tending to economy that it would tend to the grossest waste and the most profuse expenditure of the public money. It was against that very pauper system of dealing out as doles from the education fund that I struggled most when I was in that office. I find that the right hon. Member for Calne thinks it has already pauperized the country. He says it was once regarded as an honourable act to undertake the endowment of a school, but not so now. I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman, but I am firmly of opinion that if we were to allow the Education Minister to take the post of relieving officer and treat the grant as an eleemosynary fund, we should find that the spirit of the country would be pauperized, and its voluntary zeal for the promotion of education would become gradually paralyzed. We see a tendency to this already. We find large districts in London calling themselves poor districts merely because the owners of property will not come forward and take their part in aid of the voluntary system. We find landlords in rural parishes trying to give a stigma of poverty to parishes, which poverty amounts only to poverty in their own zeal, or indicates a want of interest in parishes in which they possess much, but do not reside. But if the property of each parish is to maintain the education of the poor—and no doubt it is sufficient in every case to do so, with the aid of a subsidy from this House—let us not break down that system by turning the subsidy into a dole for destitution, or comparing the minister to a relieving officer. I have done with the principle of the right hon. Gentleman. But there are some who say, "Though it is true that these endowments should not be allowed to relieve the Treasury, yet neither should they be allowed to relieve your voluntary efforts." I think that was the main argument of the hon. Member for Leeds the other day; I think it is likely to be the argument of the hon. Member for Berkshire. The hon. Member for Leeds said,

"Even allowing that these endowments ought not to be taken to relieve the Treasury, still, on the other hand, they should not be allowed to relieve voluntary efforts."

The right hon. Member for Calne has never attempted to deny that an endowment during the life of the donor is a voluntary effort. The hon. Member for Berkshire will allow that endowments in the life of the donor have altogether the characteristics which the right hon. Member for Calne declared to be a test of voluntary effort, namely, that they are under the living superintendence of the donor, and are a proof of the stimulus which the education grant was intended to bring forth. But there is nothing that makes an endowment less a voluntary effort in the deed by which the donor binds his successor. He makes the donation during life. This shows that the stimulus has acted upon him in drawing out his money; and I suppose that the hon. Member for Leeds will not say that when a gentleman has made an endowment of £50 a year for a school in his parish that it would stimulate him to greater zeal if the Treasury pocketed the money, and asked him for another £50, in the form of subscription also; because it seems to be contemplated by the right hon. Member for Calne and others, that when the Treasury pockets a vested subsidy you will get the same amount repeated in donations and subscriptions. At all events, I have the admission of the right hon. Gentleman, that endowments in the life of the donor are equivalent to voluntary efforts. That is a very great admission. There is, therefore, a large class of endowments dealt with by these Minutes, who, according to their own showing, Ministers propose to treat with simple robbery, without any excuse or advantage whatever. Let me now proceed to endowments of another kind. The right hon. Gentleman will wish to get away from the consideration of living donors as soon as he can. He will get away from those living squires as he calls them, and from local endowments, and will ask us to consider his Minute with reference to dead squires, and old and not local endowments. He argued as if there was nothing really local in an endowment; and certainly a man in Australia may, from affection for his native county, endow a school in Staffordshire. This, however, is not generally the case. I admit at once that an old endowment, even of three generations, is not entitled to be treated in the same way by the Treasury as recent ones. I say they have not a similar claim, or a claim to the same amount. But at the same time I say the claim, whatever it may be, is on the credit side of the account, and that you cannot on the score of antiquity, or of the endowment being made at a distance, justify the Treasury in depriving the particular locality of all advantage from its endowment. The endowment is the property of the place. It is not public property. Will any one stand up and say that an endowment to a particular place is to be of no advantage to the locality above others? There may be different modes of treating different cases; but nobody will be bold enough to say that an endowment is simply public money, in which its specified object has no particular interest. Still less will any one say that it is just for the debtors of any place to seize on its endowments as a public property and then discharge with it their public debts. I wish to draw the attention of the House for one moment to a suggestion made to me by the hon. Member for Oxford yesterday. I will not appropriate the suggestion, because I hope the hon. Member will introduce it himself. I would deal with old endowments by taking them in account of contributions duly having claims for subsidy at a depreciated rate. The hon. Member for Oxford threw out this fresh suggestion. He said, "Why should not a public body, say the Charity Commissioners, appropriate such endowments to special extra prizes to the school endowed or for the masters, and then let the school receive grants on the same terms with other schools irrespectively of its endowments?" I think it well worthy of consideration whether by that means the locality might not have the advantage of its endowment, and yet all schools start fair for grants. And there would be this additional advantage—that there would be certain places possessing endowments whose schools would be looked to as prizes by the masters throughout the kingdom who would thus gain the stimulus of promotion. Well, now, I have completed my arguments. I will only ask the House to recollect how completely we made out in our last debate the entire failure of the advocates of the Minutes proposed, even to show their possible application throughout this country. We found that, even if we consented to the violation of justice that seems to pervade them, they could not be carried out without great exceptions, great anomalies, and injurious consequences. As to the great exceptions, the greatest of all included the whole kingdom of Scotland, when the heritors' tax in every rural parish would have to be left out of the category of endowments; and that I consider to be a considerable deduction from any provision relating to school endowments which is meant to be impartial. As to the anomalies, we find them in the case of endowments for the payment of fees in schools—which the Minutes exclude as endowments, but recognize as school fees. As to the consequences, I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman whether he would not acknowledge this consequence to be injurious, that it would put a stop at once and for ever to the process by which the Charity Commissioners are turning many doles from charities notoriously abused, to the purpose of education? Would it not still further be an evil that this Minute would at once put a stop to all future school endowments? It is no use appealing to the Government in favour of any endowments. I am afraid they are prepared to see the extinction of endowments without regret; but at all events I have made out that the relative claims of schools, endowed and unendowed, may be reconciled to each other without any injustice to either, or the appropriation of the property of the one to assist the other. There is a Minute I would propose to substitute. When the right hon. Gentleman gave me a draft of this new Minute I ventured to give him also a counter draft of my own, which I thought would be preferable. He knows it, and I need not trouble the House by explaining it. I think I see my way of limiting the whole expenditure for education in this country in a satisfactory manner, without any such violent appropriation of the property of endowed schools. It is with no special views—not in the special interests of the Church, nor in the interests particularly of the poor, but merely because I think it is most desirable that the distribution of the education grant should be on fixed and fair conditions, that I propose to the House to cancel those two Minutes, and to substitute the one that I have prepared. I think we should pay most dearly for any little temporary relief the Treasury would gain by a plan for the appropriation in aid of public grants of the private endowments of schools.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House, having considered the Minute of Council of the 11th day of March, 1864, on Endowed Schools, is of opinion that it does not meet the objections made to the Minute of the 19th day of May, 1863."—(Mr. Adderley.)

MR. WALTER said, he should occupy the attention of the House but for a very few minutes, for the principle at issue between his right hon. Friend and himself was of so limited and narrow a character that it required only to be clearly stated to be understood, and hardly demanded so lengthily an explanation as that of his right hon. Friend. The question he took to be simply this, Were endowments to be considered in the nature of public property appropriated to certain purposes, and placed in the hands of trustees to see that it was so applied; or were they to be regarded as special subscriptions, and to be treated as such, and taken into account among the sources of income from which a school derived its funds? His right hon. Friend had held him responsible to a greater extent than was right for the accuracy or inaccuracy of the Return which had been laid on the table on his Motion. At all events, his right hon. Friend had no right to complain that he had been obliged to postpone his Motion until that Return was produced, inasmuch as a considerable part of his speech was devoted to an exposure of its inaccuracies. Certainly there was another Return which would have rendered that one far more complete, and without which it was scarcely possible to do full justice to the subject. That was the Return moved for by the hon. Member for Newark, which would furnish the House with most valuable information, and would show the origin, history, and character of every school endowment, whence derived, the date, and how applied. That Return, with the Return already produced, would furnish the House with very valuable information. It really, however, was of very little consequence, as his right hon. Friend had truly said, whether the Return was strictly accurate or not. He did not rest his argument at all on the accuracy of the Return. He agreed entirely with his right hon. Friend that it was a question of principle, that it mattered little whether the endowment were £5 or £500, and many endowments, as they knew, went beyond even that large amount. When his right hon.

Friend the late Vice President, at the conclusion of his speech, made that concession to the opposite party, waiving a large portion of his case and making an exception in favour of small schools, he felt then that the ground was so far out from under his feet, for he admitted that if an exception were made in favour of small rural schools there was no logical ground for making a deduction from the larger schools. The real question they had to determine was, What was an endowment? He took the history of most of these school endowments to be this:—They were left by benevolent persons, not to go into the pockets of the parishioners, as they would do if the present system were carried out, but for the support of schools in particular places where otherwise these schools never would have existed. They were left at a time when the duty of supporting education was generally ignored. They were left by benevolent donors with the full conviction that if the money was not left in that form for the performance of the duty it would be altogether neglected. Circumstances, however, had completely altered since that time. The support of schools was becoming recognized as a general duty, and it was very liberally performed. When the Government offered its support to schools on the condition of the parishioners in particular places evincing their willingness to perform the duty, the grant ought to be measured by the display of that willingness on the part of the parishioners, and not by the possession of certain public property which they held as trustees, and from which they themselves ought to derive no benefit whatever. To use an illustration which would make his case clear. Suppose the State out of the public revenues were to undertake to do completely and entirely what it did partially, and were to support wholly and entirely all the schools throughout the country. Take then the case of half-a-dozen parishes which required each £100 a year to pay their expenses. Suppose one of these schools had an endowment of £50, another of £40, and another of £30, and so on, and that a certain proportion of them had no endowment at all—would his right hon. Friend contend that that £100 should be paid to every one of these schools, irrespective of their endowments? Of course not. It would be putting the endowments into the pockets of the parishioners. If that were so, what was it they were doing with regard to the present system? The State contributed a portion towards the expenses of these schools, and in proportion as the endowments were taken into account as a portion of the ordinary revenue of a school the pockets of the parishioners were relieved of a portion of the expenses. That principle was fully illustrated by the facts of the case. When the hon. Member for Leeds the other night read a long list showing the small proportion which subscription school fees bore to endowments, and the consequent benefit which parishioners derived from these endowments, the immediate answer was, "that was in 1860; things have been altered since then." The Return, however, showed what was the case in 1863, and he would cite one or two cases. There was no need to select any, for all over the country were scattered about schools with small endowments and large Government grants, and large endowments with small Government grants. He would take the case of Arundel. Arundel in 1862 had an endowment of £120 19s. 2d.; the total income derived from other sources, including schools fees, was £35 2s. 8d., the amount of the grant £162 16s.—making a total for that school of £318 17s. 10d. Now would any one tell him that that sum of £120 19s. 2d. did not go into the pockets of the parishioners of Arundel? Again, Barnstaple Bluecoat School had in the same year, in the shape of endowment, £98 12s. 5d.; from other sources, £29 3s. 11d.; while the Government grant was £45 15s.—making a total of £173 11s. 4d. There was also the case of Accrington, in Lancashire, which, according to the Return, had in 1863 an endowment of £50, the entire amount derived from other sources being £192 4s. 6d.; the amount of the grant, £194 14s.; total, £336 18s. 6d. In Bridgenorth Bluecoat Schools the endowment was £251 7s. 4d., the funds from other sources, £49 3s. 1d.; the grant, £49 16s. 6d.; total, £350 6s. 11d. In the case of the Episcopal Charity School, Exeter, the endowment was £547 5s.; other funds, £230 6s.; grant £175 1s. 4d.; total, £952 12s. 4d. The endowment in the case of Brereton, Staffordshire, was £86 2s. 2d.; the receipts from other sources, £43 1s. 2d.; amount of the grant, £19 3s. 4d.—not a very large grant, but what he should like to know was, why that amount of endowment should not be deducted. He should like also to call the attention of his right hon. Friend to another argument derived from those endowments. He held in his hand the petition of the managers of the Shirley Church of England Endowed School, and what was the argument used by those gentlemen in favour of those endowments being respected in the way which his right hon. Friend proposed? One great object was, they said, "to enable the managers, especially in rural districts, to rise to the pecuniary requirements of the Committee of Council and to obtain a portion of the educational grant and secure the services of a certificated and more efficient teacher than they could otherwise have engaged." That was to say, that those endowments were to be made a lever in the hands of those managers for extracting money out of the pockets of the public, which they must pay in the shape of grant, while managers who had no endowments and, therefore, not the same means of paying certificated teachers, enjoyed no such advantage. Was that, he would ask, fair? What right had the House to turn those endowments into an engine of that kind? The argument of those gentlemen was—"We will tax you by means of our endowments. We will compel the Government to respect those endowments, and we will put our hands into your pockets." Another argument urged by the managers in question was, that "to make an abatement of grant in proportion to endowment is in effect to deprive a school of any benefit from the liberality of its benefactors, and to confiscate the endowment to the public revenue." What was the meaning of that word "confiscate?" If the principle contended for were admitted, it was clear those endowments would not go for the support of the school but into the pockets of the parishioners. He recollected the case of a school in which the endowment was £130, the amount of the subscriptions £33, and the Government grant £120 or £130. Could there be any doubt as to where that endowment went? He could not understand how, if the argument of his right hon. Friend were admitted in the case of small endowments, it should not also be admitted in the case of large, which would be a reductio ad absurdum of the whole thing. He should not trouble the House further on the subject, because when the matter was once clearly stated he did not see how it could be misunderstood. A certain degree of courtesy might be required to be extended in the case of endowments for a man's life, but he did not think there was any necessity for carrying it beyond. The whole theory of the mortmain laws showed that we were not disposed to respect the endowments with which they dealt; and he saw no reason why precisely the same principle should not be applied to the endowments for schools. He regretted the Government had gone so far as they had in protecting those small endowments; and feeling as he did, that the question was one of principle, not of detail, he should oppose the whole principle of endowments being respected in the distribution of Government grants, whether their amount was large or small.

Mr. H. A. BRUCE said, that the distinction between endowments and local contributions was broad and intelligible. A local contribution implied personal sacrifice and a continuing interest in the welfare of the school on the part of the giver. If a school were ill-conducted the contributor would evince his dissatisfaction by withdrawing his subscription; whereas the endowment remained the same under every possible circumstance. The course which the Privy Council had taken up to that time with respect to endowments was, he must admit, somewhat inconsistent. Formerly grants in aid of schools were made under various heads—augmentation of masters, capitation grants, and payments to pupil-teachers. The augmentation to masters was never paid unless a certain sum was provided by the school, out of the fees or local contributions, and the endowment was left out of consideration. In the case of the capitation grant there was no such provision. It was made in every case where the funds of the school, created out of fees, local contributions, and endowments, reached the sum of 14s. per head; and so with respect to the pupil-teachers, their grant was made quite irrespective of the sources from which the income of the school was drawn. At that moment they were under the compromise entered into between the Government and the House, paying to schools where pupil-teachers were maintained considerable sums of money, while those schools were receiving by way of endowment, £2, £3, and even £5 per head upon each child. The revised code dealt with the subject of endowments, but dealt with it but imperfectly. The attention of the Department did not seem to have been specially directed to that part of the question. It was occupied by topics of greater consequence. The regulations made on this subject in that code were that no grant should be given in any case where the endowment amounted to more than 30s. per head, on the average attendance of children. What was the result? That where a school in which the attendance averaged 200 had an endowment of £300, and that 10s. was raised by means of local contributions, and 10s., therefore, given in the shape of a grant, the school would actually be in the receipt of 50s. per head. There was no reason to doubt that many schools were receiving more than they required; and, in some cases, considerable sums had been, by way of bonus, presented to masters, in others reserve funds had been created to extend the school buildings at a future time. The Privy Council having to deal with this state of things considered it thoroughly, and it was their opinion that the payment authorized by the House and made by the State was sufficient, with that amount of local aid which might fairly be expected, to give a proper education to the children of the poor. That calculation was founded on the assumption that all schools started on an equality, with no funds but those raised by means of local contributions. It was obvious that if the assessment committee for any union possessed the power of assisting out of the rates of the union the different parishes composing it, the assistance given would be proportionate to the actual means of the parish receiving aid. They would not give to a parish which had an endowment of £100 a year as much as to a parish which had none; and the same principle ought to guide the State in the distribution of its annual grants. The right hon. Gentleman had used hard words, and talked about "spoliation" and "confiscation," but he would ask him whether the contribution of the State was not given simply to supply a need. Where that need existed and the conditions imposed by the Privy Council and sanctioned by that House were complied with, the grant was made; but where the need did not exist there ought not to be any grant. Such, however, did not appear to be the opinion of the House when the subject was last before them, and his right hon. Friend and predecessor undertook to frame a Minute which should be in accordance with the Resolution moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Staffordshire, and with the understanding which was then come to. That Resolution was vaguely worded, that no one could deny that it was satisfied by the Minute of March, 1864; but the question between them really was, What was the fair interpretation of the understanding under which the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman had been withdrawn? Several hon. Members, among them the noble Lord the Member for Northampton (Lord Henley), the hon. Member for Midhurst (Mr. Mitford), and the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord Robert Cecil), drew on that occasion a broad distinction between endowments in rural places and endowments in towns. The noble Lord the Member for Stamford pointed out that while in rural parishes the contributions would depend mainly upon the disposition of the principal proprietors, upon their liberality or niggardliness, in towns and populous districts, the average of numbers tended to remove their inequality. The distinction between populous and small rural parishes had already been recognized in the orders of the Privy Council, under which rural parishes were treated in certain cases more favourably than urban ones. The Minute of March, 1864, was in effect this. Any school the average attendance of which did not exceed 100 children—and the House must remember that an average attendance of 100 implied that there were usually 150 names on the books—might enjoy an endowment to the extent of 6*s.* for each scholar, without any deduction being made from the grant. That in the case of a school having 100 children, amounted to an endowment of £30 a year. This exception met the case of some of the Scotch endowments, such as those of Mill and Dick, which were among the most useful that existed. Mill's bequest produced about £1,400 a year, which was divided in the proportion of £20 a piece among 70 out of 144 schools in the county of Aberdeen. Dick's bequest, which produced £4,000 a year, was distributed between Aberdeenshire and two neighbouring counties. He did not say that there would be no changes in the application of those bequests, but with the necessary alterations the whole of the funds of these two great endowments might be applied under the Minute in furtherance of popular education. Such being the effect of the Minute, he wished to call attention to the Return obtained by the hon. Member for Berkshire. He fully admitted that it was not a complete document, and that in order to guide the House it should have shown the average amount of the endowments over a series of years, because they were subject to great fluctuations. It appeared, however, by the Return, that out of 7,739 schools assisted by the State 1,631 were endowed schools. The average attendance in these 1,631 schools was 213,000 scholars, and the total value of their endowments was £52,495 a year. That sum divided among 213,000 scholars would give exactly 4*s.* 11*d.* a head; so that if these endowments were equally distributed—which, however, was not the case—every rural school would obtain the full benefit of its endowment. It was impossible to draw in all cases an exact distinction between the rural and town schools, but he believed it could be done with sufficient accuracy for the information of the House. The number of schools which would be wholly relieved by the Minute would be 450, and the number partially relieved 674; the remainder were town schools, the endowments of which would in all cases be deducted from the grants. By far the greater number of endowments in the rural parishes were small, and the large towns which had sprung up in modern times rarely had any endowments. They were generally to be found in places of respectable antiquity, such as Shrewsbury, Hereford, Worcester, Bridgenorth, and towns of that character. That such schools could dispense with any exception being made in their favour could be shown by a recent example. At Hereford there were two schools, each having an endowment of about £120 a year. When the Minute was published, the trustees of one of them were about to protest and petition against it, but they thought better of the matter; they exerted themselves to supply the place of the grant which was to be withdrawn, and, after providing for the education of fifty children gratuitously, they had by a system of fees raised £130 more than the amount of that grant; and the Dean of Hereford said, that he had no doubt whatever that the managers of the other school, too, would be able to raise more than they formerly received from the Government. These schools had for a considerable time been, and under the revised code would have remained, in receipt of £250 a year, which was worse than wasted. He believed that in most other towns a similar result would follow the publication of the Minute. As a question of economy that was of but trifling consequence. The saving would be only about £30,000 a year, but it was of infinitely greater importance that the public money should not be uselessly squandered. Over and over again economies had been introduced which had at first excited objection and hostility, but the soundness of which had ultimately been universally admitted. The right hon. Gentleman himself caused some dissatisfaction among the managers of schools by reducing the amount of the building grant, yet the propriety of that reduction was not now disputed. He believed that the same would be the case with regard to this Minute, which he was confident would inflict no permanent injury upon the education of the country. Believing that the system adopted for the encouragement of popular education had conferred inestimable benefits on the country, and so far from dulling the edge of voluntary effort, as had been apprehended, had greatly stimulated it, he would not willingly be a party to any act which would impair its efficacy. He held that the interference of the Government with the education of the country had been fraught with the greatest blessings.

The advice and assistance of the Inspectors had been of the greatest value in organizing the schools; and everyone who had lived in a populous district, as he had done, must have felt that, while the advantage of the Government aid to the present generation was very great, its benefit to the next generation would be incalculable. He believed that no money had been better expended than the £8,000,000 expended in education. Still, it was the bounden duty of the House to hold its hand whenever an injudicious outlay was pointed out, because a reckless expenditure brought discredit on those who administered the fund, and demoralized those who received it. For these reasons, he would ask the House not to assent to the Motion of his right hon. Friend.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to know whether the Revised Minute would permit the revenue arising from the Mill bequests in Aberdeenshire to be distributed without deductions from the Government grant?

MR. H. A. BRUCE observed, that in that case as well as in those of all rural schools where the average of attendance was less than 100, no deduction would be made within the limits indicated by the Minute.

Mr. H. A. Bruce

Question put,

"That this House having considered the Minute of Council of the 11th day of March, 1864, on Endowed Schools, is of opinion that it does not meet the objections made to the Minute of the 19th day of May, 1863."—(Mr. Adderley.)

EDUCATION (INSPECTORS' REPORTS).

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [31st May].

"That Mr. Bruce be one of the Members of the Select Committee on Education (Inspectors' Reports),"—(Viscount Palmerston.)— —and which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Select Committee do consist of five Members, to be nominated by the General Committee of Elections,"—(Mr. Clay.)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he regretted he had not been present at the discussion of the previous evening, because the question raised was one of considerable importance, and it behoved the House to decide deliberately and calmly. His opinion was that questions involving imputations on the conduct and business of public departments could not be tried satisfactorily by Committees that were ordinarily appointed. Those Committees were composed of fifteen Gentlemen, who were selected, not because they were supposed to be impartial and unbiassed, but on the principle of taking half-a-dozen Members of strong opinions from one side of the House and balancing against them half-a-dozen from the opposite side. When the Committee came to decide, it was usually found that they were very evenly balanced, and perhaps the Chairman gave his casting vote in an inquiry in which a really judicial decision was required. He remembered a very analogous case which happened a few years ago—namely, the Committee appointed to consider the question of contracts. Upon that occasion he took objection to the construction of the Committee, and the same objection he still retained, which was this—that a Committee so constituted did not properly try questions of that kind or come to a satisfactory verdict; and he must say that the result of the inquiries and the evenly balanced divisions which took place showed that his objection was more or less well founded. The investigation proposed was of an analogous character. There was an accusation of maladministration brought against one of the great Departments of the State, and he was confident the inquiry could be carried on far more fairly, more impartially, and with more of a judicial spirit by five Gentlemen selected from Members of that House, who did not usually act from party motives, than by a Committee of fifteen Members. [Cries of "Divide!"] Those cries showed that all the hon. Members of that House were not really prepared to deal with the question in a fair and judicial spirit. It would be in the recollection of the House, with regard to another case, with which the late Mr. Stafford was unfortunately mixed up, that the investigation was intrusted to a Committee of five Gentlemen, to whom all in that House looked up with respect, and their verdict was received with satisfaction as on the whole a fair decision. When the Committee was composed of a limited number the result was usually more satisfactory to the House and the country than where the decision might be a mere matter of balance in a larger Committee. The objection taken to a Committee of five, that the members would not be acquainted with the facts of the case, and would not be able to elicit the truth, did not really apply, because such Committees had more recently been appointed with two additional members, one to prosecute and the other to defend, but who had no votes, and whose business it was to bring out the facts. He had himself served on one of those Committees, of which the late Sir James Graham was Chairman, and the inquiry was conducted in a way which was perfectly satisfactory to the members of the Committee. The whole of the facts of the case were brought before them, and the result met with the approval of the House and the country. On these grounds he should give his hearty support to the Motion of the hon. Member for Hull.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, one who had heard his right hon. Friend might have supposed that he was some ingenuous youth who had just got a seat in the House, and not a Member of that great experience of the proceedings of Parliament which they all knew him to possess. His right hon. Friend told them he wanted to have a perfectly impartial tribunal—[Mr. E. P. BOUVERIE: As impartial as can be got]—and he would wish it to be inferred that Election Committees were perfectly impartial, and therefore that this Committee should be formed upon that model. As far as his (Mr. Baillie's) experience went, he did not think there was any tribunal in this country that could be regarded as so partial and unjust as an Election Committee. That was the result of his experience in that House. Whenever an Election Committee was appointed he had always heard hon. Members ask who was to be the Chairman, and according to the Chairman they at once inferred what the decision of the Committee would be. Now, his impression was that the Committee which had been already moved for, selected, he believed, by the Government, was as impartial a tribunal as the case could be submitted to. Inasmuch as it was a public question, and not one with regard to the character of individuals, he thought it should be submitted to a large and numerous Committee of the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I will detain the House but a few moments. The speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) has introduced a new element into the subject. Undoubtedly, while it was felt on the one hand in the former discussion that there would be a considerable advantage in referring the matter to a Committee of five, it was felt on the other hand, and it was strongly urged, that there was this disadvantage, that among the five Members could not be included those who were best acquainted with the case, and most competent to conduct it. Now, the proposal of my right hon. Friend entirely removes that difficulty; and, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, I have to say that we are willing to refer the matter to a Committee formed upon the suggestion of my right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock. [Cries of What is it?] The proposal is this, that a Committee of five should be appointed by the Committee of Selection, but together with those five, who alone should have a deliberative vote, there should be joined two Gentlemen, whose functions—following the precedent set upon former occasions—would be to act as assessors, and to assist the Committee, while not at all professing to be judges or perfectly impartial, like the five Members of the Committee. I confess I think that the fairest and most impartial mode of constituting the tribunal for this investigation.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, it is very important to bear in mind, whatever decision may be come to, that we are called upon to decide, without any previous notice whatever, upon the elements of a tribunal which were not before introduced. I was not aware that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) had made any suggestion for any alteration in the elements of the Committee, until I heard the interpretation which has been put upon his speech by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Let the House consider its position. First of all, there is the leader of the House now absent proposing that there should be a regularly constituted Committee, and then an hon. Gentleman proposes by way of Amendment that there should be a Committee of five appointed by the Committee of Selection. Well, we are brought here to-night to decide that Question, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock, a high authority in matters in his line, makes a speech without moving anything, and then the Chancellor of the Exchequer gets up and says it never occurred to him before—it seemed a most admirable mode of proceeding, and he recommends it. Why, we have not the proposition before us; we have not had any notice of it; and I myself have not heard what the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman is. I know there was a great objection to the Motion of the noble Lord, on the ground that all kinds of personal motives would be introduced. But now, according as I understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer, this would be entirely a personal trial; there would be a prosecutor and a defender who would treat the whole question as if the character of an individual were involved. It is impossible to say that there are not some personal considerations involved in the matter. I only regret that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne did not consent to sit in the Committee, and I have no doubt that his honour would be in safe keeping. But, though there are personal questions involved, no one will for a moment pretend to say that the political are not greater than the personal considerations. The argument used by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock strikes at the very existence of the Committees of this House, and if the House does not defend them it will lose all the powers and privileges which characterize Parliament. I cannot say I entertain the same opinion of Election Committees as my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Baillie). I think, on the whole, the decisions of those Committees are influenced by a sense of justice, but if you lay down as a principle that no Committee can be trusted if men of decided political opinions on either side of the House are Members of it, that is opposed to the whole tendency and genius of Parliament; by acting upon it you will debar yourselves of the services of your ablest men, and you will end by striving, as you are now doing, to frame an institution which is not in harmony with the general tenour of your rule. My own opinion is that it is the best to follow the proposal of the leader of the House. The noble Lord, who is unfortunately absent, is not only from his position, but from his experience, of the highest authority. No doubt he consulted with his Colleagues before he made his proposal, and I have no doubt that it was the decided opinion of his Colleagues that a Committee, as usually constituted, was the fairest tribunal. Let us pay to the noble Lord in his absence the respect which we pay him in his presence. The noble Lord is now absent receiving a high distinction at the hands of an ancient University, and when in his absence the Chancellor of the Exchequer turns round and says that he prefers the raw suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman on the fourth bench to the deliberate and mature advice of his leader, I do not hesitate to say that that is a decision in which I, though an opponent of the noble Lord, am not prepared to share, and I shall, therefore, support the original Resolution.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, that the reduction which, in recent years, had taken place in the number of members on Election Committees was a great improvement, and he approved in the present instance the proposition to constitute the Committee of five Members only. Some hon. Gentlemen might call that a political question, but there was a great deal of personal consideration mixed up with it, and out of doors no one heard of the Resolution condemning the practice of the Education Department without feeling that it was either nothing at all or else a personal implication. There must be some one responsible for the Department, if it had broken faith with the House of Commons, and acted so discreditably as to deserve censure, and that somebody had a fair right to defend himself. His impression was, that the best plan would be to have five fair and candid men, selected by the Committee of General Elections, to form the Committee. Nevertheless, in such a Committee, there would still be wanting the element necessary to bring out the case of the parties interested on the one side and on the other; but in many instances that difficulty had been met by the appointment of what were called assessors, having no vote, but being well acquainted with the case and acting as counsel. In that way he believed that as honest a decision was arrived at as it was possible to obtain under the circumstances; and he would appeal to hon. Members opposite to bear in mind that even the subordinates in the Education Office, who possessed no advocates in that House, had a right to a fair trial before the Committee, and ought not to be condemned without inquiry.

MR. LEVESON-GOWER said, he very much regretted that the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire was not present on the evening when the Question was discussed, for if he had been he would not have supposed that the noble Lord at the head of the Government had not adopted the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Hull. The noble Lord gave that proposition his cordial support; and, probably, if the right hon. Gentleman had been present he might have come to the same conclusion. The right hon. Gentleman described the proposition of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock as taking the House by surprise; but any man of his experience might have known that the plan there suggested was constantly adopted in respect to Committees like that under discussion, and the Chairman of Ways and Means the other night distinctly pointed out that mode of proceeding, which seemed to meet with the approval of the House. He dissented from the statement of the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, that the question of policy in that instance was of more importance than the personal question, for he thought that the personal honour of a Member of that House and of the servants of the Crown was certainly of greater importance than the question whether the Reports of the School Inspectors should be curtailed or not. Hon. Gentlemen seemed to think that the individual expression of opinion which had taken place was a complete vindication of the right hon. Member for Calne, but he could still understand the right hon. Gentleman desired to obtain a more formal recognition of the accuracy of his statements. It should also be remembered that many of those hon. Members who exonerated him still maintained that the Resolution of the 12th of April was true. If so, somebody had been guilty of the grossest misconduct; and he claimed, on behalf of the servants of the Department, that a tribunal might be constituted which would carry out the principles of equity and justice. On the ground of fair play, he did not think that hon. Gentlemen opposite would deny that a Committee of five men selected for their impartiality and calm and dispassionate judgment would be a more satisfactory tribunal than a larger Committee composed in some measure of partisans. He, therefore, trusted that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hull would not be opposed.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I think the difficulty the House is in is that it has attempted to do something which everybody feels is unnecessary. I understand the noble Lord (Lord Robert Cecil) makes no imputation upon the right hon. Member for Calne, and I heard my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) on one occasion say the same thing. I believe that the impression made upon the House when the right hon. Gentleman made his explanation was such that every Member of the House—I believe without an exception at that moment—wished that the Resolution of the 12th of April had not been passed. I think the general opinion of the House was, as regards him, that if that Resolution was an imputation on his character it was unfortunate and unjust. Well, I think the right hon. Gentleman is highly unfortunate, too, in the way he has been treated by the Government. I do not know how many weeks—some five or six at least—have passed since this unfortunate matter occurred, and the proper course for a powerful Minister defending a Colleague, whom he believed and knew to be innocent, would have been to ask the House to rescind the Resolution. The Government, however, did not take that course for reasons of its own, and after the Question is dragged on week after week in this manner, and in a way which must be excessively unpleasant to the right hon. Gentleman most concerned, there is now a question—What kind of Committee shall be formed? We all know that a Committee of fifteen is a most unsatisfactory tribunal in a matter of this kind—I think for the reason just stated. If hon. Gentlemen opposite will only try to put themselves into the position of the right hon. Member for Calne, there is not one of them who will go out of the House and vote against the proposition of the hon. Member for Hull. I have had no communication with the right hon. Member for Calne; but I have heard from those who are likely to know his views in this case—in which, to some extent, his character and reputation are involved—that the matter will be much better and more justly tried, and tried more to the satisfaction of himself and all those who feel an interest in what may become of him, by a Committee of five members than one of fifteen. Now, I believe that there is not an hon. Member on the opposite side of the House who, if he were placed in the position of the right hon. Member for Calne, would not feel when there is a proposition on the one hand to nominate a Committee of fifteen, and on the other to name a Committee of five, that the House would do him great injustice, if it refuses to appoint that tribunal which would be satisfactory to himself and his friends, and which has been appointed on many former occasions. I believe there is no necessity for a Committee, but if the House is to divide between the two propositions, I shall give my vote in favour of the hon. Member for Hull.

Question put, and negatived.

Question proposed,

"That the words 'the Select Committee do consist of five Members, to be nominated by the General Committee of Elections,' be added,"—instead thereof.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he wished to know from the Chancellor of the Exchequer how he proposed to carry out the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock. He might be wrong, but he certainly did not understand that suggestion had been made the other evening by the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Clay); for, speaking after him, one objection he took to his proposal was, that in a Committee of five chosen by the Committee of Selection no one would be present to act the part of counsel, and considerable difficulty might therefore occur. Although he still thought that a Committee of fifteen would be the most just, yet after what he had just heard from the hon. Member for Birmingham he thought it would be hardly fair to the right hon. Member for Calne to insist on his own opinion.

Mr. Bright

MR. CLAY said, the noble Lord was right in stating he did not absolutely make the suggestion that assessors should be appointed. He took it for granted, from the instances he had named, that as a matter of course two assessors would be named, one, the gentleman most interested in the attack, so far as it was an attack; and the other, probably, the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education. The practice was to move for a Committee of five; and two assessors were afterwards added. In the case of Earl Granville, on whom an attack was made, only one assessor was appointed, that noble Lord declining to have one.

MR. H. BAILLIE remarked that the position of prosecutor in such a case would be a very invidious one, whoever might be appointed.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he proposed to follow the course adopted in the case of Mr. Stonor some ten years ago. He should, therefore, now move That two other Members of the House be named by the General Committee of Elections, and appointed to serve on the Select Committee, to examine Witnesses, without the power of voting.

Amendment proposed,

To the said proposed Amendment, by adding, at the end thereof, the words "and that two other Members, to be named by the General Committee of Elections, be appointed to serve on the Select Committee to examine Witnesses, but without the power of voting."—(Mr. Edward Pleydell Bouverie.)

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he was aware there had been instances of the kind; but he wished to know whether Gentlemen so named to serve in the capacity of assessors would have an option, or would be compelled to serve on being appointed.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he believed the two assessors would be appointed only after communication was had with them.

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

That the Select Committee do consist of five Members, to be nominated by the General Committee of Elections, and that two other Members, to be named by the General Committee of Elections, be appointed to serve on the Select Committee to examine Witnesses, but without the power of voting:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records.

And, on June 7, Committee nominated as follows :—

John George Dodson, Esq., Sir Philip de Malpas Grey Egerton, Bart., Lord Hotham, the Hon. Charles Howard, Edward Howes, Esq.

Also, The Lord Advocate, and Lord Robert Cecil, but without the power of voting.

[BILL 78.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. O'Hagan.)

MR. LONGFIELD said, he did not think the measure before the House, however important, was calculated to benefit the suitors in the Court of Chancery in Ireland. On the contrary, it would be attended with great expense, which was wholly unnecessary. Its introduction was altogether premature, and was founded on evidence not calculated to sustain such a measure. From the statement of his right hon. and learned Friend it might be supposed that his was the first effort that had been made to reform the Court of Chancery in Ireland; but such was by no means the case. Chancery reform was taken up in Ireland before it was discussed in this country. In 1850 great reforms were introduced. The Masters' Office had been for many years a reproach, not because Masters presided there, or on account of the mode of procedure, but because the Government of the day wished to make the courts self-supporting. Stamps were required at every stage of a suit, and, in fact, a system of abuse grew up, not so much from the mode of administering justice itself, as from the endeavour to sell justice and make the court self-supporting—an idea as absurd as it would be to attempt to make the police of London self-supporting. Well, an Act was passed by which the old practice of bills and answers was entirely discontinued, and a short and simple proceeding, by petition to the Chancellor and informal answer through affidavits, was substituted. By that measure the proceedings in administration suits, mortgage suits, trust suits, suits relating to the guardianship of infants, partnership suits, and some other cases, were greatly simplified and taken out of the general jurisdiction of the Chancellor.

By the 15th section of the Act, immediate, absolute, and full jurisdiction was given to the Masters of the Irish Court of Chancery. It became no longer necessary to file a Bill and have an answer in these suits. A short petition was presented to the Chancellor, on which he made a summary order referring everything to the Master, who was made a complete judge of everything connected with the matter. The result of that was a general improvement in, and a great cheapening and facilitating of, Chancery procedure. From that time forward the Masters in Chancery in Ireland were, in truth, as much Vice Chancellors as the Vice Chancellors in England, with this difference, that a short and inexpensive proceeding was necessary to initiate their jurisdiction and give them possession of the whole suit. In 1854, after this great change had been effected in the Irish Court of Chancery, a Royal Commission was issued to inquire into the practice of the Landed Estates Court in Ireland. The Commissioners appointed were Mr. Brady, now Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Sir John Romilly, Chief Justice Monahan, Mr. Blackburn, Mr. Brewster, Sir Richard Bethell, Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, and Sir Hugh Cairns. In 1855 the Commission made a Report, and recommended the project of abolishing the Incumbered Estates Court and the Masters' Offices in Chancery, and appointing two Vice Chancellors, who should do the work in accordance with the English practice. The Report was received with much dissatisfaction, and although he had given evidence in favour of their project, he confessed that his first opinion was rather crude and premature, and had been corrected by subsequent experience. In Ireland the Report received the just condemnation which it afterwards received from the public, the profession, and a Committee of that House. A flight of competing Bills then made their appearance in that House, the professed object of some of them being to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners. Others, introduced by the right hon. Member for Dublin University, aimed at simplifying the procedure of the Court of Chancery, correcting abuses, remedying defects, utilizing the existing staff, and improving the machinery generally. The advantages of the right hon. Member's (Mr. Whiteside's) plan were that it exonerated the public purse from the burden of new officers; that it introduced a new and amended code of procedure, to be carried out by men well accustomed to the improved machinery, who knew its defects, and were willing to do everything in their power to improve the administration of the law. The ability, integrity, and zeal of these men were well known; and although Vice Chancellors might have higher rank, what was wanted was men not above their business, and accessible to the practitioners with whom they are daily brought into contact. Moreover, men with the rank, the salary, and the unapproachable dignity of Vice Chancellors might be tempted to job to find situations for their sons and sons-in-law. However, the competing Bills to which he referred were all sent before a Select Committee of that House, as able as ever sat for such a purpose. That Committee included among its members the Solicitor General, Sir James Graham, Mr. Ellice, Mr. Henley, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Seymour FitzGerald, Mr. De Vere, and Sir Erskine Perry. The Committee took vind voce evidence as to the working of the Court of Chancery jurisdiction. Mr. Gibson, a gentleman of great ability and experience, stated that in the opinion of the Council of Attorneys in Ireland the existing system at the Masters' Office was nearly perfect; but he pointed out one or two small defects which might easily be removed. He also expressed his conviction that if Vice Chancellors were appointed the business would in effect be mainly conducted by clerks, and that the Vice Chancellors would be a sort of unapproachable personages. The Committee acted upon the evidence they received, and an Act was passed, under which, if a single abuse still remained in the Court of Chancery, it was not the fault of the system, but of the men. Saving and except the power of creating new offices, the jurisdiction of the Court was as large as that possessed by Parliament itself, and improvements were almost of daily occurrence in the procedure of the Court. The Lord Chancellor had never complained to the Government of the want of power, nor had any memorial been presented by the Bar or the Society of Solicitors. Moreover, the public were perfectly satisfied, and, on the whole, he had no hesitation in saying that the Chancery system was now in Ireland what it was intended to be in England, but what it certainly was not. It so happened, however, that in 1852 the Masters in England were abolished, and the Vice

Chancellors got power to appoint chief clerks. Those chief clerks were simply Masters under another name, and the old system of references and reports still continued. Nevertheless, as it was believed that nothing Irish could be right, it was determined that the Chancery system in Ireland should be assimilated to that in England. In 1861 the Marquess of Clanricarde complained in another place of the continued waste of money and time to suitors in Ireland, and also of the extravagant expenditure of public funds for the Irish judicial establishment, which was out of all proportion, he said, to the work it had to perform. The objects of the noble Marquess were good objects, but, unfortunately, the noble Marquess did not state a single fact to show that his complaint was well founded. Yet, in the absence of everything like proof, the House of Lords yielded to the wish expressed by so ardent a supporter of the Government, and a Commission was issued. It was to be regretted that the Commissioners, led away by too great zeal, forgot altogether the main object for which they were appointed. The theoretical value of an assimilation between the English and Irish systems was quite a secondary matter. The main point to be considered was the public advantage. He could not help thinking that the choice of Commissioners was very unfortunate. Six of them, and those the highest in rank, were members of the Commission of 1854, and were pledged to the opinion that the Vice Chancellor system ought to be introduced into Ireland. To this view they clung all the more obstinately and passionately because it had already been universally condemned by the people of Ireland. Moreover, other members of the Commission were personally interested in the recommendations which they made. A body thus constituted must in the very nature of it be very far from a fair and impartial tribunal. Now, it seemed to him that it had always been the rule of the House to disregard the representations of Committees or Commissions which were known to have approached a subject with preconceived views. A Royal Commission was appointed under the government of the Earl of Derby to inquire into the subject of harbours of refuge. It so happened that some Gentlemen were on it who had previously made strong recommendations in favour of certain harbours of refuge. The House peremptorily refused to adopt the recommendations of that Commission in consequence of the preconceived opinions of certain Gentlemen upon it. For the same reason the House ought not to attach weight to the recommendations of the Commission on the question now before them. The English Commissioners knew nothing of the Irish law system, and the Irish members knew nothing of the English system; the Secretary, no doubt, possessed the same acquaintance with both. Finding themselves in the difficulty, they thought the better way to proceed was to get two essays written, and a barrister of each country was instructed to draw up elaborate reports upon the practice of the Irish and English superior courts; and then a series of interrogatories was circulated among selected members of the Irish bar. One gentleman to whom these queries were sent, was a man of truth and sagacity, and in extensive practice in the Masters' Courts in Ireland, and in replying he said that he would assume that the Masters were to be abolished, and one or more Vice Chancellors to be appointed in their stead. He stated it was rumoured that the Commissioners had already determined to advise the appointment of only one Judge in addition to one master and the Master of the Rolls—an arrangement which, in his opinion, would prove wholly insufficient, the object of it being to give more power and patronage into the hands of the Government. Throughout the whole of the inquiry of the Commission, there was not a single question asked any man as to what would be the effect of the projected change in regard to the expenditure of the public money and the cost to the suitor. That was either quite beneath the notice of the Commissioners, or else they discreetly avoided it, because they knew that their recommendations would involve an increase in the costs of suitors, and in the public expenditure for the sake of a new theoretical advantage. It was manifest from their first Report, that they had not considered the all-important question, whether the system they recommended would lead to a saving of money; neither had they asked any English gentleman how the system of chief clerk was working here, so that the Commissioners had left the House and the profession in darkness on that point. But it so happened that they had information on the subject from another source. Mr. Maul, a gentleman who had come into that paradise of suitors, the English Court of Chancery, had published the result of his experience. This gentleman said that in that camera obscura the chief clerk's chamber, which might be considered the very opposite of the camera lucida, the open Court of Chancery, property to an enormous amount was dealt with by the chief clerks, unknown to any one except to the parties interested, who might be unable to defend themselves, and who might be reduced to ruin and destitution as a result of the litigation carried on in that way. So much for the superior advantages of the procedure in the English Court. The recommendation of the Commissioners was not to distribute the business among the Judges now in Ireland—not to improve the Masters' officers or utilize them, but at once, contrary to the chief reason for which they had been appointed Commissioners, to create an enormous expenditure for the purpose of maintaining a Vice Chancellor and a chief clerk. The judicial staff in Ireland was twenty-two; the Commissioners wanted to make a grand jury of it by increasing it to twenty-three. The Vice Chancellor was to take rank after the Chief Baron, and thus have precedence over a number of eminent men now Judges on the Irish bench, and according to the evidence of Mr. Gibson and other attorneys of experience, that functionary would be unapproachable by solicitors for the transaction of business as they now discharged it with the Masters. The Irish Masters were most able and excellent men with salaries of £2,500 a year each. The Vice Chancellors were to have £4,000 a year. Now the present Master of the Rolls in Ireland was a most able and upright Judge, but it was utterly impossible that he should be able to discharge the additional duties that would be thrown upon him by the proposed change. According to the recommendations of the Commissioners, there would be an addition made to the already large judicial staff of Ireland of at least ten officers, and an augmentation of the public expenditure of £12,000 a year. It was also calculated by the best legal authorities in the country, that there would be at least 33 per cent additional cost to the suitors. The whole project was premature; it was the result of an investigation most inefficiently conducted, it was quite unnecessary, and would lead to increased expense both to the suitors and the public. For these reasons he moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Mr. VANCE, in seconding the Amendment, pointed out that no complaint against the present system had been made by the Bar or the suitors. The Masters in Chancery were four of the ablest men in the legal profession in Ireland. Their tribunal was approachable by the junior Bar, by the solicitors, and by the suitors themselves, and in their place it was proposed to substitute a tribunal of greater dignity — of greater ability was not possible — which could only be approached by the senior Bar, of course at a much greater cost to the public. That was in direct opposition to the recommendation of a Committee, on which were men like Mr. Henley, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Ellice, and Sir James Graham, who all highly approved the jurisdiction of the Masters in original suits. Justice at present was efficiently administered, and at a small expense, and no portion of the Irish public required the change.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months." — (Mr. Longfield.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. O'HAGAN (THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND) said, that having on a previous occasion entered into an elaborate statement of the character of the measure, he thought he should not be justified now in going through the whole question at the same length. There were, however, a few observations, some of a general and some of a particular character, which he wished to address to the House. He would, however, remark that the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Mallow was not a discussion of the question before the House, or a criticism of the principles of the Bill, but an indulgence in suggestions with reference to persons whose characters did not render them proper subjects for such imputations. He rejoiced to find so long a time had elapsed between the introduction of the Bill and its second reading, because it had given an opportunity for considering and examining its details, and the result had been the adoption of the principles of the Bill by the incorporated solicitors of Ireland, and by the great majority of persons in that country who were most competent to give an opinion. From the Incorporated Society of Solicitors of Ireland he had received suggestions upon details which they opposed; and as to those details, he believed that he should have very little difficulty in meeting all the views presented by this very important and influential body. He was not aware that there had been any expression of opinion in Ireland against the Bill; and, taking that fact in connection with the evidence on which the measure was founded, he thought he might say that it came before the House very much the reverse of discredited by the opinion of the country. It had been said that the Bill would involve much expense to the country, that it was wholly unnecessary, and that it would be very mischievous. Now, considering that the Bill was in all its parts sustained by the solemn recommendations of a Commission of the very highest authority, that it was a consolidation of statutes framed in England upon the authority of successive Commissions from 1824 downwards, and that the Acts thus consolidated were at the present moment in operation in England, to the satisfaction of the Bar and of the public, he felt some surprise that such a statement should be ventured upon in this House. It was represented as a conflict between the recommendations of the Royal Commission and the Report of a former Committee of that House. He could not deny that there was a material difference between the opinions expressed by the Committee and the Royal Commissioners. The Committee, however, was formed with a special object at a particular time, and the question merely left to them was, whether the Encumbered Estates Court should be abolished, whereas the Royal Commissioners were directed to address themselves to a consideration of the benefit and advantage of assimilating the law of the two countries. They would find that on almost every particular point the Committee were divided, and the matter was agreed to by a narrow majority only; whereas he presented a Bill to the House, founded upon the unanimous opinion of the two Royal Commissions which sat in 1856 and 1861, composed of men as able, learned, and honest as ever sat on a Commission or a Committee. Even in the Committee some Resolutions were proposed by his right hon. Friend opposite which really embodied the principle of the Bill before the House — namely, that it was of the last importance that a Judge in equity who heard a cause should hear it to its conclusion, and should not make references to Masters, thus introducing confusion and causing delay and expense. The right hon. Gentleman was, therefore, a most persuasive witness in defence of the measure which he came there that night to oppose. It was said that the Commission issued questions for the purpose of obtaining answers in accordance with preconceived notions. Now, it was only necessary to read the questions in order to be assured of the injustice of such a charge, for which, indeed, there was not a shadow of foundation. He denied also the allegation that the object of the Commissioners was by jobbing to create a place which might be useful for a friend. That was not the way to argue such a question, and the names of the Commissioners were alone an answer to the charge. The Commission originated upon an address of the House of Lords, moved by the Marquess of Clanricarde, in opposition to the wish of the Government. The Commissioners were the Master of the Rolls in England and Vice Chancellor Page Wood, two of the most distinguished Judges who ever adorned the equity bench; Mr. Justice Willes; the Attorney General, of whom he could not say in his presence what he might have said if he had been absent; the late Attorney General for Ireland, the late Solicitor General, Mr. Giffard, Mr. Follett, the Judge of Appeal in Ireland, a most distinguished man, far advanced in years, who had held with honour many high offices, Mr. Napier, Chief Justice Monahan, Baron Hughes, and Mr. Brewster. Could men have been selected by the Government who were more competent, more trustworthy, or less open to such imputations as had been made against them? There were, it was true, two Members whom the hon. and learned Gentleman said ought not to have been upon the Commission—himself and his Colleague, the Solicitor General. The reason that the hon. and learned Member urged against their being Members of the Commission was that they were interested in its result. All he would say in answer to that suggestion was, that no man who was worthy to fill the post which he now occupied could for a moment be influenced towards a conclusion by a consideration of that kind, and that this was a suggestion which ought not to have been made, at all events, by a member of his own profession. In the appointment of the Committee upon which such reliance was placed by his hon. and learned Friend and by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Whiteside) the very same course was taken by that House. His two predecessors in office were both Members of that Committee. There was also added to the Commission the head of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland, Mr. Orpen. A Commission so constituted was certainly not likely to depart from their duty to serve their friends, or to manipulate a question with the miserable object of maintaining a foregone conclusion. The hon. and learned Gentleman complained that this Commission had not thoroughly investigated the question which was submitted to their decision. Why, the Members of the Commission were themselves the most competent persons to decide as to the value of the English and Irish systems respectively. If witnesses had been examined they would have been the persons who could have given the best evidence. Never, however, did a Commission proceed more cautiously, carefully, and temperately than did this one. Notwithstanding the knowledge which the Commissioners themselves possessed upon the subject, they selected two well qualified barristers from England and two from Ireland to inform them upon the details and differences of the laws of the two countries. His hon. and learned Friend had quoted a letter in support of his views, but he did not regard its contents as any material substantiation of his hon. and learned Friend's arguments, because he himself had received letter after letter from disappointed suitors, each of whom represented his own case as having been treated in a more shameful manner than any other. His hon. and learned Friend had urged upon the House that the effect of the measure would be to increase expense, and that the number of Judges would be as great as in England, with far less work to be performed. The statement was entirely without foundation. On the contrary, both the expenses and the number of Judges would be reduced. He did not believe that so useful and comprehensive a reform, involving at the same time so great a reduction in expenditure, had been passed for some time. Of the four Masters of Chancery at present in Ireland the Bill proposed to retain but one, a single Vice Chancellor being appointed in place of the remaining three. The only new offices contemplated were those of the Vice Chancellor and two chief clerks, although his hon. and learned Friend had stated that there would be ten new offices created. The Bill provided that there should be no superannuation of men who were still competent for the performance of their duties, and that every single individual at present engaged in the Masters' Office should be employed in the dence, remarked that the system in England should be abolished, and the Irish system adopted in its stead. The vote was taken upon the direct point whether all those officers should be abolished and Vice Chancellors appointed or not; and the Committee decided, not that they should be abolished, but that they should have original jurisdiction and all the powers of a Court of Equity over foreclosure suits, administration suits, and other matters, under the 15th section of Sir John Romilly's Act. With regard to the mode of taking evidence, the recommendation of the Committee was that viva voce testimony was to be encouraged and maintained in the Court of Chancery; but the present Bill enacted at section 93, except as thereafter provided, that the examinations to be taken for the purpose of being used in the hearing of a case should be taken ex parte, and that no person should have a right to be present except the party who produced the witness, his counsel, solicitor, and agents. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had quoted the opinion of the Master of the Rolls, but he could inform him that the Master of the Rolls had the very strongest objection to this kind of written evidence. To attempt to force upon the Irish courts against their will a bad system of taking evidence—a system condemned by the Committee, by learned authorities in Ireland, and by common sense and experience—was a thing which he hoped his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for England would not sanction. The Committee referred to also directed that a Bill should be brought in, and it was brought in, by the predecessor of the present Attorney General for Ireland, giving power to the Chancery Judges to make general orders for the regulation of the procedure of their courts; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman in bringing in the Bill stated, as an apology for introducing clause after clause of general orders, that these Judges in Ireland would not agree about them, but the real reason was that it was necessary that the Lord Chancellor should be one of the three Judges. And what did the Attorney General for England think of a scheme which ignored the existence of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland? The Lord Chancellor had not introduced those orders, because he conscientiously believed that many of them would not be applicable to Ireland. Neither was he on the Commission. It was a censure on the Commission, on the Bill, on the Attorney General himself, if the procedure proposed was so inapplicable that the Lord Chancellor would not introduce it. The head of the law in Ireland was not supposed to be in favour of the measure, and would the House at that period of the Session rashly adopt it? When he (Mr. Whiteside) asked the Master of the Rolls in Dublin, where were his chambers, where were his chambers for carrying out the provisions of the Bill, he said he had none, and it would be difficult to find space to build them. He (Mr. Whiteside) asked, then, whether the criticism of his hon. and learned Friend was not just, that the real reason for introducing the Bill at that period of the year was—and he did not say it unkindly—because the Ministry was not strong. On a similar occasion the late Sir Robert Peel had said the same, and that for many reasons he said he would make them name the Vice Chancellors before they passed the Bill. He (Mr. Whiteside) did not go on that principle, but they could not remove the Masters until the Lord Chancellor was satisfied they ought to be dismissed, and until a new court was built for the new officials. The building clause was, in fact, fatal to the scheme. They refused ten years ago to abolish those four Masters and their staffs, the expense of which was about £15,000 a year, thereby saving £150,000 to the country. All but one of those gentlemen were now alive and full of work, having done it perfectly well from that day to this, and therefore he called upon the Attorney General for Ireland to say who were to be the new Judges who would do the work as well. The Attorney General knew that he would find the names of those Masters in almost all the difficult cases that occurred in their time at the Irish Bar—the names of Master Litton and Master Brooke—and that they were perfectly competent to their work. What was done with these officials in 1850? Sir John Romilly gave them at that time some powers, but not full powers. They were to have all powers in certain classes of suits except that of paying out money. The Attorney General for Ireland had referred to the evidence of the Master of the Rolls, who said that the decrees of the Masters came before him in order that he might direct payment of the monies. By one of the Resolutions of the Committee that proceeded, and those gentlemen had power over the monies been the law in Ireland for many years, but such was official vanity that persons in high position never condescended to look into the laws of any other than their own country, or to take notice of them. Then it was said that County Courts should have the power of winding up small estates, to the extent of £400 or £500; but many years ago that power was given to the County Courts in Ireland to the extent of £200. He would, however, proceed to consider this ponderous Bill of 170 clauses. Its objects were three. The first, and most material, related to the demolition of useful offices and the creation of new ones. That was perfectly intelligible. The second part of the Bill related to procedure, and that part of the Bill had been drawn, in his opinion, clumsily and carelessly. The third part related to costs, which, as the right hon. Gentleman who moved the second reading of the Bill said, was untouched by the Commissioners, there not being a word from beginning to end of their judgment relating to the subject. The history of the Commissions relating to law in Ireland was remarkable. Long before an attempt was made in this country to facilitate the transfer of land cheaply with a secure title, the Encumbered Estates Court had been established in Ireland. An attempt was however made to undo the good work which Parliament had effected. The period of the Act for the Encumbered Estates Court was about to expire, and after the usual manner a Commission was issued to several most respectable gentlemen—he had not one word to say against any one who signed that or any other Report which had not been acted on. There was, for instance, the Commission on the Dublin Society, on which sat the Lord Justice of Appeal; but his recommendations were set aside when it suited the purpose of the Government, and adopted on the other Commission when it answered their purposes. It would be infinitely better to postpone the present Bill. The Master of the Rolls did not approve this Bill as it was drawn, and he might venture to say he never would. In 1854 what happened? Here was a curious lesson in legislation. A Commission was issued to inform Parliament what was to be done as to the Parliamentary title for the transfer of land in Ireland, and they made their Report. There were 900 suits clogging the court, and the Commission recommended that the whole of these should be preserved for the Court of Chancery. A tribunal had been established which was effectual, short, cheap, approved and satisfactory to the public, and that was to be got rid of—how? They were to remove all the Masters in Chancery, and give to the Judge the entire conduct of the case. The former Commissioners recommended that the jurisdiction relating to the Landed Estates Court should be vested in the Court of Chancery, and that all business then pending should be plunged into Chancery; but nobody complained of the existing tribunals of the country; every one, as far as he could discover, was satisfied with them, and for this very obvious reason—they were cheap, quick, and good. It was also remarkable that, at that time, it was proposed to create a Vice Chancellor—the very thing that was proposed to be done under the present Bill; and this was in order to give the Judge the entire control of the case in all its stages. Hon. Members must not suppose that Masters in Chancery in Ireland were in the same position as the Masters in England. Ten Masters in England formerly sat in Southampton Buildings, in the dark, and never proceeded promptly with anything. They were very old and very odd personages. He (Mr. Whiteside) had occasion to visit the office of Master Fitzgibbon, in Dublin lately, and found him in a comfortable court, with barristers arguing and conducting their suits in full day light. He regretted to see the name of Mr. Brewster appended to this Commission, because if justice had prevailed in the legal promotions in Ireland that eminent barrister would, fifteen years ago, have been upon the Bench. He (Mr. Whiteside) had suggested that they should have a Committee of the longest-headed men in Parliament, and try what they thought of the Report of that Commission. The Committee was appointed, and the fate of the Commission was precisely what he thought it would be. The Committee summoned two of the Masters before them, and many eminent and competent witnesses; and when a mass of evidence had been taken, the Committee refused to recommend the abolition of the Masters. There was a total delusion on the subject of the Masters in Ireland, as if they resembled the same officials in England; and he remembered that Mr. Ellice and Sir Erskine Perry, who, with Sir James Graham and others, sat upon that Committee, having heard the evidence, remarked that the system in England should be abolished, and the Irish system adopted in its stead. The vote was taken upon the direct point whether all those officers should be abolished and Vice Chancellors appointed or not; and the Committee decided, not that they should be abolished, but that they should have original jurisdiction and all the powers of a Court of Equity over foreclosure suits, administration suits, and other matters, under the 15th section of Sir John Romilly's Act. With regard to the mode of taking evidence, the recommendation of the Committee was that vivâ voce testimony was to be encouraged and maintained in the Court of Chancery; but the present Bill enacted at section 93, except as thereafter provided, that the examinations to be taken for the purpose of being used in the hearing of a case should be taken ex parte, and that no person should have a right to be present except the party who produced the witness, his counsel, solicitor, and agents. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had quoted the opinion of the Master of the Rolls, but he could inform him that the Master of the Rolls had the very strongest objection to this kind of written evidence. To attempt to force upon the Irish courts against their will a bad system of taking evidence—a system condemned by the Committee, by learned authorities in Ireland, and by common sense and experience—was a thing which he hoped his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for England would not sanction. The Committee referred to also directed that a Bill should be brought in, and it was brought in, by the predecessor of the present Attorney General for Ireland, giving power to the Chancery Judges to make general orders for the regulation of the procedure of their courts; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman in bringing in the Bill stated, as an apology for introducing clause after clause of general orders, that these Judges in Ireland would not agree about them, but the real reason was that it was necessary that the Lord Chancellor should be one of the three Judges. And what did the Attorney General for England think of a scheme which ignored the existence of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland? The Lord Chancellor had not introduced those orders, because he conscientiously believed that many of them would not be applicable to Ireland. Neither was he on the Commission. It was a censure on the Commission, on the Bill, on the Attorney General himself, if the procedure proposed was so inapplicable that the Lord Chancellor would not introduce it. The head of the law in Ireland was not supposed to be in favour of the measure, and would the House at that period of the Session rashly adopt it? When he (Mr. Whiteside) asked the Master of the Rolls in Dublin, where were his chambers, where were his chambers for carrying out the provisions of the Bill, he said he had none, and it would be difficult to find space to build them. He (Mr. Whiteside) asked, then, whether the criticism of his hon. and learned Friend was not just, that the real reason for introducing the Bill at that period of the year was—and he did not say it unkindly—because the Ministry was not strong. On a similar occasion the late Sir Robert Peel had said the same, and that for many reasons he said he would make them name the Vice Chancellors before they passed the Bill. He (Mr. Whiteside) did not go on that principle, but they could not remove the Masters until the Lord Chancellor was satisfied they ought to be dismissed, and until a new court was built for the new officials. The building clause was, in fact, fatal to the scheme. They refused ten years ago to abolish those four Masters and their staffs, the expense of which was about £15,000 a year, thereby saving £150,000 to the country. All but one of those gentlemen were now alive and full of work, having done it perfectly well from that day to this, and therefore he called upon the Attorney General for Ireland to say who were to be the new Judges who would do the work as well. The Attorney General knew that he would find the names of those Masters in almost all the difficult cases that occurred in their time at the Irish Bar—the names of Master Litton and Master Brooke—and that they were perfectly competent to their work. What was done with these officials in 1850? Sir John Romilly gave them at that time some powers, but not full powers. They were to have all powers in certain classes of suits except that of paying out money. The Attorney General for Ireland had referred to the evidence of the Master of the Rolls, who said that the decrees of the Masters came before him in order that he might direct payment of the monies. By one of the Resolutions of the Committee that proceeding was changed, and those gentlemen obtained complete power over the monies involved in the suits before them. The mode of conducting business before the Masters might appear to be rather loose, but it was simple. There was in a large class of cases no bill or answer but simply a short petition asking a reference to the Master. Supposing the case of a small farmer who died leaving a property of £400 involved under an obscure will, a short petition was presented and the Master heard a junior counsel once on each side, placed his own construction on the will, and handed over the fund. Now, it was proposed to abolish that simple mode of procedure and to begin every suit by a bill and answer, and after hearing two silk gowns the balance remaining to be handed over in such a case as he had instanced would be very small indeed. He had recently inquired of an experienced officer of the Court of Chancery what additional expense would be cast upon suitors by the proposed scheme, and the answer was that the expense would be increased by one-third or one-half. The most triumphant vindication of the recommendations of the Committee was to be found in the labours of the Masters. He found from the Return that had been made to the House, that from the 1st of January, 1851, when the existing system commenced, to the 8th of May, 1864, Master Litton had heard 6,133 short and long causes, had heard 31,508 motions and meetings in short causes, and 7,932 in long causes. In Master Brooke's office, during a similar period, there had been 7,124 long and short cause proceedings, 430 decrees and decretal orders made final, and 3,118 interlocutory orders. Master Murphy, in the same period, had heard upwards of 30,000 applications, and Master Lyle 22,020 motions and short causes and 5,025 long causes. Then as to reversals, he found that from 1851 to the 1st of April, 1864, there had been a total of 134 appeals from the Masters, and only forty-two reversals. It was well known that the Master of the Rolls in Ireland was most critical in reviewing the decisions of the Masters, and yet that almost hypercritical Judge, out of eleven appeals in 1863, only found cause to reverse the decisions in two of them. He, therefore, asked with confidence whether there was any other tribunal in the country which could show such a result of their labours, and whether it was possible that the House would sanction the doing away with the services of these gentlemen? After the Committee of 1856 had concluded its labours, it had fallen to his lot to carry out the scheme of the Landed

Estates Court, and he thought that it ought to be a self-supporting establishment, with which view he proposed to exact a small poundage upon the properties brought into Court. The very plan by which the Judges of the Landed Estates Court had distributed about twenty-eight millions of money, the plan of a permanent amicable tribunal, was that which it was now sought to get rid of, and to substitute chief clerks to do work which individual Judges now performed without such assistance. Would any one say that an attorney, with a salary of £800, in company with two other attorneys, would form a better tribunal than that which now existed? In the Landed Estates Court there were Judges, examiners, and all necessary officials. He wanted to see the Irish system of the Masters' office and the Landed Estates Court introduced into England. The examiner was not allowed to summon any witness, but a schedule was placed before the Judge, and each claimant stated his case—one person, perhaps, claiming £1,000 on mortgage. The examiner had merely to see that all that was stated in the schedule was true, and on the day appointed the case went before the Judge, who decided every question, even summed up the interest, and fixed the day up to which the interest was due, and so he went through the schedule. Would the chief clerk proposed by the Bill be found to perform the work in the same satisfactory manner, and was the Attorney General serious in thinking that he could pass the Bill? One claimant, for example, No. 3, said that he ought to be No. 1, because the first claimant was a judgment creditor, claiming by a judgment improperly registered. Was a chief clerk to decide on that nice question? The Estates Court decided on it there and then, but was it to be supposed that an attorney, appointed as chief clerk with a salary of £800 or £900, sitting in his chamber and prohibited from hearing counsel, would be superior to one of those learned and competent Judges? He impeached the whole principle of the Bill in reference to the introduction into Ireland of the system of chief clerks, for he thought it was the duty of the Government rather to incorporate the Irish system on the English system. He again called on the Attorney General to convince the House that the dear mode of proceeding was more advantageous than the cheap; and that the short and inexpensive process by summary petition was inferior to that by bill and answer. He should like to be told where there was in the Report a particle of evidence that one Vice Chancellor would do the work now done by the four Masters. Nobody believed that one Vice Chancellor could do it, and the only proper course to pursue would be, when one Master died, to see whether three could do the work, and when another died to see whether two could do it, or if the Government wanted an additional Chancery Judge let them try and seduce into the Court of Chancery one of the Judges of the Landed Estates Court, who were now lightly worked, and so save the money of the country. With respect to the cost of the proposed scheme, he begged to tell the Attorney General for Ireland that he thoroughly knew that part of the question. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said the places would be properly filled. Assuredly other places might be filled. Certainly every place that could be filled would be filled. If the present Secretary for the Colonies were in office in Ireland he would, without doubt, be called upon to fill up every place. The recommendation that the office of Masters in Chancery in Ireland should be abolished had already been twice negatived by the House. Then there was another recommendation, that the existing Masters should be retained as long as might be found necessary, which, he supposed, meant that they were to continue to do the work while the new officials played. He hoped the House would also observe that power was taken to double the staff of clerks at any future time. His estimate of the bill which the country would have to pay for these very questionable reforms was as follows:—The salary of one Vice Chancellor would be £4,000; chief clerk, £1,000; two junior clerks, £700; tip-staff, £100; crier, £120; total, £5,920. Then there would be the assistant registrar, £1,250; and the staff of clerks of the Master of the Rolls would bring the amount up to £8,870. That calculation proceeded on the assumption that one set of clerks would be sufficient, and if they were doubled, which the Bill contemplated as a possible necessity, that would involve an additional £5,000, giving a total of £13,870. That was, it must be owned, a very fair, respectable beginning; and it was more than probable that the Chancellor, who was not favourable to the Bill, would, if it were carried, be loth to lose the services of the good old working hands, trained by many years' experience, and would retain the Masters to save his court from falling into confusion. What security was there that it would be possible for one Vice Chancellor, even with a double staff of clerks, to get through the work of the four Masters? Further aid might be necessary, and thus there was the prospect of a possible addition to the expenses, which would bring them up to nearly £22,000. He had observed this curious fact, that in Ireland persons who were pensioned off never died. There were some who got pensions at the time of the Union, and who were alive and hearty still, although that was sixty-four years since. It was certain that when the Masters got retiring allowances the last thing they would ever think of doing would be to die. Then, there were claims for compensations from the other officials, who refused to serve except in their present capacity, and maintained that they were engaged during good behaviour. The proposal to make the young gentlemen who were now examiners chief clerks was preposterous, and he did not suppose it was seriously intended. He had no objection to attorneys getting places for which they were qualified; but he was satisfied they would not get men in that profession of high attainments and experience to accept the situations under this Bill at the salaries proposed. However, all the Government wanted was to have the Bill passed, and then they would come to the House in a year or two and ask that the salaries should be doubled. Although the title of Vice Chancellors had been refused to the Masters, they exercised complete jurisdiction on every question save one, and the Chancellor sent them very difficult cases to try. They performed their work admirably; and there were no other Judges in either country from whose decisions there were so few appeals. But because Masters had been abolished in England for the sake of uniformity, it was proposed by the Bill to abolish them in Ireland. He submitted that the eminent men who had signed the Commission rested their arguments on a mistake—a mistake arising altogether from the fact that they examined no person in this country to prove what was the working of the system of chief clerks. Sir James Graham had stated that that was a system which ought to be watched with the greatest carefulness, otherwise the evils of the old system under another name would spring up. On those grounds he hoped the House would not allow the Report of their Committee to be overthrown by the opinion of those gentlemen—however respectable they were—who had signed this Commission. He hoped the Bill would be withdrawn, and that the Attorney General for Ireland would send the Bill to those persons who had not seen it, and allow the general orders of this country to be considered by the Judges during the long vacation, so as to ascertain whether they were applicable to Ireland. If they were, he had no doubt the Lord Chancellor would adopt them without the formality of legislation. He hoped, therefore, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be of opinion that it was not advisable to proceed with that ponderous Bill during the Session.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he thought that the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had mixed up almost everything in the world in his speech must have rendered many of his remarks unintelligible to everybody but himself. The way in which he had jumbled together clauses and details of this Bill and that Bill, with recommendations of one Commission and recommendations of another Commission, interspersing the whole with comments on the practice and procedure of the Court of Chancery, had produced on his own mind only one impression, namely, admiration at the right hon. Gentleman's extraordinary skill in mystifying a very simple subject. The course taken by the right hon. Gentleman reminded him of the custom adopted in another country on the canonization of saints. One advocate pleaded elaborately all the virtues of the person to be canonized, and on another devolved the less agreeable and more invidious office of putting forward all his vices and faults. The right hon. Gentleman undertook the more agreeable of these tasks. There was no legal institution in regard to which any alteration or improvement was recommended but he was sure to be found its most able and courageous champion. Under his magic touch it assumed the aspect and wore the colours of the most delightful perfection. It was the model for all the world, and the astonishing thing was that anybody could think it capable of the least improvement. Even the right hon. Gentleman's former opinions were sacrificed upon the altar of his country. He had gone into the proceedings that were adopted on this subject in 1856, and certainly his remarks were comforting and encouraging. As the right hon. Gentleman had yielded to the opinions of others on that occasion, and now came forward as the champion of the opinions which then prevailed over his own, so they might venture to hope that when his present opinions should have been overruled and this measure had taken root and worked successfully, no one would be found more forward to stand up in that House as its champion than the right hon. Gentleman. In the month of February, 1856, two Bills were introduced, on the back of which were the names of Mr. Whiteside and Mr. Napier. One of them sought to make provision for the more speedy and effectual despatch of business in the Irish Court of Chancery. And this was the description of the procedure of that Court contained in the preamble of the right hon. Gentleman's Bill—

"Whereas the present mode of proceeding in the High Court of Chancery in Ireland, by orders of reference, reports, and exceptions, is attended with delay, expense, and other inconvenience, and it is expedient that every cause or matter should be prosecuted through all its stages before and under the direction of the same Judge or judicial officer, &c."

And what did the right hon. Gentleman then propose to enact? Why, the abolition of those Masters in Chancery of whom he was now the strenuous advocate, and the substitution for men with salaries of some £500 a year of three Vice Chancellors with £3,500 a year each, and each with a chief clerk at £800 a year and two junior clerks at a somewhat smaller salary. Then, by the right hon. Gentleman's other Bill, the English chief clerk's practice in chambers was sought to be introduced in all respects. [Mr. WHITESIDE: These were Bills that went before a Committee.] He was aware of that, and the right hon. Gentleman was a Member of that Committee, which sat taking evidence from the 6th of March to the 22nd of May. On the 5th of June, 1856, the right hon. Gentleman, after brooding over the subject and giving his best energies to it during the labours of the Committee, proposed Resolutions stating, among other things, that it was expedient that the High Court of Chancery in Ireland should undergo a thorough revision both in its constitution and procedure; that the constitution of the Court should be altered by the abolition of the office of Master in Ordinary with the present system of references and reports, and by the appointment of Vice Chancellors, who, with the Master of the Rolls, should severally hear cases and matters which should eventuate in further inquiries, so that the same Judge should conduct the entire proceedings from their commencement to their termination. It was true the right hon. Gentleman proposed also that the first Vice Chancellors should be appointed from the existing Masters. The Committee adopted in preference a plan recommended by Sir E. Perry, retaining the name of Masters, but giving them the functions of Vice Chancellors. He was aware that the right hon. Gentleman acquiesced, without dividing in favour of his own plan, in the views of the majority of that Committee; but it was somewhat too much for the right hon. Gentleman to come forward now, and eloquently denounce, as a thing unheard of and utterly subversive of the proper administration of justice in Ireland, the plan which he himself recommended and persevered in so late as the 5th of June, in 1856. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that an assimilation of practice between the two countries was not to be desired, as recommended by the Commissioners? Such an assimilation was the principle of the Bill, and to that principle the right hon. Gentleman had not addressed one word of his speech. The evidence given by the Masters themselves supported the principle of this measure. Master Murphy stated that the most valuable of all reforms would be the adoption of the practice of the English Court of Chancery. He would not trouble the House with figures, but he could produce in detail proofs of the extraordinary diminution of expense and acceleration of business which had resulted from the new system in England. Very large estates were now distributed at an almost nominal cost in comparison with that which was incurred before. Lord St. Leonards speaking in 1858 said that he had personally examined into the system of the chief clerks' offices, and he declared that, with the exception of one or two suggestions he had made, which were adopted, the system was as nearly perfect as possible. The right hon. and learned Member for Dublin University was wrong in supposing that the present Bill would compel suitors in the Irish Court of Chancery to commence the simplest administration suits concerning the most trifling estates by the expensive process of bills and answers. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman had read the Bill, he would have seen that it introduced into Ireland the short, inexpensive, and summary method of taking out summonses in chambers in administration suits. Chief clerks, it had been said, would not be competent to determine important questions of law. They never did so in England, except when the parties were perfectly satisfied with their decision, and at any time such questions might be readily brought before the Judge himself. He trusted the House would not be led away by the eloquence of the right hon. and learned Member for Dublin University, but would remember that they were now engaged only in considering whether they should give a second reading to a Bill which was the result of the recommendations of a highly competent Commission, and which aimed at the assimilation of the practice in England and Ireland. Objections to clauses would doubtless be fully and fairly discussed in Committee; but the Amendment to the second reading of the Bill simply meant that the system of the Court of Chancery in Ireland was so perfect that it should not be altered at all.

MR. GEORGE said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, had endeavoured to divert attention from the real arguments used by the right hon. and learned Member for Dublin University, and with having unintentionally misrepresented the course taken by that Gentleman in 1856. For his own part, he was as great an advocate for the assimilation of the practice of England and Ireland as any man living. He hoped, indeed, the time would soon come when no Act would be passed for one country that would not be binding on the other. What he complained of in the present Bill was that it carried out only a portion of the recommendations which had been made, and that it left untouched many differences between the two countries. A mixed Commission of English and Irish barristers might be able to prepare the heads of a real assimilation Bill, but it was a perfect mockery to call the measure now under discussion by that name. The right hon. and learned Member for Dublin University had pursued a consistent course, and if defects still existed in the system of the Irish Court of Chancery, it was not his fault or that of the Legislature. It was remarkable that throughout the whole Report of 1860 no reference was made to the Report of 1856, and in many of the most important points the two Reports were quite opposed to each other. When a Bill of this kind was brought forward, it was incumbent upon the House to consider how the Masters in Chancery had conducted themselves. It was an extraordinary fact that during the last fourteen years the four Masters had made 14,400 decretal orders, and only 137 appeals took place out of that number. Then, again, out of these 137 appeals, only forty of these orders were reversed! And that was the jurisdiction which it was now proposed to abolish. If they abolished those Masters and appointed one Vice Chancellor, the result would be that next year they would have to come down and appoint one or two more Vice Chancellors, and additional chief and under clerks. From statements made on good authority, it would seem that in this country the system which it was proposed to extend to Ireland had produced confusion and disorder, which never could have arisen if a competent authority had decided on the judicial and legal difficulties as they arose. He thought it would be legal suicide to destroy a system which had worked so well in Ireland, and on those grounds he should vote against the second reading.

MR. SCULLY said, it had at one time been his misfortune to practise in the High Court of Chancery in Ireland; and he must say that though the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Wexford (Mr. George) were very high authorities in the Courts of Common Law, he had never met either of them in the High Court of Chancery. The Bill the House had to consider that night contained only 192 clauses, with attendant schedules; but he hoped they would not go into those clauses on that occasion, for he really did not know but that he would be compelled to oppose every single one of them. All that they ought to do at that late hour was to discuss the principle of the measure only. The Report which had been so much condemned that evening was signed by Mr. Napier, the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns), and other eminent Chancery barristers. The Commissioners were unanimously in favour of assimilation, and their authority ought to have great weight with hon. Gentlemen opposite. He did not undertake to support the Bill in all its details, but to the principle of the Bill he did give his support.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, that having been a Member of the Select Committee, he naturally took a great interest in this subject. It was one on which laymen might be permitted to express their opinions, and, in fact, the Report of the Commission lost much of its value in his estimation by the fact that it was composed of professional men. Remembering the part which the late Sir James Graham took in those proceedings he could only say that if Sir James Graham had been amongst them during this discussion they would not have heard many of the arguments that had been advanced that evening. Many legal reforms had been carried in opposition to the profession. The Attorney General had entirely mistaken the position of his right hon. Friend the Member for Dublin University. His right hon. Friend might at one time have been all in favour of Vice Chancellors, but he had changed his opinion, seeing how well the present system of Masters worked in Ireland. He should suggest that his hon. and learned Friend behind him should allow the Bill to be read a second time, and that he should afterwards move that it be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. MALINS said, the opponents of the Bill had failed in satisfying him that the Bill ought to be opposed at this stage. He had practised in the English Court of Chancery under the old and new systems, and the result of the new system was that suits which before 1852 would have lasted five years were disposed of in twelve or eighteen months. The Masters under the Irish system were totally different from what they were in England; for in this country there never was known such a thing as a cause originated before a Master; whereas in Ireland a suit went at once before the Master on a cause petition; he pronounced a decision upon it, and then worked out his own decree. That system he (Mr. Malins) regarded as very objectionable. He thought the Government had done right in introducing a Bill for assimilating the laws of Chancery of the two countries, and he approved of the principles of the measure. No doubt some of the details of the measure were open to objection, but the best way of meeting them would be by referring it to a Select Committee. The English system was by no means perfect, and what required alteration in this country might be guarded against with regard to Ireland. Instead of abolishing the Masters and substituting a Vice Chancellor and a chief clerk, he thought the Masters might be retained to act with the Vice Chancellor with great advantage to the suitors. He recommended the hon. and learned Gentleman not to persevere with his Amendment.

MR. LONGFIELD said, that after the expression of opinion of the hon. Member for Horsham, he would not press the Motion to a division, but at the proper time he should move to refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

JAMAICA.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

LORD DUNSANY, who had given notice of a Motion for Papers respecting the Government and internal affairs of Jamaica, said, that he was induced to bring forward this subject at the present time owing to the very grave and very unsatisfactory state of affairs existing in the Islands. Perhaps the House would understand better what this state of things was if he read a Resolution passed by the House of Assembly—

"That this House cannot, consistently with a due regard to the maintenance of its prescriptive rights and privileges, which are the firmest bulworks of the liberties, franchises, and immunities of the people, proceed to any further business with his Excellency Lieutenant Governor Eyre, for the reasons set forth in the foregoing Resolutions."

In bringing the subject before their Lordships he did not mean to express any opinion as to who was right and who was wrong, but he could assure their Lordships that the Government and affairs of Jamaica had arrived at a dead lock. There were no less than twelve Acts of the Colonial Parliament which would expire in the course of the present year, and there was no intention on the part of the Assembly to renew them, although some of that number related to the audit of the public accounts, the militia, the new Import Duties, the Stamp Act, and many important subjects. He knew that it was always invidious to speak of absent persons, and his purpose in rising was not so much to make any complaint about an absent and meritorious servant of the Crown as to urge upon the House the fact that something was due to the Assembly and Colonists of Jamaica. Nor was it his intention to cast any reflection upon the noble Duke the late Secretary of the Colonies (the Duke of Newcastle), whom he believed to have been most conscientious and painstaking in the performance of his duties. Until the arrival of Governor Darling in the Island, things had gone on very smoothly; but the Governor, contrary to the counsel of his official advisers, had determined to introduce party or responsible Government. His official advisers knew that the elements for such a Government did not exist in the Island, and they consequently resigned. That circumstance might be considered as the commencement of the disagreements which had arisen between the Governor and the Colonists. The Governor did not get on well either with the Colonial Secretary or the Assembly, and he came home. On his return to this country, Her Majesty's Government thought fit to reward him with the highest colonial appointment in the hands of the Crown—they appointed him Governor of Victoria, and this act was regarded by the people of Jamaica as a slight upon themselves. The care of the Island was intrusted to a Lieutenant Governor. During his tenure of office the construction of a tramway between Spanish Town and Porus was determined on, and this undertaking, if properly carried out, would have been of great public benefit. The financial guardian of the colony was naturally the island engineer, whose duty it was, therefore, to see that the work was honestly performed. Instead of doing so, he himself and another person became the contractors for the work. He was tried before the Privy Council for this job, and dismissed from his office; and this circumstance had brought not only upon the contractors, but all connected with the matter, to say the least, a great deal of unpopularity. This job could have been prevented by the Lieutenant Governor, as the ex officio Chairman of the Board of Main Roads, and it was his duty to have done so. In spite, however, of representations made to him upon the subject, he neglected to take any precautions, and he did not even attend a single meeting of the Board. The Assembly exhibiting symptoms of an unruly spirit, the Governor entered into correspondence upon the subject with the Colonial Office, and it was proposed that the power of the Lieutenant Governor should be increased. With that view, a most extraordinary step was taken, and it was announced that all members of the Assembly who held office under the Crown would be required to vote with the Government. It happened that there were two gentlemen having seats in the Assembly who held offices under the Government. One of them, Mr. Espeut, a district official assignee of the Insolvent Court, was informed that he must either resign his seat or vote with the Government. That gentleman was not convinced that if he declined to take either of the courses which were suggested to him, the Government had power to dismiss him from his office, or to remove him except for misconduct, and in that view he was supported by the opinion of counsel. In consequence of the differences that had arisen between the Lieutenant Governor and the Assembly, all legislative business was suspended. It had been declared that the Government intended to suspend the Constitution, but whatever course might be intended to be taken it was desirable that the least irritating and unpopular should be adopted. He did not intend to make any charge against Governor Darling, who was an experienced and valuable public servant, but he did not consider that he was the right man for an office which had been filled in past times with great ability and success by such men as the late Marquess of Normanby, Lord Elgin, and Lord Metcalfe. He hoped that some official person would be sent out to inquire into the grievances alleged by the Jamaica Assembly.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he had already informed the noble Lord that there would be no objection on the part of the Crown to give the Returns for which he had moved, if he would consent after the word "copy" to the addition of the words "or Extracts." There might be some parts of the despatches which ought not to be produced.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he desired to take that opportunity of bearing testimony to the great ability, spirit, and discretion with which the late Marquess of Normanby had in the most difficult circumstances performed the duties of Governor of Jamaica. To his skill, courage, and discretion in a great degree was owing the success of the great measure of negro emancipation.

Motion amended, by inserting the words "or Extracts;" and agreed to.

REGULATION BILL (No. 76).

COMMITTEE.

Order of the day for the House to be put into Committee read.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: My Lords, I had hoped I should have been saved the necessity of troubling your Lordships at any length on this Bill, but having heard that some objections are entertained to its provisions, I feel it to be my duty to state the principles of the existing law, the necessity for it, and the provisions I consider necessary for carrying that law more effectually into operation. The Bill which I have laid on the table does not contain any new principle. It contains only provisions to give effect to the law already existing. In 1840 a Committee was appointed by this House, out of which came a Bill which prohibited the system of climbing boys altogether; and if that law had been observed there would have been no necessity for the present Bill. In 1853 I introduced a Bill for the purpose of rendering the previous Bill more operative. The Bill was referred to a Select Committee upstairs, and although we examined thirteen witnesses, every one of whom bore testimony to the necessity of the law, and to the necessity for strengthening it, yet the Bill was not allowed to proceed any further, the Committee simply declaring that it was not expedient. Now, both these Bills—the Bills and the evidence before the Committee—set forth in the clearest manner the enormity of the system and the great degradation and cruelty inflicted on children engaged under it. They also set forth the sufficiency of the remedy and the entire safety of it. In 1862 a Commission was appointed to inquire into the various trades in which children were engaged. The Commission, amongst many other matters, took evidence on the state of climbing boys, which confirmed everything that had gone before, only that the evils were greater in amount and intensity than existed in former times. It is the evidence that was then adduced I am now about to bring before your Lordships, in order to show the absolute necessity of the provisions I propose;—and let me say that, revolting and disgusting as the evidence in the Report is, the facts stated in the Appendix are ten times more so. To give your Lordships a picture of the entire system I will first state the age at which these children are generally forced into this work. The concurrent testimony of all is that the usual age is from 6 to 8; but there are many instances of 5, and even 4½ years. The hours of working in the smaller towns are 8 and 9, in the larger towns 12 to 16; and for the greater part the work begins at 4, 3, and even 2 o'clock in the morning. This shows the cruelty of the system as affecting children of such tender years and such delicate frames engaged in this disgusting and revolting employment. Sixty-three witnesses were examined by the Commissioners. They came from all parts of England, and thirty-three of them were master sweeps. Let me give your Lordships some examples of the evidence they adduced to show the extreme cruelty of the system and the abominations to which these poor children are subjected. The first evidence I shall quote comes from a master sweep in Nottingham—Mr. Ruff; and his testimony may be taken, the Commissioners state, and so says Mr. Ruff himself, from great experience, as a very fair sample of what is going on in various parts of the country. He says—

“No one knows the cruelty which a boy has to undergo in learning. The flesh must be hardened. This is done by rubbing it, chiefly on the elbows and knees, with the strongest brine, close by a hot fire. You must stand over them with a cane, or coax them by the promise of a halfpenny, &c., if they will stand a few more rubs. At first they will come back from their work with their arms and knees streaming with blood, and the knees looking as if the caps had been pulled off; then they must be rubbed with brine again.”

This painful description, the Commissioners observe, they would have hesitated to record, but that it was so amply confirmed by the testimony of many practical witnesses from all parts of the country. Mr. Clark, another master sweep, says—

“If, as often happens, a boy is gloomy, or sleepy, or anywise ‘lifty’ [I do not know the meaning of this expression], and you have other jobs on at the same time, though I should be as kind as I could, you must ill-treat him somehow, either with the hand, or brush, or something. It is remembering the cruelty which I have suffered which makes me so strong against boys being employed. I have the marks of it on my body now, and I believe the biggest part of the sweeps in the town have the same; that (showing a deep scar across the bottom of the calf of the leg) was made by a blow from my master with an ash plant—i.e. a young ash tree that is supple and will not break—when I was six years old; it was cut to the bone, which had to be scraped to heal the wound; I have marks of nailed boots, &c. on other parts. It was a common thing with sweeps to speak of 'breaking in a boy.' If he was hard, like a ground road or a stone, they gave it up. The other sweeps and I do not like to think of our children growing up to such a business. I believe that in every respect, except the sleeping department and washing, the condition of the boys is now as bad as ever as to treatment, perhaps worse, as the men who have boys are only the least respectable."

The evidence of Mr. Elton, a chimney sweeper at Basingstoke, is to the same effect. He says—

"Some boys are more awkward and suffer more; but all are scarred and wounded."

James Brown, a journeyman at Winchester, says—

"Some chimneys are rough, and, of course, that skins you on the elbows and back; some put pads on the knees if you are very bad; saltpetre, what they call brine, is the only way of getting over it; I remember very well having that rubbed on every morning and night."

Mr. P. Hall mentions a child not more than seven or eight years old, at Birmingham, who could scarcely walk from sores and bruises received in climbing. But the treatment they receive in the course of their training is not the only hardship these young children have to endure. Let us look at what they have to undergo in the process of their work. They are subjected to cruel usage from their masters, and it is a remarkable fact that all the witnesses concur in stating that it is the most cruel masters who persist in refusing to use the sweeping machines. Many of the children are seriously burnt in consequence of being compelled to ascend the flues on fire, and others are killed or maimed. One case occurred at Ashton-under-Lyne, where a child of seven was burnt badly, and at Preston a boy was severely flogged by his master for refusing to go a second time into a hot boiler flue. Mr. Michael Brown, coroner for the borough of Nottingham, states that he held two inquests on climbing boys; in one case the fire was burning, and something was put over the still hot fireplace to enable the boy to rest his feet on at starting. In this case Mr. Brown attributed the death partly to the air in the chimney not being fit for breathing. A hole was broken in the wall to get the boy out. In the other case the master had lit straw under the chimney to bring the boy down, as it was supposed he was asleep, when in reality he was dead. Even within the last two years (the Commissioners say) a child lost his life in the West End of London having "stuck" in the chimney. According to Mr. Peacock, of Burslem, Mr. Herries of Leicester has collected twenty-three cases of boys who have been killed in chimneys by being stifled since the Act of 1840 was passed. I am sorry to detain your Lordships with these details, but it is essentially necessary that I should give you the authority on which I make these statements; and I beg of you to recollect for whom I am now pleading. Mr. Richard Stansfield, a master sweep at Manchester, says—

"Why, I myself have kept a lad four hours up a chimney, when he was so sore that he could scarcely move; but I wouldn't let him come down till he had finished; it has often made my heart ache to hear them wail, even when I was what you may call a party to it. In learning a child you can't be soft with him—you must use violence. I shudder now when I think of it. I have gone to bed with my knee and elbow scabbed and raw, and the inside of my thighs all scarified; we slept five and six boys together in a sort of cellar with the soot bags over us, stoking in the wound sometimes; that and some straw were all our bed and bedclothes; they were the same bags we had used in the day, wet or dry."

Some are burnt, some suffocated, some tortured and half killed, or quite killed, when stuck in a chimney, by the very means used to extricate them. Some are drawn out at the top and some at the bottom of the chimney, and a case is mentioned by Mr. Ruff of Nottingham, in which a boy was smothered in a chimney there; and the doctor (he added) who opened his body (naming him) said that they had pulled the boy's heart and liver all out of place in dragging him down. So much for their hours of work. What for their hours of so-called repose? A large proportion of them are lodged in low, ill-drained, ill-ventilated and noisome cellars. They "sleep black"—that is, they lie unwashed for the whole week, perhaps for many weeks. Hence that most frightful disorder called the chimney sweep's cancer—a disease which I will not seek to describe to your lordships further than to say that, having witnessed it, I have never seen a more terrible form of physical suffering. It almost always proves fatal. I come now to the moral condition of these children. On Sundays, in a great many instances, they are shut up altogether, that their neighbours may not see their miserable plight. The moral and intellectual state of boys so trained and treated must necessarily be degraded to the lowest possible point. Out of 384 boys examined by Mr. P. Hall, that witness says he found "only six who could write, and twenty-six who could read, most of them very imperfectly." "They never go even to Sunday School," says one; "they do not get a chance," says another. There may be an exception here and there; but what more striking estimate could we have of the low, despised, brute condition in which these children are kept, or of how completely they are overlooked and degraded by the community, and regarded as mere pariahs for administering to the wants and comforts of the wealthier classes, than that furnished by the remark of a lady to Mr. Ruff:—

"Formerly," says Mr. Ruff, "the sweeps, as they said themselves, had three washes a year—namely, at Whitsuntide, Goose Fair (October), and Christmas; but now they are quite different. This is owing a great deal, I think, to a rule which we brought about of taking no orders after twelve midday, and washing then. The object of this was to let the boys go to school in the afternoon. At first most did, but they do not now. A lady complained of this to me, because she could not get her chimney done, and said, 'A chimney-sweep, indeed, wanting education! what next?'"

Good Heavens! my Lords, I say that the woman who could speak in that way of a human being with reference to his temporal and eternal interests is a woman who would cut up a child for dogs' meat or for making manure. In the worst days of slavery a more disgusting sentiment, or one more offensive both to God and man, could hardly have been uttered than that implied in this woman's "What next?" There is also a regular traffic in these children. They are constantly bought and sold. Mr. Jones, of the Midland Association, read a paper before a meeting on Social Science, in which he stated that—

"In the country young children are bargained for by their parents and master sweeps; they are bought and sold; and the more tender their age the more valuable they are considered."

Mr. E. S. Ellis, a magistrate of Leicester, says—

"I am satisfied that great numbers of children are bought and sold, and that, practically, they are as much slaves as any negro children in South Carolina."

Mr. Francis Peacock, of Burslem, says—

"I have bought lads myself. I used to give the parents so much a year for them. In Liverpool, where there are lots of bad women, you can get any quantity you want."

This system in the provinces generally, with some exceptions, is very largely on the increase. And here I may pause for a moment to ask your Lordships by what social right or by what law of God you take these children of such tender years, who can have no will of their own, and who derive

no benefit from the trade, because they receive no wages—their clothing does not deserve the name, and their food is of the scantiest character—and compel them to enter upon a career the most filthy and the most degrading, physically and morally, it is possible to conceive. In that career they suffer during all their tenderest years, and when they emerge into manhood—I mean, of course, those of them who survive so long—they find themselves crippled in body and mind, and without knowledge or ability of any kind. Under such circumstances can you wonder that a large proportion of them, when they arrive at manhood, are found either in gaol or upon the gibbet? If when taken possession of they had reached their riper years, and were able to judge for themselves, they might have made their own bargain, and entered upon the career with a full knowledge of what was before them; but I ask you, in the name of God, what right you have to impose upon human beings, as good and as responsible as yourselves, having the same rights, the same hopes, and the same destinies, so degrading, so filthy, and so disgusting an occupation? This is mere wanton cruelty, for, as the evidence proves, it is totally unnecessary. I should have thought that the evidence taken before the Commission of 1840 would have satisfied every one of the efficacy of the machine if properly used. Before the Committee of 1853, when my Bill was on the table, thirteen witnesses deposed to that fact without a single dissentient voice. Even that Committee of 1853, which declared that it was not expedient my Bill should be proceeded with, gave it as their opinion that the machine was capable of doing the work assigned to it, and was even safer than the climbing boys. The present evidence proves the same thing at great length. The universal testimony is that every chimney, however angular or tortuous, can be swept by the machine, provided occasionally that, at a very small expense, apertures called soot-doors are opened at certain places. It is obvious, indeed, that the machine must do the work better than a boy. A boy avoids every hole and corner he can, and gets through the business as speedily as possible, whereas the machine goes into every nook and does the work thoroughly and well. But the masters do not like the machine, because it imposes upon them a certain amount of labour, whereas, under the climbing system, the poor boy has to go through all the toil. In this metropolis itself you have two remarkable instances of the efficacy of the machine—in the Athenæum and the Bank of England. The chimney of the Bank of England is a most peculiar structure; it has six different angles, and yet it is swept effectually by the machine. So also with the chimney of the Athenæum. But I am now speaking after an experience of twenty-one years, and I have further proofs to submit to your Lordships. The climbing system has been suppressed altogether in Edinburgh for thirty years by the action of by-laws, and it has also been totally suppressed in Glasgow. In Bath, with its thousands of tall chimneys, it is extinct, and it no longer exists in the town of Leicester or in the Potteries. There is an enormous population among whom it has been suppressed without any injurious consequences whatever; but I have a stronger proof still. In this huge metropolis the machine has been used for twenty-one years. The Commissioners say—

“As the experience of London is so important in the solution of this question, the number of houses being about one-tenth of those in England and Wales, it appears desirable briefly to explain the facts of this case. According to the census of 1861 the total number of houses in the metropolis was 379,222, and in 1861 it was 327,391, thus showing an annual increase in the number of houses of 5,183. Allowing on an average six chimneys to a house, the total number of chimneys may be estimated at 2,375,332, all of which, with some few exceptions, are swept by the machine.”

Is it necessary to ask for more proof? Everybody in London is satisfied with the work the machine does. But we have also the testimony of the late Mr. Braidwood, Superintendent of the London Fire-engine Establishment, who said that no risk whatever would attend the discontinuance of the use of boys for sweeping chimneys provided where the machine could not sweep them there were doors made by which they could be swept. Captain Shaw, the present Superintendent of the Fire-engine Establishment, was likewise requested to give the result of his experience. The Commissioners say—

“We are indebted to Captain Shaw for a very instructive table, showing the total number of fires from all causes, and the number caused by flues, in each year from 1833 to 1862. From this document it appears that while the total number of fires has increased with the increase of new houses, the proportion of fires caused by flues to the total number has considerably diminished, the average percentage in the ten years previous to the application of the Act (namely, 1833-42) amounted to 11·8, while the average percentage of the twenty years subsequently (1843-62) was only 8·6; the highest percentage in any one year being 15·5—namely, in 1833, and the lowest, 6·4, in 1861. We have received similar information from the surveyors of some of the principal London Assurance Companies; and we are therefore satisfied that all fears of the increased risk of fire from the abolition of climbing-boys are entirely without foundation.”

That being the state of things, every one being satisfied that the machine could be used with safety, it is desirable to inquire into the causes and modes of the violation of the Act. I am bound to say, at the outset, that the master sweeps are not principally to blame. No doubt there are some who dislike the trouble of the machine, but the vast majority, go where you will, are most anxious to get rid of the climbing system. It is the householders, and especially the great people, who keep it up, declaring that no power on earth would induce them to allow a machine to enter their premises. These are the persons who, in spite of the law, will have children to go up their chimneys. Everywhere you have one and the same testimony. One master says:—

“The use of boys is much encouraged by the fact that many householders will have their chimneys swept by boys instead of machines. I have myself lost a good deal of custom which I should otherwise have, and some which I formerly had, at large houses and public establishments, because I will not use boys. That reason was not given, but I was not employed after I refused. I have been sent away even from magistrates' houses, and in some cases even by ladies, who have professed to pity the boys, for refusing to use them.”

Many householders refuse to alter their flues, or to incur the smallest expense for putting in soot doors, and persist in setting the law at defiance. The whole burden of the evidence of the Committee of 1853 and of this Commission goes to prove the determination of the magistrates, with some exceptions, not to carry the law into effect. They may not go the length of saying that they will not convict, although it is reported they have done even that in some instances; but they take good care to prevent convictions by demanding evidence of such a kind that it is next to impossible it should be produced, and dismissing cases with rebuke and even insult to the prosecutors. Even where there is a grave charge, it is too often treated with lightness, and acquittals are granted in the face of the most conclusive testimony the other way. Thus it happens that of the hundreds of cases which are annually brought before the magistrates, only a small percentage result in convictions. Then, again, we have also, I think, reason to complain of the builders of houses. By a section of the Act of 1840, it was ordered that flues should be constructed in such a manner that machinery could be used, and the services of climbing boys dispensed with. As far as we can learn, however, the builders have pertinaciously refused to obey that provision of the Statute. Scarcely any chimneys have been constructed as directed, and the consequence is that this pretext still remains for the employment of climbers. One builder, indeed, Mr. Cubitt, of Belgravia, deserves to be mentioned as a noble exception, for he strictly carried out the Act, and built all his chimneys in such a way that the occupants of the houses to which they are attached never think of sending up boys, for they know the work can be done more speedily, effectually, and conveniently by machinery. Not only, my Lords, is this a matter of very serious importance, involving the temporal, and I may say the eternal, condition of these youths; but it is one that really concerns the political character of the country. These things of which I have been speaking are done, in the main, for the use and comfort of the wealthier classes, and you may depend upon it that a rankling feeling is kept up in the mind of the people by the thought of a system which is a scandal to a civilized country. If your Lordships reject the proposal I have now the honour to submit, you will be perpetrating a system more cruel and disgraceful than almost anything I know of—a system which, however it may be connived at, and however it may be palliated, cannot be justified—a system which day by day and week by week leads persons of all conditions to violate the law and outrage their sense of humanity. Your Lordships must remember that I am not seeking to establish any new principle. I am asking only for the means of giving effect to a principle which has already been affirmed, and which is quite in accordance with the spirit of modern legislation, in alleviating toil and suffering. I well recollect how, when I was engaged in carrying my measure of factory reform, the most terrible predictions were uttered as to the ruin alike of employers, parents, and children which must befall them. Now I hear nothing but praise on all sides; and I cannot express the joy I felt when a master manufacturer said to me, "I opposed you tooth and nail as long as I could; but now the law is passed, take my advice, for God's sake, and do not part with a hair's breadth of it, for it is a measure which must do great good to the people, and can do no harm to the employers." I appeal to you now on behalf of another class of weak and suffering humanity. I ask you to protect, not adults, who can take care of themselves, but the helpless young, many of them orphans, and some the offspring of cruel and unnatural parents. The other evening your Lordships were engaged in discussing the intellectual progress of the children of the upper classes—a very right and proper subject of debate. But now you have to consider whether a small and humble ray of light shall be allowed to fall on the children of the poorest and most unhappy in the land. I pray you, my Lords, not to reject this Bill. I entreat you to show your goodness and consideration for these unfortunate children by granting them the repose, leisure, and opportunity necessary to enable them by the blessing of God to acquire such secular learning as may give them the possibility of a life of industry, honesty, and comfort in this world, and above all to attain that religious knowledge which alone can make a man wise and just.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill."

LORD REDESDALE said, he doubted whether some of the provisions of the Bill were absolutely necessary or desirable. Clause 9, for instance, provided that any constable or other peace officer might "Take into custody, without warrant, any chimney-sweeper believed by such constable or officers to be committing any such offence as aforesaid, within the view of such constable or officer; and might secure him until he could be brought before the justices, or be bailed."

A chimney sweep was not a vagrant, he was always known, and if he had committed an offence, surely he might be apprehended on a warrant. Again, by Clause 10, a constable might detain

"Any person apparently under the age of sixteen years or of ten years (as the case may be), who is caused or allowed to enter a house," in contravention of the Bill. Surely this was going rather further than was necessary.

Motion agreed to : House in Committee accordingly.

Clauses 1 to 5 agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 6 (Restriction on Employment of Children under Ten).

THE MARQUESS OF BATH pointed out that under the Bill a master chimney-sweep would be liable to penalties if even he employed a child to drive the donkey-cart in which he carried his soot.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 (Chimney Sweeper entering House to sweep Chimney, &c., not to bring with him Person under Sixteen).

LORD PORTMAN said, he thought the clause too stringent.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, if the boys were allowed to go into the house with their masters, the offence would certainly be committed. The clause was stringent, but the only way of preventing this intolerable abuse was by interdicting boys from entering the house on any pretence whatever.

LORD CRANWORTH proposed to leave out the words "or for extinguishing fire in any such chimney or flue." Every facility should be given to extinguish fires, and it might happen that the only person at hand was a boy under sixteen.

EARL GREY said, the great cruelty complained of was that of forcing boys to go up chimneys which were on fire.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 (Penalties for these Offences).

EARL GREY moved to add the words—

"If any occupier of a house shall knowingly allow any person under sixteen years of age to be sent up a chimney in the house he occupies, he shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £10.

LORD PORTMAN said, it would not be right to subject householders to such a penalty; at all events, he objected to the Amendment being considered without notice.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, it was only proposed to punish the particeps criminis. Of course there must be some proof to satisfy a magistrate that the occupier had knowingly allowed an infraction of the Act.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH opposed the Amendment upon the ground that the occupier of a house could not tell whether a boy were under sixteen, though his master might know it perfectly well.

EARL GREY said, this objection might show the difficulty of convicting the occupier, but it did not show that the occupier who knowingly allowed the offence to be committed was not equally liable with the master-sweep.

Amendment withdrawn: Clause agreed to.

Clause 9 (Power for Constable to arrest Offender), and Clause 10 (Power for Constable to detain Person employed) struck out.

Clause 12 (Burden of Proof of Age to lie on Chimney Sweeper).

THE MARQUESS OF BATH desired an explanation.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, that the provision was inserted, because to necessitate the production of proof on the part of the prosecutor would be to insure a constant failure of justice. The defendant always had the opportunity of ascertaining the child's age from the register when he engaged him; but it would be impossible for the prosecutor to do the same, because a boy might have been born in Dublin, and might be employed at the Land's End.

Clause agreed to.

The Report of the Amendment to be received on Thursday next, and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 112.)

Preamble agreed to, with an Amendment: and Title amended by striking out the words "and Chimneys."

House adjourned at a quarter past Seven o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Standing Order (No. 142) read.

LORD STANLEY said, he rose to move that the Standing Order, which limited the owning or using by Railway Companies of steam-vessels, harbours, and docks, be repealed. By that order Railway Companies were prohibited from holding the description of property to which it referred, except on special grounds and in special cases, of which the Select Committee on the particular private Bill was to be practically the sole judge, being however required to make a Report to the House of the reasons on which it acted. When the order was agreed to by the House there might have been good grounds for passing it, inasmuch as Railway Companies possessed what was then the exceptional privilege of limited liability, which Shipping Companies and private owners had not: that state of things had passed away with the change in the law. It had been thought, too, that the rule would be acted upon, and that the exceptions would only be few in number; but during the last seven or eight years the exceptions had been more frequent than the cases in which the rule was observed. Many thought that what he proposed was to grant to Railway Companies power to hold this description of property without Parliamentary sanction; but it was not so. All the change he proposed was this—that the question, whether they should hold it or not, should go to the Committee upstairs unfettered by any previous declaration or rule of the House. In the early part of the present Session a Committee was appointed to look into the matter; and the Resolution which he submitted to the House was an embodiment of that Committee's Report. As the Standing Order related to little else than the prohibition, he believed the simplest course would be to repeal the whole of that order. The question really was whether Parliament should protect private owners against the superior wealth of Railway Companies. He did not see that it was their duty to do so. It might as well protect a private owner against a Ship Company, or a small Ship Company against a great Navigation Company. But it would not pay Railway Companies to interfere with the business of Ship Companies. No one could suppose that a Railway Company would think of putting on a line of steamers between Liverpool and New York, or between any English port and a port in the Mediterranean. The only kind of sea traffic into which they were likely to enter was that of conveying goods and passengers across a short sea, situated between two long continuous lines of land transit. They embarked in that sort of sea traffic in order to obtain greater facilities for through booking. But it was said that a Railway Company might obtain a monopoly as against a Ship Company by one of two means—either by refusing facilities, or by running steamers at a loss. At the present day the contest could hardly be one between a Ship Company and one Railway Company. Ten years ago it might have been, but now there was no important centre of trade in England which was not in possession of at least two Railway Companies. If there was, he could answer for it that it would not be in that position much longer. Besides, the refusal of facilities was a matter with which Parliament could deal. It was not a thing which could be carried on privately. As for running steamers at a loss, any capitalist who wished to put down a competitor, and was willing to sustain a temporary loss in so doing, could do that already; but it would not be done, because the moment a monopolist attempted to profit by a monopoly obtained in that way, he was met by a new competitor. He could only make up for loss previously incurred by imposing high rates, and the moment he did so, he lost his monopoly. He believed that no injustice would be done by his proposition, and as he thought the Standing Order was not in accordance with sound principles of political economy, he begged to move its repeal.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Standing Order be repealed."—(Lord Stanley.)

MR. BARROW said, he was afraid that the small interest the claims of which he was desirous of advocating was very much in the position of the little kingdom of Denmark in the grasp of Austria and Prussia. The monopoly of railways was becoming something gigantic, and no doubt the influence they possessed in that House was a great advantage to railway proprietors. Having had something to do with the drawing up of the Standing Order, he was very unwilling to see it repealed. The object of this Standing Order was to prevent the large capitals overpowering the small capitals, and to preserve to the public that competition which was necessary to secure them due accommodation. As matters stood at present, if a Committee before whom a Railway Company made application for powers, should report to the House that the Company was entitled to them, the House had opportunities to decide whether those powers should be conceded; but if the Order should be annulled there would then be no appeal. The application for the repeal of the Standing Order he believed proceeded from the extravagant ambition of railway directors, and he also objected to the proposal on the ground that it would give Railway Companies power to employ their capital for purposes different from those for which it was subscribed. He felt very strongly on the subject, and should certainly oppose the Motion.

Mr. CLAY said, he could not agree with the noble Lord that the practical effect of the repeal of the Standing Order would be very small; for, under a very modest title, he believed the House had rarely had to discuss a matter of greater national importance. The Standing Order imposed no prohibition on Railway Companies obtaining these powers; it simply threw on them the onus of proving a case of public convenience, and wherever such a case was made out those powers were ordinarily granted under this Standing Order. If he felt certain that its repeal would do nothing more than it professed to do, he should have no fear of it; but he was afraid it would be taken as an invitation to Railway Companies to ask for these powers, and as an injunction to Committees to grant them. At least it threw on the shipowners interest the onus of proving that they ought not to be granted, instead of leaving it to Railway Companies to prove the necessity of them. The world was very much governed by phrases, and he believed that the noble Lord, and opinion generally, had been very much influenced by a phrase in a Report of the Board of Trade, to the effect that it was difficult to see how the great principle of competition could be advanced by the exclusion from competition of the largest capitals in the country. Yet this was easily seen. The railways, by their command of the land traffic, their power of juggling with fares, and their ownership, in many cases, of docks, piers, &c., had the power of placing obstacles so insurmountable in the way of their rivals, as to make competition practically impossible, and to create a monopoly for themselves. If it could be shown that public convenience required it, he was perfectly willing that the proposed change should take place. He would, however, defy any one who looked through the evidence which had been taken before the Committee to arrive at the conclusion that by giving to the Railway Companies increased powers that object would be attained. So far as he could understand, there were only two cases of public convenience which could be made out for acceding to the repeal of this Order. One was, where there was a large passenger traffic such as that between Dover, Folkestone, and Boulogne and Calais, Brighton and Dieppe, Southampton and Havre, and Kingstown and Holyhead, as to the last of which, although a Railway Company had the power now sought for it had never been exercised. The traffic between the places he had mentioned was carried on by independent Companies; and the other case was where, owing to some unusual state of things, as in the traffic between Harwich and Rotterdam, a special power was given to a Railway Company because the shipping interest had not supplied the accommodation which the public required. Some absurd and well-worn stories, repeated to half-a-dozen Committees of the House, had been told of the inconvenience caused by separate management; but all this evil was to be remedied by a system of through booking. On the other hand, he would ask whether hon. Members had never heard of inconvenience inflicted on the public by the Railway Companies themselves? Had they never heard of trains which took passengers booked for a particular place further than they wanted, and allowed them to get back again in the best way they could? It would be as unfair to use these instances as arguments against railways, as it was to quote the former exceptional cases against the shipping interest. And no case of public inconvenience having been made out, was it, he should wish to know, right to inflict on the shipping interest of the country a blow so great as that which was now levelled at them? Let the business in question be taken away from them, and one of the most paying portions of their trade would be destroyed. He thought that the repeal of the Standing Order would be taken as a distinct intimation that these powers should be granted to Railway Companies whenever they were asked, and they ought to be careful how they enlarged the great powers possessed by the large Railway Companies. In many parts of the country they influenced Parliamentary elections, and the House of Commons contained many Members returned by the Railway interest and the Railway interest alone. Several years ago, when the East India Company had about as many seats in Parliament as the Railway interest had then, the circumstance was complained of as a great abuse; and he, at all events, was opposed to giving increased powers to these companies, to the prejudice of the shipowners of the country.

MR. RICHARD HODGSON said, that if he apprehended that the removal of the Standing Order would injure the shipping interests, he would be one of the last to advocate the Motion of the noble Lord. So far as his experience went, he might add that Railway Companies were not anxious, under any circumstances, to obtain these powers to work steamboats if any other body of shipowners would conduct the necessary traffic to their satisfaction. His objection to the Standing Order was that it threw the onus of proof on the wrong party—upon those who brought forward the measure, instead of upon those who opposed it. While he wished the Standing Order to be expunged, he thought that whenever Railway Companies were about to ask powers to run steamboats the matter should be brought before the shareholders in the same way as extensions were dealt with. He thought the House should impose such restrictions as would ensure equality of treatment to persons on both sides of the passage. He should support the Motion of the noble Lord.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, that the hon. Member for Tynemouth had given a very good reason why the House should not assent to the Motion. He told the House that Railway Companies were not particularly anxious to possess steamboat powers. They would as a rule only ask for them in cases in which they could induce no one to perform the sea service from their ports; but in such cases as that Companies might obtain these powers under the Order as it stood. If any Railway Company came before a Committee and gave good reasons why the powers should be granted, the restriction would be removed. It was only last year that three Railway Companies came before the Committee for these steamboat powers, and they were granted to them on the ground that it was wholly unlikely that any private Companies would perform the service. The hon. Gentleman had also recommended the House to agree to the Motion because Railway Companies were now doing that which was illegal. He hoped that the House would not give any weight to such reason. The Committee, for the Members of which, especially the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn, who presided, he had great respect, were by no means unanimous in their recommendations, inasmuch as six members voted for the Report and four against it. They were entirely wrong when they represented that the main arguments which were employed against the proposition were that Railway Companies had the advantage of limited liability, and that they had a greater capital than was possessed by steamboat owners. He never heard any such arguments used in that House, nor were they employed by the witnesses who were examined before the Committee. The real argument, one with which the Committee had not dealt, was that a Railway Company which also had steamboats had, by virtue of its monopoly of the road, such a control of the traffic both in passengers and goods, that it could put it all into its own steamboats and prevent any portion of it going into the boats of an independent trader. His noble Friend said that he had heard evidence which satisfied him that the possession of these powers by Railway Companies would not injure private steamboat owners. That was a point which was easily settled. Of the four witnesses who gave evidence in favour of conferring these powers upon Railway Companies three were railway officials—secretaries or traffic managers—Mr. Forbes, of the London, and Chatham, and Dover; the manager of the Midland, and Mr. Eborall, the manager of the South Eastern. The fourth was an independent witness—Mr. Booth, the secretary of the Board of Trade. Mr. Booth admitted that if a Railway Company ran steamboats it would be able to drive, and probably would drive, every other company or owner of steamboats off the sea; but he said that he thought that the public convenience would thereby be promoted. When asked for an instance in which the public interest had been served by such a result, he referred to the case of the possession of the Holyhead steamers by the London and North Western Railway Company; but being, of course, at once reminded by a member of the Committee that those boats belonged, not to the London and North Western Company, but to the City of Dublin Steam-packet Company, he said that he had not looked into the matter and he was not aware of that fact. How did the Committee deal with that grave question, the really serious one in the case? They said that there would not be such a monopoly as was supposed, because there were very few towns to which there was only one railway; that if Railway Companies ran steamers at a loss for a certain time, the loss and inconvenience which would result to individuals was only an incident of unrestricted competition, and they suggested that security might be provided against the abuse of these powers by provisions that the fares should not exceed a certain amount, and that the Railway Companies should give facilities to traffic not intended for their own steamboats. There were, however, many ports to which there was only one railway, and even where there were two they would soon come to an arrangement between themselves as to the charge for and direction of the traffic; the word "competition" was entirely inapplicable to a contest between a private individual and a Railway Company, which could direct every single item of traffic to its own boats, and prevent any of it going to its rivals; and the suggested restrictions and provisions as to facilities would be wholly inoperative. And as to the passenger fares it was not high fares that the House was apprehensive of, as Parliament had already taken precautions to prevent that; and Railway Companies had the right of distributing the amount of their fares over the whole journey. It might therefore happen, that while their fares by sea were extremely low they made up the difference by increasing them on the railway part of the journey. In that way they might render it impossible for individual enterprise to compete with them by sea, while at the same time they re-imburged themselves for any loss they sustained in that direction by increased fares in the other direction. The chambers of commerce, town councils, or corporations of almost every town in England and Ireland had petitioned against the alteration of this Standing Order, and he trusted that the House would maintain it in its present form, and require all Railway Companies who asked for steamboat powers to show good reasons why they should be exempted.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the position in which the House was placed was this. Last year considerable complaint was made by hon. Members representing shipping constituencies, that the practice of Parliament, and the spirit of the Standing Order in reference to the question whether Railway Companies were to be owners of steamboats or not, did not accord. In consequence of that complaint a Select Committee was appointed to inquire into the question. The noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) was appointed Chairman of that Committee, and, after hearing evidence, they made a Report recommending the House to repeal the Standing Order. They were now asked to disregard that recommendation, and to leave the matter precisely as it was before the complaints were made. If they did nothing, as the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir Hugh Cairns) recommended, they would still be in this position—that their practice would be one way and their declared policy another. Since the year 1848 they had frequently granted to Railway Companies the powers in question. [SIR HUGH CAIRNS: And they had sometimes refused them.] Sometimes they had refused them. What the noble Lord proposed was that the Committee should be left to deal with parties asking for those powers according to the merits of their proposals. He did not ask the House to declare that in every case a Railway Company that came to Parliament seeking steamboat powers should have them. Nothing of the kind. What he said was this—Do not put any restrictions upon Committees; leave them to decide whether a case had been made out for granting the powers. Seeing that the Standing Order tended to mislead, the noble Lord asked them to repeal what seemed to give a direction to Committees which was not followed, leaving the matter to the free decision of the Committees, who could certainly decide whether it was for the public advantage or not that a particular Railway Company should have steamboat powers. He, for one, therefore, thought the noble Lord was right in his proposal. It must be remembered that if a Railway Company had a steam communication under its control it offered the public very great advantages. It gave the passengers the advantage of an undivided management from the commencement of their journey to the end, whether by land or by sea; and he contended that a person going from London to Paris, or to any port on the Continent, was in a better position if he were carried under such circumstances than if he had to pass through the hands of several Companies. If it were true that the independent steamboat was driven off the line by the steamboat of the Railway Company, it would be only driven away because greater advantages were offered by the latter. He did not see what there was to prevent competition between independent steamboat Companies and Railway Companies. The Railway Companies could be prevented from giving preferences over their own line, and could also be prevented having fares unduly high. If they were to incur the risk of monopoly, it should be recollected that steam navigation Companies could establish a monopoly as well as Railway Companies. But steamboat Companies could charge their passengers what they pleased, whereas Railway Companies were restricted by their Acts in respect to their fares. Under these circumstances, he should give his support to the proposition of the noble Lord.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, if he had not been a member of the Committee in question he should not have troubled the House with any observations after the able speech of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast; but he could not allow the President of the Board of Trade to impress the House with the notion that the Committee were unanimous upon the question. The Committee had had a division, and although the opinion of the noble Lord had always great weight, nevertheless four members of that Committee differed from him upon the matter. The balance of evidence was in his (Sir James Fergusson's) judgment quite the other way—that being four witnesses in favour of the proposed change and nine against it. The main point to consider was whether the Standing Order did shut the door against the proposition, inasmuch as it gave the Committee authority to grant the powers asked for in case necessity was shown for the exemption of the particular company from the Standing Orders. There were several instances in which those steamboat powers were refused on the ground that no case had been made out to show that the public would reap advantage from the conferring of those powers upon Railway Companies.

MR. HORSFALL said, he was anxious that the House should not be led away by the observations made by the President of the Board of Trade when he said that the practice of the House was different from its Standing Order. The Standing Order gave the Committee full authority to exempt a Railway Company from its operation if they made out a satisfactory case showing the public necessity of granting these steamboat powers. But the noble Lord now proposed to take away from Committees those powers which they possessed, and to throw upon the public the onus of showing that the powers were not required, instead of leaving Railway Companies under the obligation of showing that they were required. Now, what was everybody's business was nobody's business. The Railway Companies might, in that way, get the powers as often as they were asked for, even though the granting of them might prove detrimental to the public interests.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he wished to remind the House that every member of a Committee before whom a case of this kind came, had to declare that he was neither directly nor indirectly concerned in the matter, and that he would give his verdict fairly; but when the question was brought before that House, as they found by their experience of last year, there was a mercantile bias operating to induce their decision upon the point whether those powers should or should not be granted. When the Company with which he was connected applied for steamboat powers they first asked the Steam Navigation Company whether they would place steamboats upon the proposed line of communication, but they refused to do so. Even after they had obtained those powers they gave the Steam Navigation Company the option of placing their boats upon the station, when they again declined to do so. They subsequently informed the Steam Navigation Company, that if they sent into their harbours any boats they should have the same facilities and rights as the railway vessels possessed. He hoped that the House would not allow any mercantile feeling to influence their decision in the consideration of this question.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, the hon. and gallant Member who had just sat down was the last person who should have objected to these powers being given. The Bill he introduced was referred back to the Committee, and they unanimously decided that the Railway Company might have these boats, and they had the power of running steamboats.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, nothing could be fairer or more clear than the statement of the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn. If the matter was really as he had put it he should have supported the noble Lord, but he did not look at it in the same light as the noble Lord. That was only one of a great number of Standing Orders which the House had adopted for the purpose of taking care that the reasons which had influenced the decision of the Committee on particular subjects which the House considered of great importance, should be especially reported to them. The very next order was one which negatived the power of the Committee to sanction a railway crossing on the level, unless it reported its reasons to the House for so doing. It was quite clear from the interest taken in the matter, that the subject was of too great importance to be lightly dealt with by the House, and without expressing an opinion upon the particular question as to whether Railway Companies should have steamboat powers, and having to a certain extent the charge of the Standing Orders of the House, he ventured to suggest that the House should not part with the power of enforcing on Committees the duty of giving the reasons on which they recommended legislation on certain points.

TREATMENT OF THE BRITISH CONSUL IN ABYSSINIA.—QUESTION.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What information Her Majesty's Government has received relating to the ill-treatment of Missionaries in Abyssinia, and the imprisonment of Her Majesty's Consul there by King Theodoros; and what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken in consequence?

MR. LAYARD, in reply, said, Her Majesty's Government had received indirect information that the King of Abyssinia had placed in confinement Her Majesty's Consul and several Missionaries established there, and also the French Consul; but according to the last information the French Consul had been released. The information, however, might be very incorrect, as the King took care that no information should leave his country, and the facts were difficult to get at, but Her Majesty's Government would do all in their power to obtain the release of Captain Cameron and the Missionaries. The most natural step would be to send some person there to demand their release, but Her Majesty's Government were rather afraid that he would share the same fate as the Consul and the Missionaries. The question was how to get at the King without endangering the liberty of others. He trusted, however, that means would soon be found of communicating with the King, and the subject was under the serious consideration of the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office.

INDIAN FINANCE.—QUESTION.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, When the Financial Accounts of India, which ought by law to have been laid upon the table of the House last month, will be presented to the House; and whether he will also present the Speech of the Finance Minister of India along with the Accounts; and when he intends to bring forward the Indian Budget?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he laid the financial accounts on the table about three weeks since—on the 13th of May. [MR. J. B. SMITH: Are they printed?] He did not know, but he laid them on the table at the proper time. They were long and elaborate accounts, and they always took about a month to print. With regard to the Speech of the Finance Minister of India, he could not lay it on the table of the House, any more than he could lay on the table the Speech of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was impossible for him to say, seeing so many Motions that were put down every day on the Motion for going into Supply—it was impossible for the Government to say—when the Estimates would be finished, and, until they had been voted, or were nearly completed, he could not name a day for bringing on the Indian Budget.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he has any notion when the Accounts will be laid on the table?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he had already answered that question. He had already stated they were laid on the table three weeks ago.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he wished to know when they would be in the hands of hon. Members, and whether the right hon. Baronet has given orders for their being printed?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the hon. Member must be aware that this was a point over which he had no sort of authority. All he could do was to lay the papers on the table of the House, and move that they be printed. That had been done, and they were in the hands of the printer, but as he was neither the printer nor the printer's master he could not say when they would be ready.

AFFAIRS OF THE IONIAN ISLANDS.

QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he wished to put a Question to the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs with regard to an extraordinary statement which has appeared in the daily papers—whether it is correct that

“The British Consulates have been informed that, in compliance with the wish of Greece, England will extend her protection over the Ionian inhabitants in their relations with the Turkish authorities for another year;”

and, if so, whether he will lay on the table a Copy of the Despatch in which the Greek Government ask for that favour, and the Reply thereto?

MR. LAYARD said, in reply, that the paragraph which the hon. Member had read was not strictly correct. As the hon. Gentleman was aware, there were in the East Consular Courts which had hitherto dealt with cases arising amongst Ionians. Many of these cases were still in litigation; in some the terms of imprisonment had not yet elapsed, and in others judgment had been given, but execution had not been carried out. All the Government had done was to signify its readiness, if the Turkish and Greek Governments should agree, to extend their protection; or, as the case might be, to carry out the judgments in the case of Ionians, so as to avoid the great inconvenience that otherwise might arise in suits that were pending. There was no general protection extended to Ionians for any specified period. He did not think there would be any objection to the production of the despatch; but if his hon. Friend would move for it he would see if it could be given.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.—RESOLUTION.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he rose to move the Resolution of which he had given notice, with respect to the recommendation of the Royal Commission of 1860, confirmed by the Report of Sir Richard

Bromley, one of the present Commissioners, and by the letter of Admiral Sir James Gordon, the Governor of Greenwich Hospital, that the present system of double government be abolished. It had been long acknowledged by every one capable of forming an opinion, that the existing system of government of Greenwich Hospital ought to be remodelled. In the first year of the present Parliament the late Sir Charles Napier called attention to the condition of the Hospital, and in consequence a Royal Commission was appointed in 1859 to inquire into its management. That Commission sat for six months, and was attended, he believed, on every occasion by all its Members; it was presided over by the Vice President of the Board of Control, and the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Ingham) and himself were the other Members. The Commission reported in May, 1860. They found that that great institution, which had been founded for the support of aged and disabled seamen, their wives, widows, and children, was no longer popular among the seamen of the navy, and that the wives and widows were totally neglected. They also found that the Hospital, which was calculated to maintain 2,300 pensioners, had at the time of their inquiry only about 1,500 inmates. They found, also, that there were 1,100 seamen in the work-houses of England alone (besides those in Scotland and Ireland of whom they had no return) who were proper objects of this charity. They found further that the cost of the administration for the 1,600 inmates was above £47,000 a year. They found that of the whole £155,000 a year belonging to the Hospital less than a third was spent on the charity. The Royal Commission went carefully into that matter, and they found that without injury to any of the interests which appeared to have been involved in the mismanagement, the administration of the Hospital might be reduced to £26,000 or £27,000 a year. They found that the misgovernment was attributable principally to the existence of a double government establishment in 1829. In that year the civil affairs of the Hospital were confided to certain civil Commissioners, who were called Commissioners of Greenwich Hospital, and the military administration as it was called, the internal management of the Hospital, was confided to a military governor and his subordinates, who generally were naval officers of dis-

tion. After that double government was established, the civil government was filled by the political adherents of the party in power, and that continued to 1842. The consequence was that the funds of the Hospital were diverted to the payment of what must be called political sinecures, and the Commissioners did not interfere with or attend to the management. One civil commissioner, the late Lord Auckland, and the governor, Sir Richard Keates, were on excellent terms with each other, and they contrived to manage the affairs of the Hospital in harmony. In 1842 the late Sir Robert Peel thought it was not proper that the funds of such an institution as Greenwich Hospital should be used for the payment of political sinecures. When vacancies occurred from death, since that date, the post of Commissioner had usually been filled by officers of the navy, appointed in consequence of their services. These Commissioners had attended actively to the affairs of the Hospital, but the Royal Commission found that their management was far from beneficial. It was true that in the management of the property they had exercised a due discretion; but in every relation which they bore to the military governor there had been a clashing of interests, and the quarrels between the two governors had resulted in great injury to the Hospital. He would call the attention of the House to the evidence adduced before the Royal Commission by witnesses whose names carried with them great weight. The late Sir James Graham came before the Royal Commission, and in his evidence stated—

“ I think, upon the whole, a re-construction of the governing body is necessary; I see no necessity for more than one civil Commissioner.”

The right hon. Baronet then stated to the Commissioners facts in support of his view, that the existing system was a most disadvantageous one, and he added—

“ I should say the Governor for the time being should be chairman of the Commission.”

Sir John Liddell, who for many years had been the principal medical officer of the establishment, and owing to whose exertions many ameliorations had taken place in the condition of the pensioners, was asked this question—

“ Do you think that the Governor might with advantage be united to the Commissioners ?”

And he answered—

“ Yes; I think it would put an end to all those differences if he was chairman of the board.”

In fact, the whole of the evidence taken by the Commissioners went to show the great disadvantage of the double government. As he had said, the Royal Commission presented their Report in 1860; and it was then believed that the Admiralty approved of the suggestions it contained, and were prepared to carry them out. His noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty stated in March, 1861, what all the world knew, that the government of Greenwich Hospital was extremely defective; and in the same year the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty, in another place, on introducing a Bill for abolishing the double government, and carrying out other recommendations of the Royal Commission, made a similar declaration. For some reason or other that Bill was withdrawn, and from that day no steps had been taken by the Admiralty to alter the system of government of Greenwich Hospital. He must do the Admiralty the justice to say that many of the minor recommendations of the Royal Commission had been carried out to the advantage of the Hospital; but the flagrant evil of the two governments continually clashing together, and costing twice the sum for administration that was necessary, had not been taken in hand by the Admiralty. During the course of last Session, the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) who was then a Lord of the Admiralty, gave the House to understand that he had inquired into the matter, and he gave the assurance that, in consequence, a well known public servant, Sir Richard Bromley, had been appointed Commissioner of the Hospital, with a view of reporting on the Report of the Royal Commission, and of suggesting to the Admiralty what portion of their Report was worthy of adoption. In consequence, nothing further was done in the course of last Session. The Report of Sir Richard Bromley was in the hands of hon. Members; and although in some minute details he did not entirely coincide with the Royal Commissioners, yet he fully bore them out in the opinion that the system of double government was faulty, and that most of the abuses of the Hospital were to be traced to the want of harmony between the two governing bodies. Lastly, he would draw attention to the fact that the military governor of the Hospital, Sir James Gordon—a most able and distinguished officer, who had been both governor and lieutenant governor of the Hospital—had, in a letter dated 11th April, 1864, confirmed the evidence which he gave before the Royal Commission, that the double system of government in existence at Greenwich was extremely detrimental to the public service and very much to the disadvantage of the pensioners for whom the Hospital was originally created. In consequence of this—in consequence of the fact that the Royal Commission had urged very strongly on the Admiralty the change in the system of government—in consequence of the Report of the Commissioner appointed by the Admiralty coinciding in that opinion—in consequence of the Report of the Governor of Greenwich Hospital, himself no mean authority in this matter, that the Report of the Royal Commissioners and the Report of the Commissioner to whom their Report was referred, that their recommendations ought to be carried out to promote harmony in the management of the Hospital—and in consequence of the saving that would be gained by the adoption of those recommendations, he thought it desirable that the Admiralty adopt the recommendation of the Royal Commission of 1860.

MR. LIDDELL said, he rose to second the Motion. He earnestly hoped that the House would join his hon. and gallant Friend in endeavouring to obtain from the Admiralty, or those who represented the Admiralty in that House, some explanation of what, to his mind, was the inexplicable tardiness which had been shown in dealing with the affairs of Greenwich Hospital. He supposed that no public question ever stood in so remarkable a position. A Royal Commission on the Hospital made recommendations; a Commissioner was appointed expressly to inquire into the merits of those recommendations; he approved them; and another set of Commissioners were directed to inquire into his Report. There were a multiplication of Reports all concurring, and yet nothing had been done to remove the evil, which was inseparable from the existing system, and which had been on all hands pointed out as a great abuse of administration and a great waste of funds. He would venture to remind the House that last year, when the Question was brought before the consideration of Parliament, it was predicted—and the prediction required no large amount of foresight—that the appointment of Sir Richard Bromley would create an antagonism within the walls of Greenwich Hospital greater than ever existed before. The double government, however, was not changed. At that time of day it seemed to be a work of supererogation to prove the obstacles and the utter absurdity of a double government. A double government did exist at Greenwich in spite of all the recommendations which had been made against it. In spite of Sir Richard Bromley's appointment for the express purpose of instituting reform nothing had been done. He never could understand why Greenwich Hospital should not be governed at Greenwich. Instead of that there was a body of military officers entirely controlled by a body of Civil Commissioners, of late years appointed from the ranks of naval officers. So that they had a man of the highest rank in the navy supported by a man of equal weight as his lieutenant governor, presiding over the establishment, and passing rules for the maintenance of discipline and the regulation of the inmates; and yet they were entirely controlled by subordinate officers of the same profession as civil officers. Such a system was certain to produce rivalry and antagonism, as they saw existing. When the Commissioners, in reply to Sir Richard Bromley's Report, stated that the funds of the Hospital had been managed with great care, and that no absolute case of peculation could be proved to have existed, they used that fact in support of their statement that the constitution had worked successfully for thirty years. No doubt, with men of the high position and integrity of the Civil Commissioners no case of peculation had arisen. But what he complained of was this—that a mode of management had been in practice which had entailed enormous unnecessary expenditure upon the Hospital, and that during the whole of that time no effort whatever had been made to curtail that expenditure, which had been proved to be absurdly large; and, more than that, that all the improvements which had been of late introduced had been forced upon them by pressure from without. If it could be shown by the careful observations conducted by Sir Richard Bromley that no less a sum than £8,000 a year had been expended in the civil administration of that Hospital, it followed that had a proper system of management been adopted a saving of £8,000 a year would have been the result. That was a matter of great importance, for it must be remembered that if we were unhappily involved in a war, a naval engagement might at any time throw 300 or 400 additional inmates on the resources of the Hospital. Each inmate, Sir Richard Bromley calculated, cost altogether about £80 a year; therefore 400 new pensioners would represent an additional charge of £24,000 a year. It was thus of great importance to husband the resources of the Hospital in time of peace, and if it could be shown that a consolidation of authority would lead to a great saving, there could not be a stronger argument in its favour. One single word on another point. At various times, and in various quarters, the idea had been broached, that Greenwich Hospital ought to be transferred from its present condition to that of a simple infirmary for the reception of the disabled, and sick, and aged. He was far from saying that that idea was not well worthy the consideration of the House, but he thought its present adoption would be premature. Successful efforts had been made recently to ameliorate by a great expenditure the condition of the pensioner. Only last year a Bill was brought into that House to do that, the want of which ever since its foundation had been a crying evil—namely, a provision for the widows, the wives, and the children. In addition, the first-class men were last year allowed an increased allowance of 2s. a week for improved lodgings. He, therefore, asked the House before turning the Hospital into an infirmary, to wait and see what would be the effect on the pensioners and on the whole tone of the service generally, of these recent changes. What was asked that night was simply that the Government should be true to themselves so to speak, and consent to the course recommended—namely, an amalgamation of the civil and military authorities of Greenwich Hospital, by which the whole might be blended into one harmonious operation.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is desirable that the Admiralty adopt the recommendation of the Royal Commission of 1860, confirmed by the Report of Sir Richard Bromley, one of the present Commissioners, and by the letter of Admiral Sir James Gordon, the Governor of Greenwich Hospital, that the present system of double government be abolished,"—(Sir John Hay,)

—instead thereof.

Mr. ADAM said, he, for one, thanked the hon. and gallant Member for Wakefield for bringing forward the question, which he was glad to see was put upon its proper footing. It was no use to attempt to remedy the evils in the management of Greenwich Hospital without going to the root of the matter, which was the system of government going on there. The course which the Admiralty had pursued with respect to the question under discussion was, in his opinion, most extraordinary. They had for some reason or other put off dealing with it from year to year. They had chosen to withdraw a Bill which had been introduced on the subject a short time ago, which might have passed into a law, and by which a considerable reform might have been effected. The Admiralty then went to sleep, and were roused from their slumbers only by some letters which had appeared in The Times, and by the speeches of the hon. Gentlemen opposite. They thereupon appointed Sir R. Bromley, and he had made a report which fell like a bomb-shell on the rest of the Commissioners. The working of the constitution of the Hospital, he might add, was not a little extraordinary also. The government had been called a double, but it was in reality a three-fold government, comprising, as it did, the Governor, the Commissioners, and the Admiralty. The Governor was responsible for the well-being of the Hospital and the comfort of its inmates; yet he was not allowed to drive a nail in any part of the building without consulting the Commissioners. In support of his statement he would read an extract from the last letter which appeared in The Times on the subject. It said—

"The three Commissioners live away from the Hospital and come down once a week and spend an hour there. Their principal occupation is to quarrel with the Governor. The Governor told the Commission of 1860 that they never called upon him to consult upon the business of the Hospital, for the welfare of which they were all alike appointed. They confine themselves to rejecting, in terms of greater or less discourtesy, every application which he makes for the good of the pensioners. The office of the Admiralty at Whitehall is full of the angry correspondence which the two departments of the Hospital address to head-quarters, each complaining of the other. The civil department, apart from the house-room and repairs, cost the Hospital, in 1859, £12,635 a year, or the equivalent of the allowances recommended by the Commission of 1860 for 420 pensioners' wives and 840 pensioners' children."

The fact was that all reforms were first recommended by the Governor, that he applied to the Commissioners, and that they invariably refused to sanction his recommendations. He then appealed to the Admiralty, and they, having something else to do, said as much as that they wished he would not bother them. The Governor thereupon usually went back to the Commissioners, who again received him with a refusal, and he had to return time after time to the Admiralty, until at last the proposed reforms were carried into effect. Such was the way in which the business of Greenwich Hospital was managed, and it was to the credit of the Admiralty that, although somewhat slow in their action, they had in the end carried out many of the details of those reforms which were considered necessary. The manner which he described was not, however, that in which such an institution as Greenwich Hospital ought to be governed. It was an establishment which was of great importance, not only to the men who were kept there in their old age, but also as holding out a certain prospect to the young who were likely to enter the navy. The Admiralty did not, in his opinion, give sufficient facilities for men in the country to apply to get into the Hospital. There were, he thought, two ways in which the present state of things might be remedied. The one was by such a change in the government as was proposed by his hon. and gallant Friend opposite; the other was by the mode shadowed forth by the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) — by reducing the institution from the position which it held, and making it somewhat more of an infirmary. Before adopting the latter alternative, however, he would impress on the Admiralty the expediency of trying what good the change proposed by his hon. and gallant Friend would effect before converting into a mere infirmary a great national institution.

MR. CHILDERS said, he thought the observations which had been made by his hon. and gallant Friend who had proposed the Amendment before the House must have been sufficient to satisfy all who heard him that the question of Greenwich Hospital was not one which could be dealt with in a few moments, but that there were grave considerations at stake, requiring the most serious deliberation. He could not help feeling, at the same time, that there was no disposition on the part of hon. Gentlemen on either side to take up the subject in a party spirit, but to deal with it simply in its bearing upon the welfare of our seamen, and with a view to discovering to what extent that most noble institution could be applied to their advantage, and through them to the advantage of the State. His hon. Friend who had first spoken had, he might add, great claims to address the House upon the Question. He was a member of a Commission which took great pains to inquire into it, and whose Report was very properly described by his hon. Friend the Member for Halifax as eminently suggestive. It was a Report which was suggestive to the House and to the Admiralty, and it was satisfactory to find that his hon. Friend had been followed in the discussion on the present occasion by one who, as connected with one of the best and greatest governors of the Hospital, was well entitled to advise the House upon the Question. He need hardly add that ever since the Report to which he alluded had appeared, the Government had held much the same views which his hon. and gallant Friend who opened the discussion advocated, and that they had in 1861 brought in a Bill to carry out those views. That measure failed, and he need not point out the reasons why. It was in some respects not quite matured, and he, for one, was not sorry that more time had been given for the discussion of the subject. He hoped the House would allow him shortly to review the present position of the Hospital, and to state the general view of the Government with respect to the arrangements in its regard which ought in future to be carried out. A statement of the present condition of that institution would, he could not help thinking, somewhat startle those hon. Gentlemen whose idea of it was that it was a place solely devoted to the relief of a number of old and infirm seamen and marines, after they could no longer serve the public. Those who looked on Greenwich Hospital as a receptacle for such men, of course expected that their number bore a fair proportion to the entire revenue and expenditure of the institution, and would, therefore, be surprised to learn that there were at the present moment no more than 1,500 seamen and marines in the institution, while its entire revenue was a little over £150,000; that, in other words, for every £100 of revenue there was only one seaman or marine within its walls. That alone was a matter which deserved very serious attention. The property of the Hospital was, in round numbers, as follows:—Estates producing £43,800 per annum; capital in the funds, bank stock, &c., £2,906,324; an annual payment from the Consolidated Fund of £20,000 in lieu of what were called seamen's sixpences, and other sources, making the total income for the last year £154,000. The total expenditure was £134,000, of which £22,000 was debited to the school, £85,000 to the household, £15,000 to the infirmary, £9,000 to repairs and new works, and £1,800 to other charges. The balance last year was £20,000, out of which £2,700—an amount which he thought excessive—was set aside for insurance, £2,000 was applied under the Act of last Session for the benefit of the widows, and £8,000 was reserved for the time when provision might be required for a larger number of seamen. The salaries and allowances of all kinds payable in the Hospital and infirmary (excluding the school) amounted to £25,100, of which nearly £5,000 was for civil officers, between £8,000 and £9,000 for military officers, between £2,000 and £3,000 for medical officers, nearly £4,000 for clerks, and £4,900 for retiring and other allowances. The expense of nurses, servants, and police amounted to £10,400; so that the entire cost of the management, including servants of every kind, amounted, according to last year's accounts, to £35,500. The cost of maintaining the pensioners, who were between 1,500 and 1,600 in number, was £63,000, or nearly as possible £40 each. Works in connection with the Hospital cost £4,400, and the allowances to widows amounted to £2,000. Exclusive of the school, about the efficiency of which there was no question, the present cost of the Hospital was £107,700 per annum, or about £70 for each pensioner maintained in it. The cost had been reduced by £3,000 or £4,000 since the Royal Commissioners reported. Those Commissioners spoke of the Hospital as requiring a very stringent reform, and said that if the measures which they recommended failed it would be the duty of the Government to introduce still more important changes. The Commissioners recommended that the number of pensioners then in the Hospital, 1,676, should be raised to 2,300, and they suggested the following financial arrangement to meet the additional charge which such an increase would occasion. They recommended that £3,175 for the half-pay of the officers, and £23,000 for the out-pensions of the men in the Hospital, instead of being stopped as at present, should be paid by the public to the Hospital funds; and that, in addition, the Hospital should receive from the admirals and captains of the Royal Navy, being the proportions of the freight of treasure now divided between those ranks, estimated at £6,000 a year. To this was to be added a small saving of £300; and thus rather more than £32,000 would be available for the maintenance of additional pensioners. At the same time, they recommended that the charge for the establishment of the Hospital should be reduced by £16,700, and that for works by £4,300, so that the total sum available would be about £53,000. The expense of maintaining the additional 624 pensioners was estimated by the Commissioners at £15,000, which he was afraid was rather below the mark; and they recommended that £10,544 should be added to the money allowances of the pensioners in the Hospital, bringing them up to something like £6 per man. The average amount now paid, however, was between £9 and £10, so that this charge would be insufficient. The Commissioners also recommended a capital expenditure of £62,000 upon buildings for the reception of the wives and children of pensioners, and an annual charge of £33,000 to be paid to them as gratuities. In other words, the recommendation was that provision should be made for 624 persons at a cost which he thought had been rather underestimated, and also that a new institution should be established for the wives and children of pensioners at an annual charge equivalent to the interest upon a million and a quarter; two-thirds of the extra expense being voted by Parliament. What had been done towards carrying into effect the Report of the Commission? The recommendations which referred to the comfort of the pensioners had, there was no question, been fairly carried out, and in regard to gratuities had been exceeded. The Commissioners recommended that gratuities should be given to the men ranging from 1s. 2d. to 3s. 6d. per week. The gratuities actually paid had varied from 3s. to 5s. Since the date of the Report eleven civil and military officers had been struck off the establishment; during the last year the offices of one captain, two lieutenants, a clerk of the check, and a clerk had been abolished, causing a saving of £1,940 a year. Since his Friend the Member for Halifax addressed the House upon the subject last year several additional advantages had been conferred upon the pensioners—2s. a week was now granted to each married pensioner, their wives were buried at the public expense, and a fund had been formed out of which the cost of sending the widows and children to their families would be defrayed. Except in the case of the enormous grant of nearly £40,000 a year to the wives and children of pensioners, the recommendations of the Commissioners had, as far as they affected the pensioners themselves, been fairly carried out. Notwithstanding that, however, the number of pensioners in the Hospital had fallen to 1,508—that was, the number had diminished by 168 since the date of the Commissioners' Report. That fact of itself was sufficient to show that the reforms then recommended were not sufficient, that there was something radically wrong with the Hospital, and that the time had come, not for its abolition, but for the adoption of some, not precipitate, but well considered, measures, which would cause its funds to be applied to the benefit of those for whom the foundation was designed. He did not think there was any foundation for the charge that the Government had not taken sufficient means to make the benefits of the Hospital known in the country. The real difficulty was adverted to in the Report of the Commission for Manning the Navy, and any legislation adopted by the House must be founded upon their recommendation. They pointed out that the Hospital had an available income of about £150,000, and that, under judicious arrangements, it would be found capable of meeting the wants of all worn-out and disabled seamen, whether they belonged to the Royal Navy or to the Volunteer Force. "Men," they add, "who have adequate pensions for their support, and who have families or friends to take care of them, are better in their own homes than in any establishment of this description." That went to prove that it was not desirable to attract seamen to the Hospital by giving them increased pecuniary advantages. The object of the founders of the Hospital was to find an asylum, or to make provision for those who had no families or friends able to support them, and who were not entitled to out-pensions of a sufficient amount on which to enable them to exist comfortably. It was, however, doubtful whether it was a wise policy to attract such men to Greenwich, and to spend larger sums in keeping them there than would maintain them comfortably at home. The language of the Commission of 1860 was entirely consistent with that of the Commission on Manning the Navy, although on the question of attracting the men to Greenwich they took a somewhat opposite view. They recommended that a sum of £40,000 a year should be expended on the wives and families of seamen, that they should be brought to Greenwich, and that cottages or model lodging-houses should be provided for their residences. No one could fail to see that this was an attempt to combine two inconsistent things. The seamen were to be kept together in a great monastic institution combining the advantages of numbers and efficient medical attendance, and their families were also to be concentrated at Greenwich and maintained at a far greater cost than would be sufficient to support them in their own villages. It was more than doubtful whether, if the families of seamen ought to be brought together, Greenwich was the best town for such a concentration. Let the House compare the position of seamen in the present day with their prospects 100 or even twenty or thirty years ago. What chance had they then of obtaining wages or employment in other callings? The average age of the inmates of the Hospital on admission was only fifty-four years. Every one knew that the rate of wages, the comforts of the labouring classes, and the possibility of obtaining employment had greatly increased during the last few years. It was now no longer necessary to provide for the wants of the sailor as in former times, as his character was greatly altered for the better. The sailor of a few years since was, as he is now, gallant, loyal, and worthy of his country; but he belonged to an improvident class, and possessed very little means of adapting himself to other pursuits in life. But of late years the character of the sailors had been enormously improved. They had become more domesticated, and could turn their hands more readily to other pursuits. They were far more able therefore to find employment, and to settle down in their old age among their friends in all parts of the country. Upon these grounds he thought the time had arrived when the Government might with perfect safety gradually adopt, as pointed out by the evidence taken before the Commissioners, the recommendations which were distinctly shadowed out in their Report. In stating what the Government professed to do, he wished to take no credit for himself, as he was but explaining the views of the Board of Admiralty generally; views which the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty had proposed and embodied in a memorandum, which he would at once move for; and so far as the functions of the particular office he held were concerned, the merit was due to the hon. Member for Halifax, who had preceded him, rather than to himself. The policy of the Government, therefore, was this. At present the qualifications for admission to Greenwich Hospital were classified as follows:—In the first place every seaman, whatever his service, who was wounded or injured in the service, and was incapable to maintain himself, was admissible to the Hospital. If he had only been in the service a few days or months he was qualified, provided he had been wounded or injured and so disabled in the service. The next class were seamen having out-pensions of £9, that was 6d. per day, and who were incapable of maintaining themselves. The third class were seamen who had served full time, and who were unfit for further service at sea, though able to maintain themselves otherwise. The fourth class were special cases. The Government proposed to limit the admission to the Hospital in future to infirm and helpless sailors and marines who could not be maintained in comfort elsewhere. That arrangement would meet the objections that were expressed against making the Hospital a mere receptacle for the sick, while it would probably diminish the numbers of the inmates from 1,500 to 600. It was proposed to apply the saving towards increasing the out-pensions for seamen after certain ages, and providing additional retirements for the ranks of officers who now benefited by the appointments in the Hospital. With respect to the future government of the Hospital, they proposed to get rid altogether of the double government. The proposal would, in short, be this—the Hospital would be governed by some person in the position of admiral superintendent, with two or three naval officers as lieutenants for purposes of discipline, and those gentlemen would have the entire charge of the institution. There would be a sufficient number of medical officers, as at present, attached to the institution; and all the appointments should be staff appointments for five years. The government of the institution would be in fact like that of Haslar or Chelsea. With respect to those naval officers who were at present employed in the Hospital, whether in a civil or military character, it would be entirely in consonance with the views of the Government, as well as of the House, that they should be fully compensated for the loss of their position. Nor would they be disturbed in their present residences. Of course it might be possible to transfer those who held the office of clerks to positions elsewhere. With respect to the management of the funds of the institution, it might be a question in what relation they should stand to the general funds of the country—whether it would be well to keep up the form of a separate fund altogether removed from the view of that House, or whether by some arrangement they might not be combined with the funds of the nation, while a careful and separate account of them was still kept. The increased rates of out-pensions would be fixed by law. On this point he might say that the Government did not agree with the recommendation of the Commission, that the funds of the Hospital were intended to be solely for the benefit of the seamen. It was the original intention to apply a certain amount of the fund for the benefit of old officers of different ranks in the navy, and the Government would propose that such an arrangement should be continued. The whole arrangements with respect to the scale of out-pensions, the additional benefit to the different classes of officers, and the management of the institution, would become the subject of inquiry by a joint committee of the Treasury and Admiralty during the recess; the details of the scheme would be carefully matured by the officers of both Departments, and at the commencement of next Session the Government would be perfectly ready to submit the scheme itself to any investigation the House might think fit. With respect to the funds of the Hospital, the present income was £154,000, and the cost of the future establishment would be as follows:—The infirmary it was calculated would cost about £15,000, maintenance of out-pensioners £23,000, works, including those of the school, £5,500, pensions to widows £5,000, school £23,000, making a total of £71,500, which would leave a balance of above £80,000 to be dealt with partly, as now, by way of accumulation with a view to heavier charges in the event of a war, but mainly for the benefit of the old sailors and officers of the service. By the last Returns there were between 360 and 370 persons in the infirmary and helpless ward, but the future arrangements would include provision for about 600. The Government fully appreciated all that hon. Members had said as to the valuable services of Sir Richard Bromley, and he hoped in whatever arrangements would be made the services of Sir Richard Bromley would be retained for the institution. He might add that as some wings of the Hospital would not be required in the reduced plan, and as there would be sure to be a group of claimants for their use, their disposal would be matter for the most careful consideration. He had attempted to make his statement as full as he could, and to include such general explanations and important details which it might be satisfactory for the country to receive. The Admiralty were not making what could be called a romantic proposition, and he must admit that it tended to dispel some of those ideas which were attached to the Hospital. It was not their wish, however, to do away with, but to maintain the original character of the institution; and their scheme, if prosaic in some of its details, would, he was sure, be for the good of the service; and if the sailor who might then find a harbour of refuge within its walls should not by-and-by find it as open as before, he would, at all events, receive such additional advantages for his wife, his family, and himself as, he trusted, would prove by the result that the Government were justified in making the change.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, after the clear and very interesting statement which the hon. Gentleman had made, and which the House on every account had heard with satisfaction, he should wish to make a few remarks. In the first place, he had to express his great gratification that the Government had decided to deal at once with the matter, for the time had arrived when something ought to be done, both with respect to the system of government and the whole mode of management of that magnificent institution. When the Royal Commission made a Report some time ago, and that was followed by another able Report by Sir R. Bromley, the Government had ample information at hand for dealing with the subject. He would not offer any opinion on the statement of the hon. Gentleman; but he would go as far as this, and say that it appeared to him that the principles on which the Board of Admiralty intended to proceed were sound.

The House would receive with general satisfaction the announcement that the system of double government would be put an end to. He confessed he had been somewhat surprised at the recommendation contained in another report—namely, that the office of Governor of the Hospital should for the future be regarded as a sinecure, and be held by some gentleman who should not have any duties connected with it. He was very glad to hear that the Admiralty had decided rather to adopt the plan recommended by Sir Richard Bromley. On one point he was afraid he differed, not only from the Royal Commission and Sir Richard Bromley, but also from some Members in that House, with respect to the military officers of the Hospital. The recommendation was that the appointment of those officers should be cut down to five years. He could not but regard that with great doubt and jealousy. He believed it was a mistaken construction of the words of the original charter of the Hospital, which held that the institution was intended exclusively for seamen, and not at all for naval officers. He contended that the officers of the Royal Navy had every claim to share in its benefits as well as seamen. He did not clearly understand what were the intentions of the Admiralty on the point; he hoped, before the discussion closed, the House would receive further information on the subject. He should be very sorry to see any course taken which would operate harshly or unjustly upon officers of the Royal Navy; and he did hope, before the plans of the Admiralty were finally determined, they would give serious consideration to that part of the subject.

MR. INGHAM said, that having been a member of the Royal Commission, he wished to express the satisfaction with which he had listened to the statement of his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty. He could not agree with some of the criticisms of the right hon. Baronet on the Report. No one who carefully read the Reports and the evidence on the point would be of the right hon. Gentleman's opinion as to the original design of the institution. The statutes, the charters, and, above all, the practice in its earliest and best days, showed that no person, unless below the rank of a warrant officer, was entitled to share in the charity. It was true that during the last two reigns the practice had been otherwise, but before that period the Hospital was exclusively for the benefit of common seamen. With respect to the remark of the right hon. Gentleman against the propriety of making the governorship a sinecure, that recommendation, it was to be remembered, was accompanied by a proviso that all the other officers were to be staff officers, and appointed only for a short time. He trusted the seamen would find even more comfort under the new arrangements, with an adequate pension, than they had enjoyed in the Hospital. He might state as an interesting fact connected with the Trinity House—a kindred institution—that some arrangements were being made by which, in lieu of certain almshouses at Deptford, which required to be rebuilt, old captains were to receive a money pension, which would be considered more valuable than an appointment to the almshouses. He repeated that he had heard the statement as to the intention of the Admiralty on this subject with very great pleasure.

MR. ANGERSTEIN said, he thought that scant justice had been done to the Commissioners of the Hospital. In his opinion the country was indebted to them for the conduct they had pursued. If there had been any mismanagement it should be recollected that the Admiralty were the superior authority, and the whole blame ought not to be thrown on the Commissioners. He was gratified at the spirit in which the Government had taken up the subject, and he hoped any determination to which they might come would prove beneficial to that service, which had been the glory of the country.

MR. CORRY wished to know whether it was intended that the offices of the Governor and Lieutenant Governor of the Hospital should be held for only five years. That would, he thought, be a most objectionable arrangement. For his part, he should blush to see Sir James Gordon turned out of his office at the expiration of that period. He should also be glad to know what arrangements would be made with reference to the out-pensioners.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that he was glad to see the feeling which had been displayed in reference to the proposals of the Government. These proposals, which had been explained to the House, were the result of very careful consideration, and he thought that in reference to some details which had been adverted to it would be perhaps better that he should lay on the table an interesting Memorandum drawn up by the Duke of Somerset, explanatory of the disadvantages of the present government of Greenwich Hospital, and showing the necessity for a change. He would, therefore, now confine himself to giving an answer on some points which had been referred to in the course of the present discussion. With respect to the interests of officers in the navy, he was glad to hear the right hon. Member for Droitwich state in emphatic terms that they had a fair claim for their share of the advantages of Greenwich Hospital. That had been fully recognized by the fact that from the earliest period there always had been naval officers attached to the institution; and as the officers of the navy had contributed large sums towards its maintenance, it was impossible in any re-distribution that the claims of the officers should be omitted. Without going into great detail, he would state generally what was proposed. It was intended that Greenwich Hospital, like Haslar or any other naval hospital, should have a superintendent and a sufficient number of officers to maintain discipline. It was also hoped that, by means of the economies which would be effected, additional advantages might be provided for the sailors, so that they might receive a certain increase of pension after they had been pensioners for a certain number of years, and had arrived at a certain age. It was proposed to offer to the present inmates of the Hospital the option either to remain there for the rest of their days, or accept the improved pension he had just referred to. With respect to the officers, it was proposed to do away with the Governor and Lieutenant Governor, and all captains and officers beyond those who were necessary for the discipline of that Hospital. [Mr. CORRY: The Governor.] With regard to that most distinguished officer the present Governor, he should be sorry for any one to suppose that any injustice would be done to him. Speaking in reference to the future, it was proposed to devote a proportion of the savings consequent on the reduction of the establishment to the purpose of giving a certain increase in the number of good service pensions to officers in the navy. It was likewise proposed that there should be an addition to the number of the Greenwich out-pensions for officers; and, lastly, with respect to the officers now occupying posts in Greenwich Hospital, among whom was that most distinguished officer Sir James Gordon, it was intended to give them for life their present residences in the Hospital, or to allow them an equivalent in lieu. He need not advert to the provisions intended to be applied to the civil servants, for his hon. Friend (Mr. Childers) had already made so clear a statement on that head; but as he had heard it stated that encouragement ought to be given to the entry of men into Greenwich Hospital, he felt it necessary to state that, in his opinion, their entry ought rather as a rule to be discouraged. He believed that it would be much better for old seamen who had wives, families, relatives, or friends in the places of their birth, to return there for the purpose of enjoying their old age, and by recounting the events of their ocean life they might, perhaps, bring up many of the young people about them with a love for the sea. If this took place, the effect would be that Greenwich Hospital would be really an hospital or infirmary for old decrepit men, whom, from the circumstance of their having no families or friends, it would be an act of charity to look after. In all other cases he would discourage old seamen from going into the Hospital, and would rather endeavour, by improving their pensions, to make their old age happy and comfortable elsewhere.

MR. LIDDELL: What about the finances?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: The finances would be kept entirely separate from the management of the Hospital. That question would be carefully inquired into by the Treasury and the Admiralty, with a view to a proposal being submitted to Parliament next Session in reference both to the landed and the funded property.

MR. CORRY said, he wished to know how the Board of Management was to be constituted?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that there would be no such Board. The management would be intrusted to a superintendent and other officers, as at Haalar and other Hospitals.

SIR JOHN HAY said, that after the satisfactory statement he had heard from the Admiralty authorities, he would withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

ADMINISTRATION OF SCOTCH AFFAIRS.

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, in rising to move for—

Lord Clarence Paget

"A Select Committee to inquire how far the number of the Members of the Administration charged with the conduct of the affairs of Scotland, and having seats in Parliament, is commensurate with the requirements of that part of the United Kingdom," said, Sir, the question which I have to bring forward this evening is not new to the House of Commons. In former years there have been constant references made to the subject. Six years ago—in 1858—it was discussed on the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), who in a temperate and comprehensive speech brought the question of the administration of Scotland—so far as Members of the Administration having seats in this House are concerned—under the notice of Parliament. On that occasion my hon. Friend proposed that a Member of the Government should be appointed specially charged with the Administration of Scotch affairs—and that, possessing a seat in this House, the management of Scotch business should be intrusted to him. At that time the subject did not appear to the House to be matured for legislation. The Motion of my hon. Friend met with considerable support from the Scotch Members; but it was opposed by the leaders on both sides of the House, and rejected. It did, however, receive such a measure of countenance and support as proved its popularity in Scotland. My hon. Friend went further than I intend to do this evening, for he placed before the House a definite Motion on the subject.

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present—

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON proceeded. I am glad that this attempt to extinguish the debate has failed. I should have been extremely sorry if the few observations I intended to make had been suddenly curtailed without my having the opportunity of disclaiming, in the strongest manner possible, any desire on my part, in submitting this Motion, to make any imputation against the Administration of Scotch affairs by my right hon. Friend who at present holds the office of Lord Advocate. I shall be fully acquitted of any such desire by all, on both sides of the House, who have noticed the manner in which my right hon. and learned Friend has from time to time met the objections to the measures which he has introduced, and the favourable opportunities he has given for their discussion. The same compliment may be paid to his predecessors in office, who have uniformly displayed the most conspicuous ability. In point of fact, if anything could have reconciled what I consider to be the incompatible nature of the duties intrusted to the Lord Advocate of Scotland, it would be the efficient manner in which they have been performed by the right hon. and learned Gentlemen who of late years have held the office. What I contend is, that the duties which come within the province of the Lord Advocate of Scotland are so diverse, incompatible, and comprehensive, that no parallel can be found either in the Administration of England or Ireland. It seems strange that the constitution of the three portions of the United Kingdom should be so different, that while in England there are various officers of State, of various professions, each exercising his individual duties, in Scotland alone they should all be concentrated in one individual, and that the Chief Law Officer of the Crown for Scotland. Now, it is with regard specially to the management of Scotch affairs in this House, that I wish to address a few observations. It is well known to Scotch Members, and it is no imputation upon the Lord Advocate, that it is absolutely impossible that Scotch affairs, administered and represented by one Member alone, should be managed with that expedition and convenience which are necessary to ensure the proper consideration of measures which affect the welfare of the country. It must be obvious that a Member, however distinguished he may be, whose duties lie at one and the same moment at opposite ends of the United Kingdom, cannot take advantage of those opportunities which are afforded in this House of introducing his measures at a fitting time, pressing them forward when there is leisure to discuss them, and when it would save time to the country afterwards to consider them, if he has at the same moment to be discharging the duties of his profession in a distant part of the United Kingdom. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman himself is not prepared to deny that that is often the case. It must also be as well known to the right hon. Gentleman, as it is to many hon. Members of this House, that he has failed sometimes to pass measures which I, for one, have thought likely to be beneficial, because the time of the Session has passed by when due consideration could be given to them. Scotch business is generally postponed until morning sittings become the Order of the Day, or it comes on at one or two o'clock in the morning when Members who have been waiting night after night for the discussion of particular questions have left the House. Under such circumstances measures pass sometimes without proper consideration, and to the astonishment of persons out of doors. That is the state of affairs which is made a matter of yearly and daily complaint, and it is no imputation upon the right hon. Gentleman to say that it is impossible for it to be otherwise. But I intend to base my Motion upon even wider grounds than that. If it were necessary I could cite particular instances in which inconvenience has occurred. I could quote Bill after Bill in bygone years, but I will confine myself to one or two cases that have happened in the course of the present Session. A Bill was introduced before Easter which affects Scotland to a very important extent. It must be looked upon as important because a measure of a similar character has already been introduced in England, has become law, and has been found oppressive and disagreeable. Then, again, there is the High Court of Justiciary Bill. That measure was brought in early in the Session. No explanation was offered with respect to its provisions because the Lord Advocate was absent. It was not until it had attained the stage of the Committee before we were informed why it was introduced, and what it was about. We attribute that to the necessary absence of the right hon. Gentleman. There is the Writs Registration Bill — which the right hon. Gentleman himself has described as of the first importance. That Bill was not brought in until the beginning of May — a period of the Session when measures introduced into this House can no longer be expected to be considered fairly by the counties of Scotland. There is one thing which can hardly be disputed. It is a matter perfectly notorious, and a subject of considerable complaint, that persons who come from Scotland, who are interested in the business before Parliament, are never certain whether or not they will find the one official of the Government who is responsible for the Scotch business in this House at his post. I cannot possibly say more than I have already stated to disclaim any intention to reproach the right hon. Gentleman with a neglect of his duty. I do not believe that there ever was a Lord Advocate who sacrificed so much of his time, and I dare say so much of his interests, to the discharge of his public duties; but what I say is that the evils of which I complain are part of and inseparable from the system. Let me ask the House to consider on wider grounds the footing on which the administration of Scotch affairs rests, and especially the representation of Scotch affairs by the Government in this House. The Lord Advocate of Scotland virtually combines in his own person all the leading offices of the State. I am quite aware that the administration of the internal affairs of the country rests nominally in the hands of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and that the patronage of Church and State rests ostensibly in the Crown—I suppose either in the Lord Justice General of Scotland, or in the office of the Secretary of State for Home Affairs—and that the more important patronage of Scotland rests in the Treasury. But the general impression—and I should be glad to know that the fact is not so—prevailing is, that the patronage of all the Departments is virtually vested in the Lord Advocate of Scotland, for it is not to be supposed that any important appointment is ever made without his concurrence and advice. Then in matters of administration, it will not be denied that no action of the Home Office in any important matter ever takes place without his co-operation and concurrence—if, indeed, he be not the actual Executive officer by whose ipse dixit it is made. In point of fact, he discharges the duty of Secretary of State and of Privy Councillor. I take it that he is mainly responsible for the administration of the police, so far as the supervision of the Government goes; for I am glad to say that the local magistracy have still the direct control of the police body. But the Lord Advocate controls, and virtually presides over all those matters of general administration which in other parts of the kingdom are placed in the hands of the great Departments of the State. There are duties which peculiarly rest with the Lord Advocate of Scotland, and which are unknown to the rest of the United Kingdom. In England and Ireland, in cases of sudden death, there is an inquest held by the coroner. The proceedings are notorious and open, the evidence is known and published, and the decision is openly rendered. Then, again, in England and Ireland the examination of criminals in the first instance is in the hands of the local magistracy, and the proceedings are open to the public, and well known. Prisoners are committed for trial, and before they can be brought before the court of assize, a true bill must be found by the grand jury. In a word, it is impossible that any criminal procedure can take place without being open and known. In Scotland, the state of things is very different. The inquiries in cases of sudden death are made only by order of the Lord Advocate or his subordinates. In case the subordinate—the deputy of the Lord Advocate in that part of the country—considers an inquiry unnecessary, no further notice is taken. It is the same in a case of arrest. If the deputy of the Lord Advocate commence a prosecution, an arrest may be made, but a quarter of a year may elapse before the prisoner is tried; and in the meanwhile the public know nothing of the charge preferred against the prisoner, or, at all events, of the evidence on which it is based. But the evil may go much further. A man may be accused of murder—I take the highest charge known on the criminal law—he may be imprisoned for murder—such cases have occurred; he may then plead guilty to culpable homicide; his plea may be accepted by the Crown prosecutor; and he may be sentenced for such culpable homicide without the public knowing on what ground this has been done, except from common rumour. The Lord Advocate of Scotland and his subordinates possess a power which is unknown in any other part of the United Kingdom. They may arrest any individual upon a charge which may or may not be subsequently established, and the prisoner may be released from custody and re-arrested without any information being given to the public as to the charge against him, or the evidence by which it is supported. This is a terrible and enormous power to wield, and I think the office of the Lord Advocate is responsible enough without his being burdened with the sole conduct of the affairs of Scotland in the House of Commons. If the power I have described have been exercised without abuse, and with so little oppression that no great complaint has been made, that only shows how fortunate Scotland has been in the selection of the persons to whom the duty of administering the law has been intrusted. But that does not in any way prove that the law is not inconsistent with free institutions; nor does it prove that similar laws and procedure are known in any other part of the kingdom; or that a system by which some official has the sole conduct of Parliamentary business and is intrusted with the making of laws, with the rectifying of our course of procedure, and with the power of confirming or remitting sentences, is a system which ought or ought not to be maintained. I have already reminded the House that in 1858 this matter was discussed in this House, on the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter). That Motion was opposed by the Lord Advocate of that day; who urged as the advantage accruing from the office of Lord Advocate the very acts of which I complain. The Lord Advocate of that day (the present learned and respected Lord Justice Clerk) argued that the possession of such powers, coupled with such administrative duties in this House, was wholesome, because he was possessed of that machinery which enabled him to communicate at any moment most readily with any portion of the United Kingdom. I say it is precisely for that reason that these combined offices and powers should not be vested in the same person. The Lord Advocate further denied that there was any such complaint with regard to delay in the prosecution of Scotch business as was represented. I must appeal to the experience of other hon. Members to disprove that assertion, and also the statement which was made by the leaders on both sides of the House, that the Scotch business was so well conducted that it ought to serve as a model for the conduct of English business. Now, in my humble opinion, the present mode of conducting Scotch business is not favourable to its fair consideration. It is no doubt the practice for Scotch Members to meet and consider public questions without the House at large being put to the trouble of considering them; but I venture to think that that very practice operates to prevent other Members from taking that interest in Scotch affairs which they take in the affairs of other parts of the kingdom. When it is known that the affairs of Scotland are habitually discussed elsewhere, it can hardly be expected that they should excite in this House the same interest and attention which the affairs of Ireland excite in the House generally. We have one proof of that to-night. The empty benches which I see before me sufficiently establish that assertion.

But this is the place in which our affairs ought to be considered and our grievances redressed, and it only shows the disadvantages of the system under which we labour. I do not ask the House to come to any decision upon the matter in a hurry, and I cannot anticipate that I shall be supported in the Motion I am about to make by those who now enjoy, or who have enjoyed, the distinguished position of Lord Advocate. No doubt they consider the system a most superior one, offering as it does to their profession a prize so high and a position so dignified. Nor do I expect that the House will come to an affirmative decision upon the question which I have placed before them; but what I am entitled to ask is a full and fair inquiry, the necessity for which has been conceded again and again, into the affairs of Scotland. I simply ask that a Select Committee should be appointed to receive evidence upon the subject and report to the House.

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being present,

SIR JAMES FERGUSON resumed. I have very few more words to say. I have shown that in my opinion the duties of the Lord Advocate are incompatible. He is charged with the formation of laws, with the appointment of Judges, or those who practically exercise the power, with the revision of their proceedings, with the consideration of the remission of the sentence of death imposed by these very Judges, and he ought not at the same time to be charged with the administration of Scotch business generally. All I ask the House to do is to sanction the appointment of a Committee, which shall have the power of taking evidence as to the manner in which the affairs of no unimportant part of the United Kingdom are conducted, and I trust that the inquiry which I propose will be assented to.

MR. CAIRD seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire how far the number of the Members of the Administration, charged with the conduct of the affairs of Scotland, and having Seats in Parliament, is commensurate with the requirements of that part of the United Kingdom,"—(Sir James Ferguson.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MAJOR HAMILTON: I cordially agree with the proposition of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Ayrshire (Sir James Fergusson), and I cannot help observing with satisfaction that, for the first time during many years, Scotch business has been brought forward at a reasonable hour, and that, to use a sporting phrase, we have the opportunity of having "a good innings." It is not my intention to trouble the House for many minutes, and I hope that other Scotch Members will show their sense of the indulgence of the House by making short speeches. The question submitted to the House by my hon. and gallant Friend is one of the Scotch rights which excited so much attention north of the Tweed a few years since, which if heard of in England at all were chiefly known through the animadversions of The Times. This was a point much urged; but I did not at the time approve of it. I am glad to say that we succeeded in carrying the question relative to the repairs of national buildings in Scotland, and, having accomplished that object, many of us were satisfied. I can only say, with regard to having a Secretary of State for Scotland in this House, that I have very great doubts whether such an appointment would be advantageous or not. But I am certain that, if the Lord Advocate were to devote the whole of his time to Scotch business, he would be able to undertake it, and I wish on those occasions when he is unavoidably absent he had a secondary in the House. I look upon that as one of our principal grievances, because I find that, although in Scotland it is generally understood the Scotch Lord of the Treasury is a gentleman who is paid and kept for the purpose of attending to Scotch business, yet in the present case, being Secretary to the Duchy of Cornwall, it is said that he has nothing to do with questions affecting Scotland. I thoroughly believe what he says, and that we have not any Secretary for Scotland, who ought to have the management of the affairs of that country. It is a great pity that we have not an officer of that kind, and I fully approve of the proposition of my hon. and gallant Friend. But if I were asked at this moment to vote whether I would have a Secretary of State for Scotland or not, I should be inclined to reflect on the old fable, and ask whether King Stork would be better than King Log. I certainly think I should not vote for such a measure; but I have no hesitation in giving my support to the present Motion for the appointment of a Committee to inquire into our alleged grievances, in order that, if they really exist, they may obtain that redress to which they are entitled.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE: The Motion submitted to the House by the hon. and gallant Member for Ayrshire, implies either that there is some particular defect in the present administration of Scotch affairs, or that those affairs are generally maladministered. I listened very attentively to his speech, expecting to hear some proof that such is the case, because in bringing forward a Motion, which implies dissatisfaction with the administration of Scotch affairs, he was bound to adduce some facts to justify his proposition. I do not know whether other hon. Gentlemen who have listened to his remarks entertain the same opinion, but I must say that to my mind he did not adduce facts sufficient to justify the inquiry for which he asks. I imagine it to be a totally new thing, on a question relating to the administration of the affairs of a great section of the United Kingdom, to move for the appointment of a fishing Committee to find out something to substantiate the general statement that he and some of his friends are dissatisfied with the present administration of Scotch affairs. I am certainly not aware that any such dissatisfaction as that which is alleged exists in Scotland, or in this House. The hon. and gallant Gentleman expatiated at considerable length on the duties of the office of Lord Advocate, and said that it was quite impossible in the nature of things that any Lord Advocate could discharge in a satisfactory manner the numerous and responsible duties which are cast upon him. The hon. and gallant Gentleman did justice to my right hon. and learned Friend when he spoke so highly of the manner in which his duties are performed; but he justified his Motion on this ground, that such is the constitution of the office of Lord Advocate that Scotch affairs must necessarily be indifferently administered. The answer to that is experience. For many years Scotch affairs have been most ably administered by successive Lord Advocates, men of first-class reputation and ability, and I believe they have been administered well, and to the satisfaction of the country. But not only was the hon. and gallant Gentleman bound to show the House some ground whereon to rest his Motion, but, as it seems to me, he ought to have suggested some remedy for the grievance of which he complains; but I did not hear him suggest a remedy of any kind. If the House should think proper to grant a Committee, I think it is entitled to know what remedy the hon. and gallant Gentleman proposes. The Lord Advocate has two important functions to discharge—legal functions and administrative functions. I will first take his legal functions. He is the public prosecutor for Scotland. Under his superintendence his subordinate officers have to direct and conduct criminal prosecutions on the part of the Crown throughout Scotland. He has also functions to discharge very much like those which are discharged in this country by the Magistracy and the Coroner, the inquiry into supposed crimes that have been committed. The performance of such duties must necessarily devolve upon a high legal functionary—a man of high character and position—possessing such legal standing as to give importance and weight to the decisions at which he may arrive. The Lord Advocate, then, must be a lawyer. With regard to his administrative functions, they divide themselves into two different branches. He has to advise the Home Secretary with regard to the distribution of a large portion of the patronage of Scotland, the principal portion of that patronage being legal patronage, such as Sheriffships and Clerkships, filled by legal gentlemen. The person having to deal with these matters ought to have a general knowledge of the characters and professional qualifications of the persons to be appointed to these offices. In the discharge of this portion of the administrative duties, therefore, the services of a lawyer are indispensable, and no one is so capable of discharging them, from his practical experience, as the Lord Advocate. The other branch of a Lord Advocate's duty—the legislative branch—can only be properly discharged by a distinguished Scotch lawyer. The hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Smollett) the other night made some vigorous remarks about the jargon of the Scotch law, and the complication, defective character, and incomprehensibility of that law. Now, how is it possible for any but a Scotch lawyer to deal satisfactorily with legislation for Scotland, to propose measures calculated to amend the laws of that country, to improve the administration of those laws, to effect all such reforms as are required by the country. If these be the functions and duties of the administration of Scotch affairs in ordinary times, the conclusion is that the proper person to discharge these functions and duties is the Lord Advocate, and it is the Lord Advocate who has discharged them for so many years to the general satisfaction of the country. The hon. and gallant Gentleman forgets that the Lord Advocate is not solely responsible for the conduct of Scotch business. The Home Secretary is as much Secretary of State for Scotland as he is Secretary of State for England. But the question which appears to possess the mind of the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire (Major Hamilton) is that there ought to be some officer in this House specially connected with Scotland, who shall always be fishing about trying to discover something by way of improvement—a sort of dilettante legal reformer, whose sole employment shall be fishing for changes in the Scotch law. Now, I think that would be anything but an improvement on the present system. One of the advantages of the present system is that Scotland is not plagued with those constant meddlings and interferences and changes which are constantly going on in England. And I should greatly deprecate any recommendation for the appointment of an officer of State, who would have nothing to do but interfere in Scotch affairs, and endeavour to make himself a name by keeping Scotch affairs and Scotch Members in continual hot water. In this matter I am content to declare myself a Conservative. I think that at present we have a good and satisfactory arrangement. When any necessity arises for legislation, I do not find that there is any difficulty in dealing with it. It has been my pride and glory to have identified myself with Scotchmen, and to continue to act in entire harmony and good feeling with those I represent in that country; and the result of my experience is, that wherever there has been a real want in Scotland, the public voice of the people of that country has made itself heard, and has had little difficulty making the change that was considered necessary. With regard to the mode in which we conduct our Scotch legislative business, the Scotch Members are, I have often heard by Members from the sister countries, held up as perfect models. Instead of squabbling over their legislative matters in the face of the House, and having what the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire has called a "good innings," we meet and have a friendly and confidential conversation; we find out our points of difference, and more or less compromise those points; and then, when a measure comes before the House, it proceeds and is passed without much difficulty. Without entering into any details of the system of administration in Scotland, I wish to express my satisfaction generally at the mode in which the business is carried on—not merely as to the manner in which it is conducted by the Lord Advocate, but with regard to the general system; and therefore I must vote against the proposition of the hon. and gallant Member for Ayrshire.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Sir, I was anxious before I addressed the House to have heard a little more said in support of the Motion. My hon. and gallant Friend (Sir James Fergusson) will not imagine that I undervalue his statement when I say that it did not contain any very strong or intelligent grounds for the Motion with which he has concluded. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has stated truly that this subject was brought under the notice of the House in 1858, and was then fully considered. The leaders on both sides then expressed their opinions in the clearest and strongest manner. My noble Friend at the head of the Government and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire both expressed their conviction that there was no ground whatever for altering the existing mode of conducting Scotch business in this House. Therefore, unless the hon. and gallant Gentleman had some stronger grounds for his proposal than those which he has laid before the House, it was unnecessary, I think, again to disturb a question so decidedly set at rest within so recent a period. As to the mode in which the subject has been brought forward, as far as I personally am concerned, I have nothing to complain of. In regard to the matter itself, which is of great public importance to Scotland, I shall take the liberty, as shortly and succinctly as I can, of stating the reasons why this Motion ought not to be agreed to. I am, I own, at a loss to understand what is the precise grievance which my hon. and gallant Friend would redress. I listened for it while he was speaking, but could not quite appreciate or understand it. I shall first of all try to methodize, as far as I can, the elements of the objection taken by the hon. and gallant Gentleman or by others to the existing state of things. First, it is said that the Lord Advocate is a practising lawyer, and cannot therefore be in the House of Commons when he has his practice to attend to in Edinburgh. The second assertion is that the Lord Advocate, having other avocations, has not the time for introducing measures of that magnitude and importance which he ought to attempt. Thirdly, we are told that the manner in which Bills are prepared, proposed, and considered in the House, is not satisfactory. And the fourth and last allegation is that, at all events, the political functions of the Lord Advocate are such as ought not to be exercised by a practising lawyer. Here then are the objections gathered partly from the speech of my hon. and gallant Friend, and partly from the midnight suggestions of the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire. I suppose the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire is now satisfied that the notion that the Lord Advocate is never in this House till after Easter, except when the Government require his vote in a great party division—is the mere offspring of a heated imagination. There is not and has not been any foundation for the idea, and I presume the hon. Gentleman must on calm reflection be convinced that such is the case. It is very true that the Lord Advocate is a practising lawyer; but it is also certain that during the Session of Parliament he has substantially to throw his professional business to the winds. If he is not in his place here, then he ought to be, if there is any Government business to come on; and I may say for myself that, with very few and rare exceptions, I have systematically acted on that principle. My usual course has been this. I have come up to London in the second or third week in February, and remained until the 20th March. Sometimes I may have borrowed a day or two after that date when the Court of Session rises for the jury trials, which then immediately commence; but never, so far as I am aware, to the detriment of public business or the inconvenience of this House. I have always been in my place after Easter, and have remained till at least the 20th July; and then, when the Scotch Members are generally more intent on preparations for the 12th of August than on legislative action, I have sometimes gone down to Scotland immediately after that date. It is my duty to be here, and I have always endeavoured to adhere to it. When this question was before Parliament in 1858 the supporters of the proposition now adopted by the hon. and gallant Member, could recollect only one instance in which the Lord Advocate had not been in his place in Parliament when public business required it. What was that? It did happen in 1857 that—not in order to cultivate private practice, but in the discharge of my duty as public prosecutor—I went down to Scotland to conduct a very celebrated trial for murder, which was then exciting, I believe, more interest both in and out of Parliament than any Parliamentary business that was going on. Something similar happened this very year. My hon. and gallant Friend has referred to the occasion when I was not present to give an explanation in regard to the Court of Justiciary Bill. At that time I had gone to Scotland to attend the trial of the Pampero—the Confederate vessel built in the Clyde—which was then going on in the Court of Session. I thought it desirable that I should be there, for the case was of a very important and anxious character, and I am glad I was present, for I think the result of the matter was to benefit the country, and to vindicate the law. These are the only two occasions when Scotch business has come on here when I have been absent during the eleven years I have had a seat in this House. I ask, are these matters on which you can found such a Motion as this? Of course, if the Lord Advocate is incompetent to discharge his duties, that is one consideration; but if the Motion is brought under the idea that the Lord Advocate attends to his private practice in Edinburgh, to the injury and detriment of the public business in Parliament, then I repudiate it altogether. Such has never been my custom. I am not subject to any such imputation, and neither have my predecessors in office been subject to it. [Sir JAMES FERGUSSON: I never made that charge.] Then let us discard this part of the question. Well, the second head of the indictment is that the Lord Advocate, from his position and functions, cannot introduce and carry important measures in this House. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock, that there may sometimes be something even better than legislation—there may be letting it alone. Over-legislation is not desirable, and I am not sure that occasionally we have not been in danger of running into that evil. It is not two years since the Scotch Members were, I believe, very much inclined to beg of me to legislate no more, for they thought I was rather too prolific of measures than the reverse. If an official were appointed for the express purpose of carrying on legislation, there might be some risk of his overdoing it. Suppose there was an ardent law reformer—such as the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire seemed to have in his mind's eye—who was honestly, but rather incoherently, possessed by the idea that the world of Scotland was out of joint, and that he was specially born to set it right, that the unfortunate land was devoured by sinecurists like a flight of locusts, that the law was barbarous, that the lawyers were incompetent or worse, and who was ready to run into a crusade to remedy all sorts of fancied abuses; why, then, I say that anything more undesirable for Scotch legislation I am unable to conceive. But is it true that this state of things exists? Is there the slightest warrant for the suggestion that most important measures have not been carried for Scotland? I will just take the liberty of sketching briefly and rapidly the legislation that has taken place during the last ten years. In 1853, the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire will be pleased to know, we undertook a reform of the Sheriff Courts. The hon. Member for Ayrshire must at least admit that there was no complaint that year of the absence of the Lord Advocate. We had daily, or rather nightly, discussions upon the Bill; it was referred to a Select Committee, where it was carefully considered; it was finally passed, and has proved in all respects successful. In the same year, we accomplished a more important work. We put an end to a long-pending controversy by abolishing the tests imposed on Professors in the lay chairs of the Universities of Scotland. That Bill was not long, but it was most important, for it laid the foundation upon which my right hon. Friend the Lord Justice Clerk was afterwards able to build the great measure of University reform which was passed in 1858. In 1854 we passed two Acts of great consequence. One was the Act for the Registration of Births, Deaths, and Marriages, which had been attempted before, but without success. It was in that year, under the charge of my noble Friend the Member for East Lothian (Lord Elcho), carried through the House after ample discussion, and is now in full and useful operation. The other was the Valuation Act, which is one of some moment, for reforms of much importance have already been engrafted on it, and it may still lead to more. In 1855 no measures of any great consequence were passed. It has been said that measures have failed in consequence of the absence of the Lord Advocate, and of their having been introduced too late to receive proper consideration. Does my hon. and gallant Friend remember the Education Bill of 1855? I am indebted to my hon. Friend for a most fair and liberal consideration of that proposal; but was it lost because the Lord Advocate did not introduce it in time? It was introduced on the 23rd of March, and was read a third time on the 12th of July, after many discussions, various Amendments, and keen opposition. That Bill was passed in this House, not in the indolent and slovenly manner in which some hon. Members choose to represent that Scotch business was conducted, but after long, severe, and searching criticism; and all I can say is, that if the same liberal spirit had prevailed in another place that was displayed here, the measure might have been passed that Session, and we should have been relieved at this day of a great many of the difficulties which now impede the course of Education in Scotland. In 1856, the first Bill we passed is one to which I am entitled to refer with gratification—the Bill for the reform of the Bankruptcy Law of Scotland. For the first time in the legislation of the country, a Bankruptcy Act was obtained, which gave substantially general, I may say universal, satisfaction. Another of the measures of 1856 had for its object the reform of the Court of Exchequer in Scotland. That was a very technical matter; but those who recollect what the old Court of Exchequer was must admit that the reform was very necessary and useful. The Session of 1857 was marked by the passing of the Bills for establishment of County Police and for regulating Lunacy. I remember the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), remarking of these two Bills that they were specimens of hasty legislation. I can only say that the County Police Act has been very successful in its operation, and has led to the establishment of a very efficient force. In regard to the Lunacy Act, I own it was passed with rapidity, and required to undergo amendment afterwards;

but it has proved a measure of great social benefit. In 1858, when the right hon. Gentlemen opposite were in office, my right hon. Friend the Lord Justice Clerk in that year carried that great measure of University reform after considerable discussion, but substantially with the support of all sides of the House. The country is greatly indebted to my right hon. Friend for that measure, and not less for his able and laborious discharge of the less prominent but almost more important functions of Chairman of the Commission. I really do not think it is necessary to weary the patience of the House by going further into our legislative performances. I have said enough to show that we have not shirked or slurred over our work. I have produced a catalogue of measures passed between 1853 and 1858, which will contrast favourably with those passed for England or Ireland during the same period. I may remind the House that in 1861 there was a measure of considerable importance, for we again put an end to a long and weary controversy, and succeeded at last, after many, many years of discussion, in abolishing the tests taken by parochial schoolmasters. In that measure we laid a foundation on which a great work may yet be raised. I believe that as surely as the abolition of the tests in the Universities paved the way for the reform of those institutions, so the Bill passed in 1861 for the abolition of the tests to parochial schoolmasters is destined to become the basis and ground work of a large and comprehensive national system of education. There was one Session in the ten years of which I have been speaking when we did not do much. We spent the Session of 1861, with the exception I have mentioned, substantially in doing nothing. We commenced this arduous task on the 15th March, and ended it on the 19th July. The two questions on which our energies were expended were a Salmon and a Road Bill. None who took part in the discussions of that year will be likely to forget them. The Salmon Bill was brought in on the 15th March, and the Road Bill on the 28th, and we had a Select Committee on each, which sat for many days. We took a great deal of pains and trouble with both Bills; but I am sorry to say that the result was that the Road Bill was withdrawn on the 15th July, and that we were "counted out" on the Salmon Bill by my hon. Friend the Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Robertson) on the 19th of the same month. The failure of the Salmon Bill was certainly not owing to the absence of the Lord Advocate, or to any want of energy on the part of its supporters. It was one of those accidents inherent to the nature of legislation in this House. There were interests which required to be conciliated, and it was found impossible at that time to come to a settlement with them. Next year, however, a Salmon Bill was carried, which, I believe, has been productive of advantage. In regard to the Road Bill, although lost in 1861, we have since seen county after county come to Parliament for private Bills at their own private expense, to do the very things we proposed to do in that Bill. That, then, is my reply to the charge that we do not introduce important measures, and that sufficient time and attention is not given to the consideration of Scotch business. During the ten years which I have been reviewing, over a hundred Bills have been passed into law, so that it is perfectly plain that the allegation that Scotch business is neglected, and that Scotch legislation is not carried to a successful issue, is contradicted by the facts. Then it is said that the Bills are imperfect, and that they are passed in a state which amazed the people of Scotland. Are those measures which I have been enumerating, the Valuation, the Bankruptcy, the Registration of Births, Deaths, and Marriages, the Sheriff Courts, and other Acts, open to that criticism? I say No. The true test was what amount of litigation had arisen on them. Comparing them with other measures of the same magnitude passed for other divisions of the empire, a very small proportion indeed of questions have arisen for the adjudication of the courts of law in connection with these Scotch Acts. There were some persons who delighted to detect errors in an Act of Parliament, and to trumpet forth the discovery by way of showing how critical they were and how faulty was the legislation. The proper way, however, of judging laws was to look to their effect. Do they benefit the class on whose behalf they have been passed? Do they remedy the evils at which they have been aimed? On the whole, I contend that the measures we have carried will stand that test. No doubt the Bankruptcy Act was not the most careful or perfect specimen of legislation; but it was quickly amended, and its operation has been completely successful. If Bills are sometimes passed which are not exactly models of composition, you must remember what sort of a manufactory of statutes this House is. One cannot sit down and write off an Act like an essay. It is subject to all sorts of alterations during its passage through the House; and it is impossible in every case to prevent errors and perhaps some slight inconsistencies from creeping in. If the machinery furnished by the House of Commons for framing laws is not scientifically precise in its working, that is the price we have to pay for Constitutional Government, and we must just make the best of it. To illustrate the system, let me just take the Education Bill to which I have already adverted. I introduced it about the middle of March, but I was asked to defer the second reading for a considerable period in order that the country might have an opportunity of expressing an opinion with regard to its provisions. I was, of course, obliged to comply with that request. The second reading having been fixed for the 15th April, a further postponement was desired, because the Commissioners of Supply were shortly to meet, and it would be well to hear what they had to say. Again I was obliged to yield, because I knew the force of opposition, and the Bill was put off till the 18th May. When that day arrived, another hon. Member got up and said, You will not surely think of going on with this Bill until you learn the opinion of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, which has charge of the schools, and which is just about to meet; so the measure has again to be postponed, but at length comes on for a second reading in the second week in June. We go into Committee, and the paper is crowded with Amendments. I know that a Standing Order has been passed in another place not to take the second reading of any Bill after the 30th June. Consequently I am pushed for time. I am obliged to accept Amendments, for the sake of progress, without having a fair opportunity of considering them. Well, we get through Committee, and then more Amendments are brought up on the Report. I have no alternative except to agree to them or lose the Bill. It is wonderful then, if, under such circumstances, a Bill sometimes gets passed which is not a model of grammatical accuracy? When errors thus creep into Acts, all we can do is to introduce an amending Bill in the succeeding year; and I cannot admit that necessity for such rectification involves any slur on the proceedings of the previous Session.

The last objection which is made is that the Lord Advocate, being a practising lawyer, has too many functions to perform. It is quite true that his office does embrace a variety of functions which in England are divided; but Scotland is not such a very large country, and, after some considerable experience of the office, I can say that the duties are not so numerous, responsible, or important as to be beyond the power of one man, with reasonable attention and diligence, to discharge. If the assistance tendered to me were given, I should really not know what use to make of it. A large portion of the duties of the Lord Advocate, including all relating to the Home Office and legal questions, could not be transferred to an assistant. The necessity of having a separate official for Scotland is due to the existence of a different legal system in that country. That distinction goes to the root of the whole civil and religious system of Scotland. There is hardly a part of that system which you can touch without an acquaintance with the law of Scotland. The hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Smollett) seems to think that the reform of the Marriage Law should be intrusted to some one who is not a lawyer. But that is just an instance of the danger of proceeding in that way. It may be true that the Marriage Law of Scotland requires reform; but the people of Scotland have not yet demanded any change, and a few sensation cases or sensation articles happening not so much in as out of the country, do not afford sufficient ground for new legislation on so important a subject. Moreover, my right hon. Friend the Lord Justice Clerk on a former occasion showed very clearly that it is not only not undesirable that the Lord Advocate should be intrusted substantially with the charge of Scotch business in the House, but that he has peculiar facilities for it which no other person possesses, and which arise from his position as public prosecutor. My hon. Friend, who appears to be but imperfectly informed upon the subject of the criminal law of Scotland, has declared that it is defective, and that the powers of the public prosecutor are contrary to the principles of the constitution. I entirely demur to that. I am satisfied that under the criminal system of Scotland the liberty of the subject is perfectly secure, and that it works admirably both for the discovery of crime and—what is certainly not less important—the protection of innocence. My hon. Friend has referred to coroners' inquests and grand juries; but I have heard the utility of both these tribunals gravely questioned in England. A system under which inquiry is made into criminal charges without unnecessary publicity tends, I am convinced, very much to the detection of the guilty, and to preventing charges reaching the public ear against persons who turn out in the end to be completely innocent. But the question is as to the position of the Lord Advocate. He is an officer of State in Scotland; and has under his command the staff, not only of advocate deputies, but of procurator-fiscals throughout the country, by means of whom he can, on the shortest notice, collect information on all subjects. If there were a Secretary of State for Scotland in London, he would have to apply to the Lord Advocate for information at every turn, and do at second-hand what the Lord Advocate now does at first-hand. He would have to seek facts as well as law from the Lord Advocate, and the consequence would be that the latter would continue to exercise the same power as now, only with diminished responsibility. My hon. and gallant Friend says that this office is the great prize to which the Bar of Scotland look forward. In one sense it can scarcely be so described, for unquestionably, in point of emolument or prospects, it does not hold out any very golden or glittering temptation. A counsel in large practice is not a gainer by accepting the position I have now the honour to hold; and there is no prospect opening beyond it. There is no promotion, no peerage to look forward to. There are none of those prizes which are within the reach of the Law Officers of England and Ireland. Yet the office has one recommendation, and it is a great one to a generous mind. It has the recommendation that it affords the means of doing much good to the country. It holds out that most honourable object of ambition—the opportunity of using power for its only true and legitimate end, the advantage of the nation. It offers the highest and purest reward of patriotism—the consciousness that one is placed in a position where, by diligence and assiduity, one may be of use in one's day and generation.

MR. SMOLLETT: Sir, I did not intend to address the House, but I have been so much referred to by the right hon. and learned Lord, I hope the House will allow me to make a few remarks. A few nights ago, when, for the first time this Session, a Motion was brought forward connected with Scotch business, I ventured to say that the business of Scotland was conducted in a very unsatisfactory manner. That observation seems to have excited the anger of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and he seems to think that I have personally attacked him. He has charged me with libelling all the great institutions of Scotland. Now, my observations were meant to refer to the system which prevails in Scotland of placing the legislative authority in the hands of a practising barrister. That, I think, is a very erroneous system. I did not mean to make a personal attack upon the learned Lord, whose abilities and kindness are recognized by both sides of the House. What I did say was, that the present system was defective, and that there was no part of the kingdom where larger legal reforms were required than in Scotland; and that we could not get them. On the occasion to which I have referred, I observed that the Court of Session in Scotland were so strangely constituted as to be obstructions to justice—that they could hardly be called courts of justice—and I now repeat that observation. Last Session the right hon. and learned Gentleman brought in a Bill to amend the procedure of the Courts of Session—the Court of Session Procedure Bill. Well, after it was introduced, it was not pressed with any great alacrity, and it was eventually withdrawn. That Bill, I understand, has since been referred to the Faculty of Advocates, to the Writers to the Signet, and to the Solicitors of the Supreme Courts, and it has been torn to tatters by these learned bodies. I am not aware that it has been introduced again this Session, nor do I know that it will be introduced. In the course of the last autumn, a practising barrister in Edinburgh—a friend of the Lord Advocate—sent me a pamphlet in favour of the Court of Session Procedure Bill. The writer states that the population of Scotland has greatly increased within the last forty or fifty years, if it has not actually doubled, and that its wealth is five or six times as great as it was at the commencement of that period; but that, notwithstanding this, the business of the Court of Session has absolutely decreased—that it is gradually becoming less and less, and that some reform must take place before litigants will be induced to come to it. The writer goes on to say that the English Courts have been reformed; that the Court of Chancery in England is very different from what it was in the glorious days of Lord Eldon; that the procedure in the Court of Queen's Bench, the Court of Common Pleas, and other law courts has been amended, both with regard to the litigants and the legal gentlemen practising in these Courts. These changes, he says, have been attended with great success; whilst the practice in the Scotch Courts is departing from them on account of their forms being so abominable and detestable, and their expense so enormous. Now, I think we ought to have a thorough reform in these Courts. I believe the Bill of last year was a tolerably good one. My only objection to it is, that it does not go far enough—that it does not put an end to that abominable jargon with which the proceedings of the Courts are disguised, such as the word "multipoleinding" and many others even worse, which even the practising barristers themselves do not understand. The Bill does not abolish what is called the Outer House. Perhaps some English and Irish Members may not know anything about the meaning of that term. If so, I will inform them that it consists of five Scotch Judges, who sit outside obstructing the portals of the Court of Session. They sit separately, and every person who wishes to obtain justice must undergo the ordeal of having his case sifted by one of these Judges. The case is heard, discussed, answered, and a variety of other processes are gone through, and then it is permitted to enter the Inner House. In fact, the case has to be tried two or three times over at a most intolerable expense. No reform of these courts of justice will be worth a straw unless the Outer House be abolished. But you will have to wait a hundred years, and more than that, before you will find any Lord Advocate trying to abolish these Judges. Reference has been made to the Sheriff's Court Act of 1853-4. Now, I think the Sheriffs' Courts require a great deal of reform. The Bill which the hon. and learned Gentleman congratulates himself on having passed doubled and trebled the pay of the sheriffs. These courts do not work badly, but they are most anomalous courts. A sheriff is appointed a County Court Judge. He is appointed by the Crown, but he is not allowed to reside within his sheriffship. The law provides that he shall be a practising barrister, and he must live in Edinburgh. He must walk the courts there whether he has any practice or not. A person may very naturally ask—How then is justice administered in these courts? It is done in this sort of way. The sheriff, who is called a sheriff-depute, appoints a substitute. If he paid that substitute it would be all very well. But he is paid by the country. He sits de diem in diem to transact the business of the Court in the county town, whilst the sheriff, who lives in Edinburgh, comes out in the vacation, hears appeals, obstructs the business, and by the delay incurred he makes the law more expensive than it would otherwise be. The substitute is paid £700 or £800 a year. He is not supposed to be a servant of the Crown; the Lord Advocate holds him responsible to the sheriff who appointed him. Such a system ought to be abolished at once. But, I ask, will any Lord Advocate bring in a Bill to abolish the office of sheriff's substitute? No such thing; for a change of that kind would interfere too much with the patronage of the Crown. The Court of Session is so bereft of business that the Bar would not get sufficient practice to keep themselves were it not for some twenty-five or thirty offices which, when they get hold of them, they can hold with great advantages to themselves. With the exception, perhaps, of Glasgow and Lanark, there ought to be one sheriff in each county capable of performing the duty without having another sheriff to look after him. I intimated the other night that other reforms are required, and said that we need a reform of the law of marriage, a reform of the law of succession, and a reform of the law of domicile. And what sort of reply did I receive? Why, "You are an independent Member, and had better bring in such Bills yourself." I will tell the hon. and learned Gentleman my opinion on these subjects. It is this. The Scotch people want to have the law changed on these points—they want to have it assimilated to the law of England. ["No!"] Now, I think this should be done. If the Motion of my hon. and gallant Friend should be carried, and Her Majesty should be pleased to appoint a Secretary of State for Scotland, that Secretary of State might introduce the measures required of him, and, with the assistance of the Lord Advocate, carry them through Parliament. Instead of bringing in good social measures, what kind of Bills have been recently introduced? We had a Salmon Fisheries Bill, which was counted out by the hon. Member for Berwickshire. Then we had a Herring Fishery Bill. We have had a Bill to put down trawling. This year we have had a Rivers Pollution Bill, which I believe has come to a sudden death. Fish are certainly well taken care of in Scotland, but Scotchmen are not so well attended to. I believe that so long as we have the Parliamentary duties of Scotland intrusted to a Lord Advocate, a practising barrister—so long as he has a host of retainers to serve about the Parliament House, we shall not obtain those legal reforms which the country requires. Every Scotch Bill is canvassed in Edinburgh, and the first consideration is, how will it affect the interests of the Parliament House—how will it affect the interests of gentlemen connected with the Scottish Bar? Scotland is loaded with legal sinecures, and so long as the present system continues, we shall never get rid of them. Whether the Lord Advocate is a Conservative, or whether he sits amongst those who call themselves Liberals, the evils which are complained of will never be removed until a change is made in the system. If my hon. and gallant Friend takes the sense of the House on his Motion, I shall certainly give him my support.

MR. CARNEGIE: I trust the hon. and gallant Gentleman will not press his Motion to a division, but will be satisfied with the expression of opinion which has taken place. It would be very inconvenient for many hon. Members to have the matter pressed upon them, and I think it would also be undesirable to have a division on a Scotch question unless it should be supported by a very large number of Members. If Scotland is not nearly agreed that a change ought to take place, it would be a great pity to unsettle the present state of affairs by referring the matter now under consideration to a Select Committee. I think the Lord Advocate has made out an excellent case as to the general practical efficiency of the existing system; at the same time, I think that, theoretically, it seems to be a very extraordinary one. I quite agree in the opinion which has been expressed by the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire, that so far as regards Scotch legislation, too much deference is paid to the interests of the Parliament House and a particular clique in Edinburgh. This grievance was hardly touched on by the hon. and gallant Member for Ayrshire; but I wish to draw the attention of the present Lord Advocate, and all future Lord Advocates, to the fact, in the hope that they will look a little more to the general interests of Scotland, and a little less to the peculiar interests of Edinburgh. If the plan continues of deferring everything to the desires of Edinburgh, and nothing to the desires of the country, I confidently predict that the people of Scotland will eventually require some change of the system.

MR. ROBERTSON: It was not my intention to take part in the present debate, nor should I have done so if it had not been for the personal matters which have been introduced into the debate by my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate. My right hon. and learned Friend says, that it was I who counted him out on the Salmon Fisheries Bill. That is altogether incorrect, although I certainly hold many of the views which were expressed on that occasion by the hon. Member for Edinburgh. I must say that I entertain very strong objections to the Bill, and the reason that the House was counted out was that the time at which the measure came on for discussion was half past two or a quarter to three in the morning, and it was considered that that was not a proper hour to go into discussion on so important a question. Perhaps, I may be allowed to make one remark in regard to what has fallen from the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Smollett). The hon. Member remarked that during the absence of the Lord Advocate from this House, Scotch business was in danger of coming to a stand-still. That is hardly the case, because we have in the House an hon. Member who is commonly called the Scotch Lord of the Treasury, and I believe that my hon. Friend (Sir William Dunbar) is always ready to give his advice and the best assistance he can render to all who have occasion to go to him.

MR. MURE: I rise simply for the purpose of joining in the recommendation which has been made to the hon. Baronet the Member for Ayr, not to press his Motion to a division. I recollect perfectly well what took place when a Motion on his subject was submitted which involved the direct appointment of a Secretary of State for Scotland. How was that Motion received by both sides of the House? It was the distinct opinion of the House that there were no such relations between the people of Scotland and the business of the House which required such an appointment. I was extremely anxious to hear what my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr could say in addition to what was said upon that occasion, and after having attentively listened to his speech, I must say I have been unable to discover any ground for his Motion, or that a better case has been made out why a different course should be pursued now from that which was taken in 1858. As that time, as now, the noble Viscount (Viscount Palmerston) was at the head of Her Majesty's Government. He had had experience in the Home Office as well as in other departments of the State, and he made a most minute and full reply to the Motion of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter). The explanations which were then given carried, in my opinion, conviction to the minds of every one who heard them, and would carry a similar conviction now. The noble Lord then told the House that, if a Secretary of State were appointed, there would really be no duty of any importance for him to discharge. That being the case, what is it that my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Ayr seeks to attain by the appointment of a Select Committee? If a Committee were appointed they would, I presume, call before them those who have had experience in the office of Lord Advocate. They would also have from the noble Viscount the Prime Minister the explanation which he made in 1858, and which then satisfied Parliament that there was no foundation and no ground whatever for the Motion. They would probably also examine the right hon. Member for Bucks (Mr. Disraeli), who likewise spoke on that occasion, and explained the reasons why he thought there was no necessity for an alteration of the present system. They would probably also examine the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who has, perhaps, had as extended and as wide an experience of the duties of that Department as any one, and who is perfectly cognizant of the duties required of the Home Secretary and of the Lord Advocate, and who would no doubt state to the Committee that there is no necessity whatever for the establishment of such an office as the Motion now before the House contemplates. The appointment of a Select Committee would therefore do nothing more than bring out a repetition of the statements which have already been made to Parliament by the noble Lord at the head of the Government and others, and which satisfied Parliament that there was no necessity for a change. I think, therefore, that this Motion would be productive of no good, and I concur with the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Carnegie) in suggesting that the Motion should not be pressed to a division. I do not wish to detain the House by attempting to answer the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton; but my hon. Friend stated as one of the reasons why the Motion should be agreed to that certain measures of law reform are necessary. Now, I do not know how a Secretary of State, who is not a lawyer, could conduct those legal reforms which my hon. Friend suggests; and how any one, if not a lawyer of the same capacity as my right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate, would have the confidence of the people of Scotland in undertaking the responsibility, I am at a loss to imagine. I certainly heard with surprise some of the remarks of my hon. Friend in reference to the law of domicile. For some years back the Scotch Judges have been endeavouring to assimilate the law in that respect as near as possible to that of England, and it is now very nearly assimilated. That being the case, I should certainly like to know what Bill my hon. Friend wishes to introduce to reform the law of domicile. Some of the remarks which fell from my hon. Friend I heard with great regret; and I am sorry that he did not follow the example of the hon. and gallant Member for Ayr in avoiding all personalities. My hon. Friend insinuated that the desire of the Lord Advocate to reclaim the patronage of what he was pleased to call sinecure offices, prevented him from going on with legal reforms last Session, and from introducing any measure with that object in the present Session. I believe that such observations as those which have fallen from my hon. Friend will be read with very great regret in Scotland. No man who ever held the office of Lord Advocate is less open to such imputations than my right hon. Friend the present holder of that office. The remarks of my hon. Friend with regard to the emoluments of the legal profession, show how ignorant he must be with regard to the profession to which I have the honour to belong, and of the mode by which it best flourishes. Nothing could be better for the Lord Advocate, or for the legal profession generally, than incessant changes in the law, and the institution of new forms of procedure by which the law is administered. They are certain to introduce an immense mass of litigation, and the passing of such measures invariably affords employment to the profession to which I have the honour to belong. Under all the circumstances, I sincerely trust that my hon. and gallant Friend will not press his Motion to a division.

SIR WILLIAM DUNBAR: It may appear superfluous and even presumptuous in me to attempt to add a single word to the lucid and exhaustive statement which has just been addressed to the House by my learned Friend the Lord Advocate; but I hope, nevertheless, that I may be permitted to offer one or two brief observations upon the subject-matter of the Motion now under consideration. When the same Motion, or one with a similar object, was brought forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) in 1858, I abstained from voting on that occasion, because my mind was not definitely made up upon the subject. But whatever may have been my doubts then, further reflection, combined with the five years' experience I have gained in the office I have now the honour to hold, has satisfied me that no substantial advantage would be derived from any change — or, at all events, any material change — in the administration of Scotch affairs in this House. The hon. and gallant Member for Ayrshire, who introduced the Motion, has disclaimed any intention of finding fault with the present management of Scotch business; but if his Motion has any meaning at all, it must mean that he considers it unsatisfactory. That, no doubt, is his honest opinion, and it has the sanction of some other Scotch Members; but I make bold to say that that opinion is not shared by the House generally. If there is one thing more than another connected with the transactions and proceedings of this House which I have heard remarked upon with commendation by hon. Members on both sides of the House with whom I am in constant intercourse, it is the mode in which Scotch measures are brought forward and carried through. I, for my part, do not believe that business is less efficiently performed because it is quietly and unostentatiously conducted; nor do I consider that it detracts from the importance or the efficacy and usefulness of public measures that they do not provoke strong differences of opinion or any discussions in this House. Until a very recent occasion, such discussions have always been avoided, and I attribute the happy circumstance to the easy intercourse and mutual confidence which have subsisted between the Lord Advocate and the representatives for Scotland, and their antecedent agreement upon all material points involved in the legislation which has been introduced by him. But while I say this, I am not here to deny that there are some slight practical inconveniences connected with the present system. But I would ask whether it would be possible to set up any machinery which would not occasionally fail to perform its functions with the exactitude and regularity that might be expected from it, or which might be desirable? Occasional failure is the utmost that in my judgment can be alleged to the prejudice of the present system; but after the fullest consideration that I have been able to give to the subject I certainly know of nothing which you could substitute in its stead that would work more smoothly, or produce more solid or satisfactory results as I think my right hon. and learned Friend has convincingly shown. If there is anything which we have to complain of, it is not the dearth but the superabundance of legislation—not the too little, but the too great interference in matters of that kind. But, be that as it may, my belief is that the remedy for the defect which is stated to exist is not to be found, as the hon. and gallant Baronet's Motion implies, in the appointment of one or more additional paid functionaries to represent and watch over Scottish interests in this House. However plausible in theory, the proposition is one which I am sure would be found extremely inconvenient in practice. If the hon. Baronet should succeed in persuading the House to adopt his Motion; and if, under the influence of his preconceptions, the Committee which might be appointed should accede to his proposal—then I will venture to say his real difficulties will begin. If he should be called upon to give practical effect to his views, he would find it no easy task to do so. He would find it no easy task to define the duties of the new functionary, or to assign him his true position. If he is to be responsible, I should like to know how the hon. Baronet proposes to reconcile responsibility with subordination? And if he is to be independent—and unless he can think and act for himself in all matters pertaining to his Department he would be powerless for good matters—I should like to know how the hon. Baronet would propose to reconcile that independence with the legitimate authority of the Home Secretary in matters not legal on the one hand, or with that of the Lord Advocate in matters strictly legal on the other? But difficult as he would find it to bring conflicting authorities into harmony, his new functionary would be still more puzzled to know how to employ his time. He would have little or nothing to do; and like most persons who have nothing to do, he would endeavour to carve out work for himself—to use a homely phrase, he would fall into mischief—and the result would be that he would become a source of greater embarrassment and danger to the Government with which he might be connected than useful to the country whose interests he is supposed to represent. For these and other reasons which I need not enter into, I intend to record my vote against the Motion. I cannot sit down without adverting to certain expressions which fell from the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire (Major Hamilton). I must say that the mode in which he has alluded to alleged private conversations in this House is one which I, for one, cannot approve of. Such a course must necessarily occasion great inconvenience—

MAJOR HAMILTON: I rise to Order, Sir. I beg to say that I made no reference to any private conversation. If the hon. Baronet will be good enough to inform me what it was, I will at once refute it.

SIR WILLIAM DUNBAR: I speak, Sir, under correction. I certainly understood the hon. Member to say that I had stated either to him or to somebody else that, as I am connected with the Duchy of Cornwall, I did not feel myself occupying the position of a representative of Scotch interests.

MAJOR HAMILTON: I admit that the hon. Baronet did use words to that effect in public, but, as far as I know, not privately.

MR. SPEAKER: The remarks of the hon. Member are out of Order.

MAJOR HAMILTON: I must again repeat that the observations of the hon. Baronet were made in public, not in private.

SIR WILLIAM DUNBAR: Then I beg to give the statement of the hon.

Gentleman the most emphatic denial. I never stated that my connection with the Duchy of Cornwall prevented me from considering myself as the representative of Scotch interests. What I may have said is this—That I did not hold myself responsible for the legal business in reference to Scotland, which is introduced entirely upon the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

EPHING FOREST.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. TORRENS said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to take any steps to carry out, completely or partially, the recommendations contained in the Report of the Select Committee on Royal Forests in Essex of last Session; whether any encroachments or enclosures have been reported to have been made within the forests since the date of that Report; and, if so, whether they have taken place on portions of the forest wherein the rights of the Crown had been sold or not? He begged to remind the House that in 1862 they addressed the Crown with a view to prevent further steps being taken to facilitate the legalization of the encroachments in Epping Forest. It appeared from a Return which had been presented, that the Crown rights over 5,000 acres within the forest had been sold for the paltry sum of £18,000 to various individuals, some of whom claimed to be lords of manors; but the greater number of the purchasers of the Crown rights made no such claim; and, on the strength of these purchases, the buyers of the Crown rights proceeded to enclose right and left wholly disregarding of the rights of the commoners and of the public. By the evidence before the Select Committee which considered this subject, the mode was disclosed in which such bargains were made. Persons first of all were allowed to encroach illegally upon the property of the Crown, and then they were invited by a circular letter or notice from the Department of Woods and Forests to purchase the rights of the Crown under a threat of legal proceedings. The Select Committee had strongly animadverted upon the notices thus issued by the Department. That proceeding was explained on the ground that it was desirable to avoid the expenses of a litigation, as the only court in which the rights of the commoners could be tried was the Court of Exchequer; and one witness had stated that the expense of such a suit would be at least £1,500. Formerly there was the Verderer's Court which tried such questions, but that had fallen into abeyance; and although the Royal Commission appointed by Act of Parliament in 1850 had recommended the establishment of some tribunal for the disposal of questions arising out of the Crown forests, yet no substitute for the Verderer's Court had been provided. Hence arose all the illegal enclosures and oppressive acts of which the commoners and the inhabitants of the eastern parts of London, who have been debarred from healthy recreation in the forest, so justly complained. The Junior Commissioner of Woods and Forests was generally believed to have the management of Epping Forest, and that Gentleman had stated before the Committee that his Department could take no notice of the wants of the public as it was only a Revenue department, and, further, that he thought the Crown should dispose of the land without regard to the convenience and enjoyment of the people. He (Mr. Torrens) could not help expressing great astonishment at such a doctrine, enunciated by a servant of the public, paid from the money of the people, whose interests it was his bounden duty to attend to. It was desirable to hear from the right hon. Gentleman what the views of the Government really were with regard to carrying out the recommendations of the Select Committee of last Session.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "there be laid before this House, a Copy of any Orders or Correspondence regarding inclosures in the Royal Forests in Essex since, or in consequence of, the Report of the Select Committee of last Session,"—(Mr. Torrens,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. PEEL said, the Committee of last Session had fully ascertained the nature of the Crown interest in Epping Forest; and it was of importance that the nature of that interest should be fully understood. The Crown had no property either in the soil or the timber. The forest belonged wholly to private persons, the lords of the manors, copyholders and others, subject only to the

Crown's forestal right, and the right of the commoners to turn out their cows and horses upon the wastes. The forestal right of the Crown was merely the right of keeping deer in the forest, but as there were no deer in the forest and could not be, because the forest was intersected by railways and near a crowded population, the right of the Crown simply amounted to the right of preventing fences being put up, and so keeping the forest an unenclosed waste. As there was no means of producing any revenue, and it was not consistent with the original purpose for which the right was created, nor fair to the lords of manors and other owners of property, to convert it into an instrument for making the forest a sort of park, a Royal Commission some years ago recommended that the Crown rights should be sold. Subsequently, and about ten years ago, the Law Officers of the Crown having been consulted upon the propriety of instituting legal proceedings to prevent certain encroachments, also advised that those rights should be sold, and the Treasury adopted that advice. Sales accordingly were made from time to time until the beginning of last year, when there remained only about 3,000 acres over which the Crown possessed the bare forestal rights in question. At that time the House agreed to an Address to Her Majesty to preserve the open spaces in the forest for the use of the people, and since then no rights had been sold, and no negotiations carried on, except in cases in which the purchase-money had been already paid. Shortly after a Committee was appointed for the purpose of considering the subject, and they agreed to a Report and made certain recommendations to which the hon. Gentleman had called attention with a view to ascertain how far the Government were prepared to act upon them. The Committee in the first instance stated that they did not consider it just that those forestal rights should be maintained for the purpose of preventing enclosures by the owners of the soil; and they recommended that a Bill should be introduced with the object of enclosing the whole of the forest, with the exception of certain spaces which were to be reserved under the general provisions of the Enclosure Act as places of recreation for the people, and that those spaces should be enlarged by the purchase of adjacent pieces of ground. They likewise recommended that any encroachments which had taken place upon the wastes of the forest, where the right of the Crown had not been purchased or redeemed, should be abated, and that legal proceedings, if necessary, should be taken for that purpose. As far as he knew, no enclosures or encroachments had been reported to have taken place since that time. But a very considerable encroachment to the extent of 300 acres was made some time ago by a gentleman who had not purchased the rights of the Crown, and he had more than once been made acquainted that the Crown might take proceedings for the purpose of securing proper consideration of its rights. The question whether such proceedings should be taken was referred to the Law Officers of the Crown; but they were of opinion that those proceedings would be attended with very considerable expense, and they called attention to the Address to the Crown last Session, having for its object to prevent the sale of forestal rights, and to the fact that even if the rights of the Crown were vindicated at great expense they would be of no use for purposes of revenue, because, according to that Address, they were to continue unsold. He thought it would be desirable if the opinion of the House as expressed in the Address of last year should be held to be superseded by the recommendation of the Committee, to the effect that the rights of the Crown should not be maintained for the purpose of preventing enclosures in the forest. It was hardly consistent with the principles of the Land Revenue Act, or the Act passed when the separation was made between the Offices of Woods and Works, that the revenue of the Crown lands should be used for the purpose of providing public parks. The principle of the Land Revenue Acts was that the Woods and Forests was a department of Revenue only, and they were not authorized to spend any of the revenues of the Crown lands except for the purpose of maintaining the property and paying the expenses of the collection and management of its revenue. Another recommendation of the Committee was that supposing the forests to be enclosed and spaces set apart for the recreation of the people, those spaces should be increased by the purchase of other spaces, but they did not show whence the money was to come. They neither recommended that the money raised by the sale of the rights of the Crown should be applied to the purchase of such recreation grounds, nor that a public grant should be obtained from the House for the purpose. He did not know whether it was contemplated that such a fund should be provided by the Metropolitan Board of Works by means of a tax levied upon the metropolis. But if those difficulties could be got rid of—if the address of the House should be considered no longer applicable after the Report of the Committee, and if funds should be provided either by a metropolitan rate, or in any other manner, for the purpose of making a public park, there would be no obstacle in the way of carrying out the recommendations of the Committee of last Session. He did not feel justified at present in producing the correspondence asked for by the hon. Gentleman.

MR. PEACOCKE said, the right hon. Gentleman had somewhat underrated the importance of the rights of the Crown in Epping Forest. They carried with them a much greater importance than the right hon. Gentleman had stated, because upon the preservation of those rights depended the preservation of open spaces in the neighbourhood of this crowded metropolis, for the recreation of its inhabitants. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests were not to be blamed for the way in which they administered their trusts. That House alone was to be blamed. The responsibility of preserving spots for the recreation of the inhabitants of the metropolis rested solely with the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman had not quite correctly quoted the Report of the Committee. The Committee stated that there were two courses which might be pursued—the one was to discontinue the sale of the forestal rights of the Crown, vigilantly to preserve those rights without regard to cost, and to keep the forest in its present wild and unenclosed condition; the other was to ascertain the rights of the several parties interested, and to make provision, partly by these means and partly by purchase, to secure an adequate portion of the forest for purposes of health and recreation. It was not the intention of the Committee that the forestal rights should be discontinued, unless the second course was adopted. And, therefore, when the right hon. Gentleman stated that the Address of the House ought to be considered as overridden by the recommendation of the Committee, he was not justified in coming to that conclusion, for it was only on the express condition that Her Majesty's Government should entertain the recommendations contained in the Report

—a course to which Her Majesty's Government were not prepared to accede—that the vote of the House might be considered as overborne. The Committee was appointed on the Motion of the hon. Member for Carrickfergus (Mr. Torrens), but it so happened that the selection of the Members rested with the Attorney General, and the recommendation relied on by the right hon. Gentleman was carried in the Committee so constituted upon a division, by a vote of seven to five, and in the majority was one Gentleman who voted under a misapprehension. Therefore, when the right hon. Gentleman said that that recommendation of the Committee should be considered to have set aside the Vote of the House, he totally misapprehended the duty of Her Majesty's Government as well as of the Committee. The right of the Crown in 4,000 acres of Epping Forest had been sold, 3,000 acres still remained unenclosed, and 2,000 acres had been enclosed without purchase. With respect to those 2,000 acres the Committee had recommended that in those cases where enclosures had taken place without purchasing the rights of the Crown, immediate steps should be taken to assert those rights; and he wished to know whether the Government were prepared to carry that recommendation into effect. The Government appeared to be signally misinformed on the subject, for the right hon. Gentleman had stated that no further inclosure had taken place since the Report of the Committee. About a fortnight ago he rode into Epping Forest, and found enclosures taking place close to Woodford Wells, a very favourite spot for picnic parties, of which he had a visible illustration, for no fewer than from twenty to thirty families were there and then enjoying themselves. The Question was at present in a most unsatisfactory position. It was one moreover that ought not to be left in the hands of private Members. It was the duty of the Government to take the subject into their immediate consideration. A Committee upstairs could not know the nature of the localities, and it would be well if a Commission were sent down to the spot to select those portions of the forest most eligible for purposes of recreation, and the freehold of those portions should be purchased. There was a pressing necessity that these spaces for recreation, which were gradually disappearing from the neighbourhood of London, should be preserved.

MR. PERRY WATLINGTON said, he could not altogether concur in casting blame on the Government, but he thought that a Commission should be issued to inquire as to the best vacant sites for recreation purposes, and, where rights existed, how they could be compensated, so that suitable spaces for popular amusement might be maintained. The population at the east end of London, and that portion of Essex which he had the honour to represent, derived great enjoyment and benefit from occasional visits to Epping Forest, and to prevent the restriction of that enjoyment by the enclosures which, legally or illegally, were taking place in the district, it was necessary to adopt the course suggested by the hon. Member for Maldon. The population in the east of London was rapidly increasing. In one parish, West Ham, the population which in 1851 was only 15,000, had, in 1861, more than doubled. It was 38,000. They had evidence before the Committee that the forest was used by all classes of the people. It was a place of favourite public resort during the whole summer; and, on every day in the week, large schools were being constantly taken down in vans. On one occasion, as a witness stated, he had taken down sixty vans, containing 1,000 adults. It would be a great loss to the people to be deprived of such healthful resorts, and it was incumbent on the Government to take the proper steps to preserve at once the rights of the Crown and the means of recreation for the people. The Government were not blameless in the matter, for in the Forest of Hainault 2,000 acres of Crown land had been enclosed and all the timber swept away, the whole being now a large sweep of arable land, without a single acre being reserved for the recreation and enjoyment of the people. Something should be done to prevent further encroachment.

MR. COX said, he would congratulate the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down on his change of opinion on the subject. Lately, when the people of Finsbury were endeavouring to keep the forest for ever open for their recreation and health, the hon. Gentleman was a strong opponent of that course; but now that he found the population of West Ham was rapidly increasing and required the forest for recreation, he joined with those who exclaimed against forest enclosure. The position in which the question stood was this. The Crown was entitled to certain rights over the forests of Hainault and Epping, and if the Crown claimed those rights, the lands would be left very much in their present condition. But, for the last fifteen years, the Crown had sadly neglected its duty. Its rights were allowed to be encroached upon and their money value to be filched by parties residing in those districts. The Committee which sat last year came to certain Resolutions, but these Resolutions might be said to express the opinions of the Chairman only, for the Committee divided six to six on every Resolution, and, as Chairman, he was called to give the casting vote. The Government ought to take action in the matter, for since the Report of the Committee, enclosures had taken place and were taking place; and if things went on so, in two or three years the people would be entirely shut out of their favourite places of recreation and enjoyment. The Government should stop the sale of all forestal rights in that forest, or appoint a Commission of Inquiry, for he claimed an indefeasible right on the part of the public to the use and enjoyment of a great part of the forest.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that there was one proposition in respect to which they were all pretty much agreed, and that was, that the question was in a very unsatisfactory state; but he marvelled much that some hon. Gentlemen, the promoters of the Address of last year, should cast on the Government the responsibility for that unsatisfactory condition of the question, for he maintained that it was in a great degree owing to them and to the Address which they induced the House to adopt. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down called on the Government to act on the recommendation of the minority of the Committee and against that of the majority. [Mr. Cox: Act on one or on the other, but act.] He wished the House to observe what the recommendation of the majority of the Committee was. They advised that the sanction of Parliament should be given to the enclosure of a main portion of the forest; that the rights of interested parties should be ascertained, and that provision should be made by these means and partly by purchase for securing a part of the forest for the recreation of the public. But where there was a purchase, there must be purchase money, and hon. Gentlemen had been very shy of that part of the question. Was the purchase money to come from the Consolidated Fund? The Government thought proper, from respect to a Resolution of that House, to discontinue the sale of forestal rights, but by so doing they inflicted injury on the corpus of the estate of the Crown, of which they were only the life tenants. The estate of the Crown was only in their hands for the life of the Sovereign, and it was the duty of the department of Woods and Forests to administer the estate as other landlords administered theirs—in an enlightened spirit, no doubt, but for the interest of those to whom the estate belonged. Now, it was not the duty of a landlord to reserve open spaces for the public. As for fresh air the people of London were not the only persons for whom that was good; and if the claim then made were admitted, the inhabitants of other parts of England, living in crowded houses and narrow streets, would be equally entitled to apply to the Consolidated Fund. Let hon. Members consider what enormous sums had been expended on the parks, and the grants of money which had been given during their own lifetime for the creation of new parks. That expenditure had been made with great liberality until the House began to consider that there must be some limit to the practice, and determined to provide other machinery, by which London, the most wealthy town in relation to its population, might be able to provide for its wants. The Metropolitan Board of Works was consequently constituted; and an Act was introduced to enable that Board to provide parks and places of recreation by means of rates. [Mr. Cox: This forest is beyond their jurisdiction.] It was beyond their jurisdiction for the purpose of levying rates, but not for the purpose of purchase and devoting the place to the enjoyment of the people. The consequence of the Government being prevented from selling forestal rights had been, that those who were desirous of getting the land occupied it without permission, and legal proceedings to dispossess them would only cause a further expense—and for what purpose? Not to make use of the land for the benefit of the proprietor, but for the purpose of keeping it open and unoccupied. The Committee reported that the employment of forestal rights as a means of obstructing enclosure was a course of doubtful justice, and might fail in securing the desired object; but the House, on the other hand, said, "Do not make a sale of forestal rights." He admitted that the question was in an embarrassing position, but he was not prepared to say that the Government were responsible for it, because they did their best to prevent the House coming to the Resolution which had been referred to. It was now said that a Commission should be appointed, but he did not think that the Government were ever justified in appointing a Commission to get rid of responsibility, and they ought not to appoint a Commission unless they were prepared to give instructions for a definite object. No doubt the ground was very much wanted. On that he quite agreed. But it was doubtful whether it was the duty of the Government to inquire what ground should be reserved. It came much more within the province of the Metropolitan Board, to which, under the sanction of law, the duty of providing recreation grounds for the recreation of the people of London belonged. The Government would not be justified in acting contrary to law, and in taking into its hands the function and duty which a statute had assigned to another body. He should be glad if any mode could be discovered for dealing with the question, but so long as the Metropolitan Board existed, it would not be the duty of the Government to find new places of recreation for the people of London, and even should the statute which constituted the board be repealed, it would not become the Government to provide out of the Consolidated Fund such places for the inhabitants of the metropolis until they had carefully considered whether they were prepared to act on the same principle in the case of other large towns.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he thought that the right hon. Gentleman was incorrect in what he had said regarding the powers of the Metropolitan Board. That Board, he fully believed, had no authority under the Metropolis Local Management Act to buy any land beyond their jurisdiction for the recreation of the people. If the Metropolitan Board really had such a power, he would be the first to advocate their exercising it for the benefit of the public. He understood that all that was now desired of the Government was that they should simply prevent any encroachment upon the forest. Considering the miles of bricks and mortar that were constantly springing up in the metropolis, he did not think it was fair to turn round upon its inhabitants, who now paid for many things of which the country at large had the benefit, and accuse them of wanting to draw upon the Consolidated Fund for their own purposes.

MASTERS IN THE NAVY.

RESOLUTION.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he rose to move that this House will, upon Tuesday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of an humble Address to be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions for putting the Staff Captains, Commanders, and Masters of the Royal Navy upon an equality in pay, rank, and eligibility for receiving marks of distinction, with any other class of Officers in that Service. The duties of a Master in Her Majesty's Navy were only second to those of the captain or the commander of the vessel in which he acted, and he should be glad, if time permitted, to show the House how those officers entered the service, and how they were treated in comparison with other officers who entered at the same time. The Masters entered as second-class cadets, and they served six years as Masters' assistants before they become eligible for the position of Master. Entering the service at the age of fifteen they would be twenty-one before being eligible for second Masters, while the cadet at nineteen was eligible for a lieutenant. True, at the commencement they received as Masters' assistants more pay than the first class naval cadets; but as the latter gained more rapid promotion, their pay quickly exceeded that of the Master, though the expenses and the mess were the same. The Master began with a sense of inferiority which stuck to him through life, and marred his hopes of fame and rank. The Master, having served twenty-five years, would obtain the nominal rank of staff commander, and be in receipt of £1 per diem. The lieutenant who had served from seven to nine years would have gained his promotion as commander, and in nine years' service, according to the new scheme—from which the Masters were to derive no benefit whatever—the lieutenant would be in receipt of £1 per diem. Five years more would make the lieutenant a post-captain, when he would receive from £400 to £800 a year, besides command money. The staff commander, having served a greater length of time, would receive only £365 per annum. He next came to a comparison of the pay in the dockyards. The Master attendant received £480, the Master shipwright £650, the assistant Master attendant £380, the chief engineer £650, and the storekeeper £600. In the victualling yards at Deptford the Master attendant of the two establishments received £480, and the storekeeper of the dockyard and victualling yard £1,200. The noble Lord (Lord C. Paget) had said that the Masters had never made any demand for increased pay, and that their demand was entirely limited to rank, which had been granted them. Neither of those statements could be maintained. A memorial was presented in December, 1860, from the Masters, in the last paragraph of which they said—

"It would be satisfactory to the class of Masters generally if they were placed, with regard to relative rank, pay, pensions, and social position, on the same footing as that now held by medical officers, of whom they have always had the precedence since the Order in Council of the 28th of March, 1808."

It was admitted by all naval men that the Masters formed a most intelligent, most trustworthy, and most valuable class of officers. For years they had been complaining of the treatment to which they were subjected in respect to pay, promotion, and rewards for distinguished services. In 1862, in consequence of representations made to the Admiralty, a Committee was appointed to consider their grievances. That Committee consisted of Rear Admiral Elliot, Captain Goldsmith, Captain Washington, and one Master. The report of those gentlemen, for some reason or other, though moved for, had never been presented to the House. It bore strong testimony to the efficiency of the Masters, recommending that they should be retained as navigators and pilots, but that their position should be improved. Among other things the Committee proposed that the grievances of the Masters should be removed with respect to widows' pensions, compassionate allowances, and prize money; that their designations should be altered, and that they should be rewarded like other officers for distinguished services. Some of those recommendations had been adopted, but the greater part had never been carried out; and with regard to distinguished rewards, especially, the Masters at the present moment were in no better position than formerly. At that moment a staff commander of thirty-four years' service and of twenty-two years' standing, with a separate command, was junior to a junior lieutenant, and if a boy of nineteen who had the rank of lieutenant came in contact with the Master of Her Majesty's yacht, Osborne, who was one of the most distinguished officers in the service, that Master must wait upon him as his superior officer. The Masters had not been raised in point of rank, nor had they up to that time been permitted to share in rewards granted for distinguished services, though some of their number had been highly praised for their conduct in the Crimea and at Kagosima. After the attack on Sebastopol, on October 17, 1854, all the post-captains present were made C.B.'s, the commanders were posted, and a lieutenant commanding a ship was made a commander; but there were no such rewards for the Masters. Admiral Kuper acknowledged how much he was indebted to the Master of his flag-ship, Mr. W. H. Parker, for a survey which he made of the bay before the action at Kagosima; but there, again, there was no reward. As he understood the noble Lord the other night, he said that the Masters enjoyed the full social rank to which they were entitled. That might be so nominally, but in reality the Masters ranked socially below the lowest officer of the ship. He should like to see the Masters placed in the same position as the engineers of the army, that was to say, placed in a superior and not in an inferior position. He thought they were entitled to such position by the importance of the duties they had to discharge.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon Tuesday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of an humble Address to be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions for putting the Staff Captains, Commanders, and Masters of the Royal Navy upon an equality in pay, rank, and eligibility for receiving marks of distinction, with any other class of Officers in that Service,"—(Sir Lawrence Palk),

—instead thereof.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that before the noble Lord rose to address them he wished to say a few words, although he did not mean to enter into the Question raised by his hon. Friend behind him. He would say only that the Masters were officers of great merit, and ought to be adequately requited for their services. The subject, however, suggested a question of a wider and more comprehensive character. It was well known that for many years the officers of the Royal Navy had had reason to complain of insufficient pay. He had himself repeatedly adverted to the fact that captains were sometimes obliged to decline commands from inability to make their income meet the expenses involved. The Admiralty had, with the best intentions, introduced a supplementary estimate to increase the pay of certain classes of officers; but he believed that their proposals were not satisfactory even to the officers concerned, while there were several classes which were not touched at all. His noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty had adopted generally rather an apologetic tone in speaking of that estimate, and had pleaded the limited fund at his disposal as a reason for not doing more. He could not, of course, blame the Chancellor of the Exchequer for reasonable vigilance as to the finances of the country; but, considering the growing wealth and prosperity of the nation, which the right hon. Gentleman had himself so eloquently described, he thought there was no excuse for committing any injustice on the ground of necessary economy. He submitted that the time had come when the matter should be dealt with in a broader and more liberal manner than had been done in the supplementary estimate; and he would therefore beg to ask the noble Lord whether the Admiralty would, as a preliminary step, consent to a Royal Commission on the pay of the Navy?

COLONEL EDWARDS thought he was only doing his duty in advocating the claims of a body of men who deserved the best consideration of the House of Commons. As to the captains on the reserved list, when he referred to them the other night, the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty seemed to ignore their existence. One hundred of those captains, as the noble Lord was well aware, were originally placed on the reserved list upon the distinct understanding that they should enjoy the same advantages prospectively as those who were placed on the active list. He had that day received a statement from a post-captain in the Royal Navy who had been placed on the reserved list, in which he stated that the class he represented were at a loss to know what Lord

C. Paget meant by saying that a "boon" had been granted to those officers, to which body he unfortunately belonged. The noble Lord must have alluded to a different class. The captains on the reserved list had received no "boon;" on the contrary, their claims had always been pooh-poohed by the Admiralty, and they were told by the Duke of Somerset that they had "obtained advantages they could not possibly have expected when they entered the service!" They expected justice, and were distinctly assured by the Order in Council under which they were promoted, that their claims should be "equitably met." They now complain of a breach of faith, as their claims are by no means "equitably met," (that is equally with other officers, fairly and impartially). Many reserved captains had served twenty, thirty, and thirty-five years in active service, on the most unhealthy stations, and in all parts of the world—in general actions and numerous engagements, wounded, health impaired by sickness, and arduous service for their country. These men were kept on a miserable pittance, whilst there were admirals on 25*s.* per diem who had only served twelve or thirteen years on active service, and that of no particularly severe nature, but principally in the Mediterranean and other healthy stations. He (Colonel Edwards) maintained that this was an instance in which men belonging to Her Majesty's Navy—a most gallant and meritorious class of officers—had been treated very unfairly, and he could not conceive why the noble Lord, who professed to be such an ardent friend and supporter of the just claims of the officers of his own profession, could ignore the fact of their very existence in face of the House of Commons, being well aware that he (Colonel Edwards) had, four years in succession, in debates which had arisen in the House, advocated their claims, and, on more than one occasion, close divisions had been taken. He trusted the hon. Baronet would, on some future and early occasion, include the captains on the reserved list in his category, and that the just claims of this class of officers would be fairly and equitably considered.

MR. C. P. BERKELEY observed, that the Committee which sat last year examined no Master nor Commander, and no evidence was taken about their position except incidentally. As to the retired captains, he thought their case had been pretty fully inquired into by the Committee of last year, and the result of the inquiry had not disturbed the opinion which he had expressed two years ago—that they had not a leg to stand upon. No boon had been granted to them since that, except the boon of a good grievance, which had been granted to them a few nights ago. The only boon granted to them previously was that conferred by the Order of 1861, which enabled them to get additional pay according to service. One officer who had been examined said that boon only amounted to about 3*d.* a day, and he never knew why that had been given to him, and he thought it must be a mistake. The Committee could not allude to the grievances of the Masters and Commanders. There were fifty or fifty-five classes of officers on the active list, and as to scales of pay he believed there were not less than one hundred of them. He therefore considered that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman was worthy of attention.

SIR WILLIAM MILES joined his hearty wish to that expressed by his hon. Friend near him, that the Secretary of the Admiralty would consider the case of the Staff Masters. He had had the honour of sitting upon the Committee, and he conceived that there was no class of officers in the Royal Navy whose case deserved greater consideration than that of the Staff Masters. He believed that if England were polled as to this question, there would be a unanimous opinion expressed that their position ought to be improved. He thought that the claims of all the other officers of the navy should be likewise considered.

MR. AYRTON said, he trusted that the Government would not readily accede to the request which had been made, and by handing over its functions to a Commission, entail upon the public a great increase in the expenditure. As a Member of the Committee, he had hoped that their well-considered Report would have put an end to much of what they had heard that night. If the inducements at present held out were not sufficient to induce officers to enter the navy—which he did not believe to be the case—he hoped his noble Friend the Secretary of the Admiralty would state so.

MR. ALDERMAN ROSE said, he hoped that the House would always listen to any class which came before them with a well-founded grievance. It had been clearly shown that the only members of a very difficult and dangerous service, who had not been recognized or received any increase of pay or decoration were the Masters in the navy. As he had a great many of that class amongst his constituents he felt that he was justified in raising his voice in their favour. The right hon. Baronet had proved a strong case for the whole subject being taken into consideration, and he thought the House would not be doing its duty if they did not entertain it.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he would admit that the House was a court of last appeal for grievances; but he must protest against taking out of the hands of the executive Government the exercise of their proper functions. If the House undertook to remedy all the grievances which ought to be remedied by the responsible Officers of the Crown, it would get itself into considerable difficulties. The case before them was very like that of the Custom House Officers seeking for additional pay. He had received many applications on the subject, but he had invariably said that he did not think it his duty to interfere with the Officers of the Crown on such matters. The duty of the House of Commons was to check the expenditure, not to increase it.

MR. FERRAND said, he wished to know what the officers of the army and navy were to do, if, having brought a grievance before the Executive and obtained no remedy, they were to be precluded from appealing to the House of Commons. Would the hon. Member have them strike, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had recommended working men to do the other night?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. If he makes such an assertion as that, will he have the goodness to prove it?

MR. FERRAND said, he certainly understood the right hon. Gentleman to justify strikes.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: "Recommend strikes" was the expression I called on the hon. Gentleman to prove.

MR. FERRAND said, he would withdraw the word "recommend," but he certainly understood the right hon. Gentleman to justify strikes. In all such cases as that before them the ultimate court of appeal must be that House.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he was not in a position to answer the Question of the right hon. Member for Droitwich, whether the Government were prepared to recommend a Royal Commission on the subject; but he had no hesitation in saying that it was a most unfortunate thing for the navy that Motions devoted to the cases of individual classes of officers should be brought forward in the manner they had been of late years. The Masters did complain of their position, in the shape of a memorial to the Admiralty, and he certainly quite admitted that they had reason to do so. Considering the responsible duties they had to perform, their position had not been commensurate with their merits. When the complaint was made, the Admiralty appointed a Committee to consider their case, and the Masters came before it to state their grievance. A few of them complained of their pay; but the grievance of the great majority of them was in reference to their position as regards rank in the navy. They complained that in the colonies and in garrison towns they were not always entitled to be considered gentlemen by their rank. The Committee took into consideration the propriety of abolishing the rank of Master altogether, and that was a question on which distinguished officers who gave evidence differed; and the Committee reported that it was not advisable to abolish the class, but recommended, after a certain length of service, to grant them additional rank. Another grievance was, that their widows' pensions were not sufficient, and they were increased. There were other additional claims which they made; for instance, they asked for some out-pensions at Greenwich Hospital. The Committee recommended that it should be granted, and the Admiralty were glad to do it. He knew it was a sore point with the Masters that on the quarter-deck they ranked below the junior lieutenants, but he submitted that there were important reasons connected with discipline which rendered that necessary, and that it was not the sort of question which could be decided in the House of Commons. It was a matter that should be left to the Crown. With regard to the question of their pay, as compared with that of paymasters, he might observe that the paymasters, having no opportunity of rising to the higher branches of the service, expected that some difference should be made in their favour. Besides, they laboured under the disadvantage that they had had their pay reduced. The paymaster in former days received very large perquisites, and when those perquisites were taken away they had a fixed pay granted to them much higher than that of the Masters. Then, taking the case of surgeons, it must be borne in mind that they were young men who had to go through a very expensive education at their own cost, the fact being too that, while there was great difficulty in getting surgeons for the navy, no difficulty was experienced in getting Masters. Again, turning to the executive branch of the navy, it would be found that the pay of the junior Masters was the same as that of the junior lieutenants. The Masters rose by gradations to a pay of £273 15s. a year, not in command. The highest pay which a lieutenant would receive under the new scheme was £269 a year, when in command; while a Master in command got 2s. a day additional, so that he was better paid than the lieutenant. Staff commanders ranked with commanders, and their lowest rate of full pay was £273 15s., and the lowest pay of commanders was £365; staff commanders not in command rose to £365; and commanders in command rose to £433; a staff commander when in command of a ship got £36 10s. extra, which brought him up nearly to the pay of commanders. He contended there was no cause of grievance between the two ranks in regard to pay. The Masters had also an allowance, when in charge of stores, of from £38 to £73 per year. There was no such pay as £1,200 per annum for the Master attendants of the dockyards; all they got was £600 per annum. [SIR LAWRENCE PALK: Some of them hold double appointments.] That was a mistake. And what had been done for the Masters at various times in the way of half-pay? In 1855, the rate of half-pay, which up to that time was only 7s., was raised to 13s., and in 1860 to 15s. 6d. That being so, he confidently appealed to the House to say whether those officers were badly treated. There was, he admitted, no more useful branch of the service than the Masters, but he regretted for their sakes that they should have brought such a grievance as that of which they complained under the notice of the House. The Admiralty was, of course, always ready to listen to any respectful complaints from them or any other officers, and if compliance with their requests was refused, it was only because it was due to the public to resist the constant appeals for increase of pay which were made.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, that as the prices of provisions and almost every necessary of life had risen 35 per cent, it was not to be expected that officers would be content to remain contented on the present wretched and miserable pittance they received. He could assure the noble Lord that the matter would be persisted in until justice was done to the service. It would not do for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to come to that House and explain to the working men how to strike when they wanted more wages, and then to tell those officers, who were justly disgusted at their present position, that they were not to come in a constitutional manner and lay their grievances before that House. He, therefore, called upon the Government to grant the Royal Commission, and he assured them that until it was granted the Motion would be persevered in. The supplementary estimate for the increase of pay to the navy which the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty laid upon the table a few nights ago was, he added, a most fallacious document, inasmuch as it fixed a rate of pay for certain officers as belonging to a class which had in reality no individual existence. The pay of the officers of the different classes was entirely insufficient; they were, in fact, in a worse position pecuniarily than they were fifty years ago. The pensions to their widows were too small, and warrant officers were not allowed to marry after fifty—that was, their widows did not receive pensions if they married after that age—while other officers were allowed to marry until they were sixty. They had also grievances as to wounds and retirement, the regulations as to the latter being most unsatisfactory. Warrant officers were not entitled to become officers of the Coastguard, and they could only get into Greenwich Hospital by laying aside their pensions and entering as petty officers or seamen. The seniors obtained no promotion for war service, and the boatwains felt it a degradation to be obliged to inflict corporal punishment, which he quite agreed with them ought to be administered by the police of the ship. He hoped that after these statements the noble Lord would not again say that there was no case for the appointment of a Royal Commission. If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich did not move for such a Commission to investigate the subject of the pay of the navy, he would himself do so.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said that he could conceive nothing more tending to confuse the order of debate than the course which had been taken by the hon. Baronet, who, upon a motion referring to the special case of certain officers of the navy, without notice, and without his noble Friend being able to make any reply, had made a speech upon what he called the general grievances of the officers of the navy. He believed that the character of the British navy was such that it would withstand almost any unfavourable influence, but that character was severely tried by speeches such as that to which the House had just listened. After the hon. Baronet's animadversions upon the speeches of his hon. Friends the hon. Members for Peterborough and the Tower Hamlets, he felt bound on the part of the Government to thank those hon. Members for the constitutional doctrines which they had laid down as to the impropriety of referring to commissions subjects which were connected with the elementary duties of the Executive Government, and with its relations with Parliament. The hon. Baronet had threatened the Government that by tenacity and incessant recurrence to the Question he would force a compliance with his demands. In answer he had to say that while he trusted that the Government would, upon every occasion, give their careful attention to every question connected either with the army or the navy, or any other department of the State, they would not be driven by this menaced and pertinacious agitation, if he might call it so, to move one single step in advance of what they believed to be their duty alike to the Crown, to the country, and to the navy itself. The hon. Baronet had said that provisions had risen 25 per cent. He was astounded to hear that statement. [Sir JAMES ELPHINSTONE: Meat.] The hon. Baronet fell back upon the single article of meat; but if meat had risen in price, locomotion, clothes, books, and almost all commodities purchased by gentlemen of moderate fortunes, were much cheaper than they were thirty years ago. It was not for him to prescribe the limits within which hon. Members should exercise their functions. It was of course in their power to do that which they would do whether he liked it or not, to make continual endeavours to augment the demands upon the public purse. There was no doubt that the primary duty of Members of the House of Commons was to check the Government in its propositions for the public expenditure, but he believed that he was making a moderate estimate when he said that, during the whole of the present Parliament, which was now approaching the term of its natural expiration, for every hour which had been spent in an attempt to check or restrain any proposal of the Government for increasing the public expenditure, ten hours, twenty hours, or perhaps more than that, had been consumed by Members, and he must say nine-tenths of them by Members opposite, in endeavouring to force the Government to increase the public expenditure. With respect to the general question, the hon. Member (Mr. Ayrton) had remarked that while all these grievances were pleaded, he was not aware that there had been any difficulty in providing the navy with a supply of efficient officers. That, indeed, was rather a material point in the case. He had no wish to disparage the services rendered by naval officers; on the contrary, he bore cheerful testimony to their general efficiency and to the honourable and zealous services which they rendered. But they were bound to treat the members of that service on principles of justice, and principles of justice required that they should receive a fair and reasonable remuneration, the test of which in the public service generally was the willingness of competent persons to accept this remuneration in respect of the duties they performed. Ten or twelve years ago, when Sir James Graham was First Lord of the Admiralty and he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, an increase took place in the pay of the men of the navy. But the First Lord founded that proposed increase upon a sound and legitimate basis—namely, that a difficulty was found in procuring a sufficient number of well qualified seamen for the public service. But what was the case with regard to officers? An hon. Member might go to the Duke of Somerset and ask to have his son put down on the list for a cadetship; and he might add, "As the pay given is so miserable, and the prospects are so inadequate, your Grace will have no difficulty in giving my son this nomination." But the Duke of Somerset might reply, "Sir, you appear to me like a man who has lived among the stars or in some foreign country. So far from finding a difficulty in procuring cadets, I have the greatest difficulty in meeting the demands for cadetships. I have lists of applicants that I cannot exhaust, and numbers of persons to whom I am compelled to refuse a place upon my list."

There was, in fact, a pressure and a rush for these appointments which the hon. Gentleman seemed to think were the subject of such great and general grievance; and the same might be said of every branch of the service with one exception—the surgeons. The question, which the hon. Gentleman seemed to think had only one side, had really two sides. Other people had their grievances besides naval officers. It was not a Eutopian world, a paradise in which it was possible to deal out benefits and blessings all round ad libitum. It was a hard-working world, in which the mass of human beings found it difficult to live. He had to remember the taxpayers; and how was he to look in the face of the poor Irish peasant, and say to him, “Let us augment the pay of all classes of public servants?” For other public servants were in just the same case. The Post Office, the Customs, the Inland Revenue Department, the Colonial Governors raised one continued cry for increased emoluments along with naval officers. On the other hand, he received every day applications from persons who prayed for exemption from taxes, and told piteous stories of poverty; but it was his duty to say in all these cases, “The law must take its course.” Such was the taxpaying side of the question. If there had been a contract between the public and the naval officers the public had faithfully fulfilled its contract, and, indeed, had more than fulfilled it. And while the House was enjoining, on the one hand, thrift and economy in the public service, it would be a mockery, on the other hand, to pass Resolutions such as that before them, the result of which would be to bring about a very large addition to the expenditure.

MR. CORRY said, he hoped that if a Royal Commission was not appointed, the question would at least receive the reconsideration of the Admiralty. He contended that the captains of the Warrior and of armour-plated ships of that kind ought to receive as large an allowance as the captains of a line-of-battle ship. The lieutenants, too, ought to receive pay in a fairer proportion to their length of service.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he was sorry that the opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer should be supposed to represent that of Her Majesty's Government on the subject. The House had been told that officers ought to strike, but the only way in which they could strike was by declining to serve, as many of them had done. The right hon. Gentleman had taunted that side of the House with being always ready to urge a high expenditure, but the taunt came with a very ill grace from a Government which had been for several years spending £70,000,000 a year of the public money in all sorts of wasteful and ill-considered projects.

MR. HENNESSY said, he must remind the House that the present Government had been described by the hon. Member for Rochdale as the most wasteful and profligate Government in regard to expenditure that ever sat on the Treasury Bench. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was willing to expend half a million in the purchase of the Exhibition Building, and was a Member of the Government that had flung away thousands of pounds into the sea at Alderney. The fact was, that while the Government underpaid the men in the Royal Navy they were wasting the public money in useless fortifications at home and docks at Malta. And yet the Chancellor of the Exchequer ventured to read that side of the House a lecture on their extravagance.

ARTILLERY PRACTICE IN PLYMOUTH SOUND.—QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH wished to put a Question to the noble Earl the Secretary for War on a subject of some importance as regarded the lives of Her Majesty's subjects. A few days ago a waterman, named George M'Cay, had been employed to convey an officer of H.M.S. Warrior to that vessel, and on his return his boat was struck by an 8-inch shell fired from the citadel, where firing practice was going on at the time. The result was that M'Cay himself was killed; the boat was upset, and another man who was with the poor waterman nearly lost his life also. This practice from the citadel had for a long time been a great inconvenience to the inhabitants of Plymouth and its neighbourhood. In some cases its consequences were ludicrous, while in others, such as that which he had just stated to their Lordships, they had been fatal. On one occasion a Dutch Admiral was on his way across the Sound to pay his respects to the authorities of the port, when his boat was surrounded by a shower of missiles. The gallant officer at once hoisted a flag of truce, and despatched a boat to inquire whether war had broken out between the two countries, that he had been assailed in that way. The case of M'Cay was not an isolated one, and there were several persons at Plymouth who had received compensation for damage done to their boats. The defence set up in the more recent case was not sufficient to justify the continuance of the practice. Captain Henry said that the firing was right, but that the shells sometimes went to the right or the left out of their proper course when there was a ripple on the water. In this case the boat was not within the line of fire, but then the accident had been caused by the deflection of the shell from its proper course; but, as a similar occurrence might take place again, he submitted to the noble Earl the practice was a dangerous one. He knew it to be so from personal experience, a shell having fallen on one occasion within fifty yards of a boat in which he was seated. He wished to know the opinion of the Government on the subject.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, that unhappily the fact stated by his noble Friend was but too true. The unfortunate man had certainly lost his life in consequence of a shell fired from the citadel at Plymouth. But it was due to the officer commanding the firing party to state that he had ordered the line of practice to be cleared upwards of two hours before the firing was commenced; and that the shell which killed the poor man had deflected almost at right angles, and ricocheted several times before it struck the boat. He had further to observe that the shell was not a charged shell, but had merely a bursting charge. At the same time the liability of those missiles to deflect, and the fact that such a lamentable accident had taken place, clearly showed that the matter was one deserving the most serious consideration of the Government; and on hearing of the accident he at once gave directions, which had, in fact, been anticipated by the General commanding at Plymouth, that while the matter was under consideration, firing from the citadel should be discontinued. It was not easy to find places for firing practice, but he need not say that no consideration of inconvenience would weigh on the minds of the War Department as against the probable recurrence of such a melancholy accident.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he was very glad to hear the answer of the noble Earl; because last summer he had been an eyewitness of the danger arising from the practice from the citadel. It had been blowing a gale the day before, the Sound was full of yachts and fishing boats, the shot was falling around them, and one shot fell not more than twenty yards astern of his own yacht.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE suggested that a general measure should be introduced, empowering officers superintending firing practice from forts to remove vessels out of the line of fire.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, he was afraid that he should not be able to introduce such a measure. It was due to the officer in command at the time the accident took place that he should express his opinion that no blame was to be attributed to him.

REV. FORTESCUE ANDERSON. MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

LORD CAMPBELL said: My Lords, the Correspondence for which I am about to move, according to the notice on the paper, relates to the imprisonment in Grodno of the Rev. Fortescue Anderson, a graduate of the University of Oxford, and son of the English chaplain at Bonn, who was formerly well known as a preacher in this country. Neither the individual nor the facts would suffice perhaps to merit the attention of the House, unless the case tended to throw light upon a question of more general importance. It has been conspicuously and frequently asserted that when injury to British subjects has arisen, our system has been to domineer over the minor States, and truckle to the powerful communities with which we are brought into relation. Of this tendency to safe attack and to dishonouring submission, instances are given in what has passed between Great Britain and Greece, Japan, Brazil, upon the one hand, and the United States upon the other. Whatever be the truth, the Correspondence which I ask for will illustrate the manner in which the Foreign Office is disposed to guard British subjects against any wrongs which Russian authorities may perpetrate upon them.

My Lords, the facts are brief and easy to present. Mr. Anderson had formed at Bonn, where as I have said his father was the English chaplain, an intimate acquaintance with Count Alexander Bisping, a Lithuanian nobleman, who studied in the University of Bonn, and to whom Mr. Anderson had given instructions in the English language. The count, reaching his majority, and being an orphan, resolved to visit his large estates in Lithuania; and in February, 1863, urged Mr. Anderson to accompany him. Mr. Anderson consented on reflecting that Count Bisping belonged to that class of Polish landowners who disapproved the insurrection as unfortunate, or useless, or ill-timed, however dear to them the objects it pursued, however odious and intolerable the misgovernment which led to it. On February the 26th the two left Bonn for Berlin, where their passports were duly viséd at the British and Russian Embassies, and went on by Königsberg, by Wilna, and to Grodno, an important town of Lithuania, which stands on the direct route from Warsaw to St. Petersburg. Between March and September they visited the farms and country houses of Count Alexander Bisping, which were scattered in the neighbourhood. They never mixed with the insurgents. At Königsberg, Count Alexander, so guarded was his conduct, sent away to Bonn the firearms he had with him. Mr. Anderson, in the beginning of September, determined to go back to his father. He was to make one more expedition with the count from Grodno to a farm not very distant. It was on leaving Grodno for this purpose that the circumstances happened which brought his name before the Foreign Office and the public. Up to that moment he had been the guest and the companion of a nobleman who did not join the civil war. And at that moment, so far from being dangerous to the Czar, he was on the point of quitting his dominions. The travellers produced their passports at the barrier of Grodno. They were detained, stripped, examined, driven to the prison of the town, brought before the governor, handed into dungeons without a reason being assigned for the proceeding. The cell of Mr. Anderson was in so revolting a condition that it would be indecent to describe it to the House. He passed the night in the midst of vermin, with scarcely any food, and in an atmosphere by which his health was sensibly affected. The next morning at eleven he was brought before a military court, which sat upon supposed abettors of the Polish movement. The most ridiculous pretences were made to justify his capture. An air-gun was produced which had been found in his portmanteau. But even this important proof of making war upon the Czar was afterwards rejected by his judges. Scythes were then exhibited which had been taken by some Cossacks from a farm of Count Bisping to support the accusation. But no charge could be attached to Mr. Anderson about them. After that, his papers having been seized, they came upon his sermons; and although a Jew supposed to be familiar with the English tongue was ordered to interpret them, even this unfavourable commentator could find nothing revolutionary in them. The tribunal seemed to be convinced without a practical experiment that these discourses were entirely consistent with, if not essentially conducive to, the strict repose of those who listened to or studied them. After that the correspondence of his father was explored; and hostile inferences drawn from the occurrence of the phrase "unhappy Poland," and the expression of a fear as to the safety of Mr. Anderson among the Russians. At last, baffled in every attempt to fix criminality upon him, the commissioners, instead of giving him his freedom, again consigned him to the dungeon he had quitted. But more—and here is found the aggravation of their conduct—they declined in a peremptory manner to let him communicate with the British representatives at Warsaw or St. Petersburg. A subject of Her Majesty and priest in the Established Church of which she is the head, after his accusers were exposed and his innocence established, was recklessly imprisoned and deprived of all means to establish his identity, to vindicate his rights, or to invoke the power and protection of the State which he belonged to. Remote from every aid, in solitude and helplessness, he saw before him the gloomy vista with which prisoners in Russian Poland are familiar. The House may recollect three instances in which British subjects have been thrown into prison, but in which no such extremity as marks the present case was hazarded.

Lord Campbell

Mr. Shaver, the Canadian, of whom your Lordships heard so much in 1862, was detained by the United States; but he addressed two letters to Lord Napier, one from Fort Warren, one from Fort La Fayette. Captain M'Donald, when seized upon a Russian railway, communicated from the scene of his confinement with the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary. The three naval officers arrested in Brazil were not denied the means of writing to the British Consul in a manner which brought about the speedy restoration of their freedom. For the conduct of the Russian authorities to Mr. Anderson, I doubt very much if any precedent is likely to suggest itself. My Lords, there is little more to add, and I shall not detain the House from other business on the paper. Better fortune was in store for Mr. Anderson. Not many hours after his arrest three English travellers, Mr. Clark, the Public Orator of the University of Cambridge, Mr. Birbeck, who also holds a distinguished office in that learned body, and another gentleman, arrived at Grodno on their road to Wilna. They heard of the imprisonment directly from a source which they are still too considerate and too guarded to divulge. On Thursday, September 10, after various discouragements and many oscillations from one public office to another, they at length succeeded by the golden key which opens doors in Russia, in gaining access to the governor. The governor, although profuse in courtesy, declined to listen to them on the subject which they came to press upon him. It became quite clear to him, however, that the arrest of Mr. Anderson would no longer be concealed from our representatives or from our Foreign Office. The authorities retired from a game which the arrival of the three travellers had turned into a hopeless one. On Friday they saw Mr. Anderson. He was no longer kept a prisoner. After weeks of tedious correspondence between Lord Napier at St. Petersburg, and the authorities at Grodno, his freedom was regained. No doubt the highest credit is due to the exertions of the Public Orator and his companions; no doubt their exertions were successful. And it is not denied that Lord Napier backed them to the utmost of his power. But this in no way affects the outrage upon public law of which the Russians became guilty, when they denied to Mr. Anderson the means of correspondence with St. Petersburg or elsewhere. And it is no defence of this outrage that it ceased as soon as it became impossible to persevere in it. Nor does the final rescue of Mr. Anderson from prison affect the insecurity to which British travellers are liable by the proceedings first taken against him. The arrival of the Public Orator and his companions was wholly accidental, they might have pursued their journey without stopping at Grodno. It was accidental that they heard of Mr. Anderson's imprisonment. It was accidental that they had the time, the disposition, and the power to be useful to him. The functions of the Public Orator—as some of your Lordships know who have lately witnessed his performances—are too absorbing in their character to permit of his frequently arriving in distant parts of Europe the moment British subjects have been lawlessly detained. The wrong, therefore, and the insecurity resulting from it, are not affected by his happy interference in the case of Mr. Anderson. And it becomes material to ask in what manner it was brought under the notice of the Ministers at St. Petersburg; what language was employed, and what reparation was demanded?

The Correspondence may be useful also in making our public hesitate before they move too far towards alliance with a country which is ready to trample on international and British rights, so long as darkness shelters it in doing so.

The noble Lord then moved for an Address for “Copies or Extracts of any Correspondence which has taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Cabinet of St. Petersburg on the Imprisonment in Grodno of the Reverend Fortescue Anderson, a British Subject, during the Autumn of 1863; also, Copies of any Correspondence which has taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Reverend Fortescue Anderson on his Imprisonment.”

EARL RUSSELL said, the case which the noble Lord had brought before the House was of a very simple character. It happened that in September, 1863, the Rev. Mr. Anderson went to visit a Polish proprietor near Grodno, at which time the country was in a state of insurrection. Two persons went before the Russian authorities and accused Mr. Anderson of furnishing arms and ammunition to the insurgents. Mr. Anderson was arrested; and when Lord Napier made inquiries upon the subject he was informed that the Russian authorities had examined into the case, and that finding no evidence against

Mr. Anderson he had been liberated upon condition of leaving Russia. Afterwards a telegraphic message was sent from this country to procure Mr. Anderson's liberation, but before it was received the gentleman had been set free. Mr. Anderson then went to Bonn, and addressed a representation to the Foreign Office, claiming a pecuniary compensation. The matter was referred to the Queen's Advocate, upon whose report the Government declined to interfere in the case. Mr. Anderson, it seemed, had gone, for his pleasure merely, into a country that was in a state of insurrection, and that was a circumstance which naturally exposed him to suspicion; and the circumstances of his case did not present any grounds upon which an application could be made by the British Government to the Government of Russia. With respect to the papers, he did not see that any good purpose would be served by their production, and therefore he should decline to produce them.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE made some remarks which were not heard.

EARL RUSSELL said, the case would have been different if the gentleman who was arrested had been in the country upon commercial business; but that was not so in this case.

LORD CAMPBELL said, in reply, that unless the Correspondence, or part of it, was given, an unfavourable inference would be drawn as to the conduct of the Government.

EARL RUSSELL said, he should not produce the papers unless he was pressed to do so; but if he produced any he should produce all.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF LUCAN rose to call the attention of the Government to the great public Inconvenience occasioned by the overcrowded State of Park Lane, and to the pressing Necessity of partially opening Hamilton Place for public Traffic. The noble Earl said that the state of Park Lane was too well known to make it necessary for him to dilate upon the inconvenience and danger arising from the obstructions that constantly took place there. Park Lane was a narrow, crooked thoroughfare, carrying the greatest amount of traffic through the narrowest space of any in London. He would remind their Lordships that until Kensington was reached, it was the only communication between the north-west and south-west of the metropolis. The extensive districts of Tyburnia, Paddington, Belgravia, Brompton, Pimlico, and Kensington had no other mode of intercommunication but Park Lane; and their Lordships must bear in mind that the great railways—the Great Western, the North Western, and the Great Northern—must communicate with the Victoria station and the South Western station by Park Lane, and consequently during the greater part of the twenty-four hours there was a constant stream of vehicles passing through it—drays, wagons and carts, cabs and gentlemen's carriages. There was a part of the street where, for the distance of 150 yards, the breadth of the carriage way from kerb stone to kerb stone was only 18 feet 6 inches. There had been constant complaints in the House of Commons of the accidents that were always occurring in this street, and it had been found necessary to station two policemen at the end of Park Lane. In this very narrow part of the street there were two public houses, which seemed to be extremely popular, for whenever he passed, he saw gentlemen's carriages standing in front; and near them was a corn chandler's, where carts seemed to be always loading and unloading. These of course greatly obstructed the thoroughfare. He believed it would be extremely difficult to find a greater inconvenience than Park Lane even in this metropolis, which was perhaps the worst regulated on the earth. There were two ways, no doubt, in which the evil might be entirely removed, or much mitigated. One side of Park Lane might be taken down. They might begin by removing Gloucester House, and there were some four or five other houses; but he believed they would not effect the desired improvement at a less cost than £170,000. Now unless it could be shown that there was no other way of relieving Park Lane, this would obviously be a most foolish expenditure of £170,000. The other plan would be the opening of Hamilton Place. It certainly would not be desirable that Hamilton Place should be open for general traffic; but he thought it might be opened for light traffic, such as that which is now allowed to pass through Lord Westminster's and the Duke of Bedford's property, or through the Park. What he proposed should pass through Hamilton

Place were private carriages and cabs. He believed the cab traffic to be the most important in London; all men of business used cabs, and he had once read that a man without any extravagant expenditure might easily spend £200 a year in cabs. All lawyers and commercial men betook themselves to cabs. Objections, no doubt, were made to opening Hamilton Place. It was said that Hamilton Place was not wide enough. No doubt there was one part narrower than the rest. The narrowest part was opposite Nos. 5 and 6, where, after allowing 17 feet for the footway, there remained only 29 feet for carriages, which might easily be increased to 31 or 32. Seeing that the utmost width of a gentleman's carriage was 6 feet, and that a cab did not exceed 5 feet in width, if two gentlemen's carriages were standing on opposite sides of the street they would still leave space enough for three cabs to pass abreast. The great difficulty was how to deal with the Crown lessees. But if the Crown gave its consent he did not see why Crown lessees should be sacred or inviolable more than any other persons. There were only six proprietors, he believed, in all. The occupiers or leaseholders feared very much that their privacy was likely to be interfered with; and he admitted that with regard to No. 6 there would be considerable interference, because part of the garden of that house must be taken for the purpose of widening the footway. But a garden, he thought, was of very little value in London, and one which might be supposed to be capable of pecuniary compensation. With part of the neighbourhood he (the Earl of Lucan) was familiar, for his father built one of the houses, No. 4, and the earliest years of his life were spent in this house. He might venture to say that every good room in these houses looked towards the Park, and the lower rooms were left entirely to servants and children. The light traffic he suggested could hardly be supposed to interfere with them. He thought it would be well the lessees should understand what was commonly called "Give and take." When these Houses were constructed the public were allowed to come very nearly under the windows on the Park side. It was long after the houses were built that the gardens were placed there. The advantage gained by the lessees in respect to the gardens would be a very good set-off against any disadvantage to them from the opening of Hamilton Place. Private interests ought not to stand in the way of an urgent public improvement. The improvement he was suggesting was certainly as desirable as any now going on in the City of London. If private interests were always to be considered sacred from interference, we should never have a railway or any other public improvement. The authorities of the City of London were pulling down houses by the hundred, and ejecting the inhabitants by the thousand, for the proposed Holborn Valley improvement, which was estimated to cost £750,000. He wished to contrast the opening of Park Lane with what was proposed with respect to the Holborn Valley. He had read, in common with other noble Lords, the petition of a Mr. Pontifex, a gentleman who was spending some £1,500 a week in wages. Mr. Pontifex said that he should be required to give up his premises, not because the whole of them were wanted for the purposes of improvement, but in order that the site might be resold. The City of London had powers of taking land under their Act, and they were said to be taking a great deal more land than was necessary for their improvements, in order that they might sell it again and thus reduce the estimated expenditure of £750,000. He thought that if the traffic of Park Lane could be relieved in the way he had described, the lessees might console themselves with the reflection that they had not to deal with the authorities of the City of London. Her Majesty herself had set a very good example in this respect. When Her Majesty opened the Parks to light traffic she made a very great sacrifice, and he thought the lessees of the Crown should follow her example. Having stated the grievance, he would now proceed to suggest a remedy. Several years ago an Act called the Metropolis Local Management was passed, by the 72nd clause of which it was provided that every vestry or district board should, with the consent in writing of the Metropolitan Board of Works, have power, within their respective parishes or districts, to extend, widen, or improve any street, road, or way, for the purpose of facilitating traffic, or any other public purpose; and to take by agreement or gift any land, Crown land, or any other property: the expenses were to be paid out of a general rate; and they were empowered to raise any sums which might be necessary for carrying out such improvements. It appeared to him that that clause was applicable to the present case; and it was a matter of great surprise to him to find that the Vestry of St. George's, Hanover Square, a very active member of which he perceived in his noble Friend opposite, should have allowed this clause to lie dormant for so long. He considered it to be the positive duty of the vestry to avail themselves of the powers contained in this Act, in order to carry out its provisions. His belief was that if the vestry were to put themselves into communication with the lessees, they would be able to make a satisfactory arrangement, and that the expense of the improvements in Hamilton Place would not exceed £5,000 or £6,000. The whole improvement might be effected at a cost of from £50,000 to £60,000, and, consequently, no additional Act of Parliament would be necessary. If the vestry could not come to an arrangement with the lessees, it would be open to them to obtain an Act of Parliament which would contain the necessary powers.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMANS, as a member of the Vestry of St. George's, Hanover Square—though neither an active nor an influential member—wished to say a few words in vindication of that body. According to his noble Friend's statement Park Lane was a means of communication between enormous districts in the north and others in the south of London, and yet his noble Friend wished to impose upon the parish of St. George's, Hanover Square, the burden of effecting this great metropolitan improvement. The Vestry of St. George's were the representatives of the ratepayers of that parish, and were bound to watch over the interests of that body. It was bound to remove inconveniences created by the parish itself, but not those created by the whole metropolis. The duty of carrying out improvements of a general character was intrusted to the Metropolitan Board of Works, which had the power of defraying the expense by levying a rate over the whole metropolis. If the whole of the metropolis was to be benefited, the whole ought to contribute, and the burden ought not to be thrown solely on the parish of St. George's. He thought, therefore, the vestry of that parish could not be justly accused of supineness or apathy. His noble Friend had not stated, and their Lordships did not know, whether the First Commissioner of Works was prepared to assent to this improvement on the part of the Crown, and it was highly probable that the lessees would refuse to produce the leases under which they held.

EARL GRANVILLE said, their Lordships would agree with the noble Earl (the Earl of Lucan) that the overcrowded state of Park Lane occasioned a perpetual nuisance owing to the stoppages which constantly occurred there. The real question was how it could be relieved, and there was a difference of opinion respecting the best mode of doing this. Some years ago a Committee of the other House recommended, by way of improvement, that Hamilton Place should be opened for traffic. The First Commissioner introduced a Bill for that purpose, but it was opposed by the Treasury on two grounds—first, that in the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown it would be a breach of faith with the lessees to open Hamilton Place; and, secondly, that it was not the business of the Government but of the Metropolitan Board of Works to make the opening. He believed the matter was now under the consideration of the Metropolitan Board.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he could hardly think the statement of the noble Earl the President of the Council to be valid. In the first place, the Law Officers of the Crown did not appear to be consistent in their opinions. Three years ago he (the Earl of Malmesbury) had been ejected from a house which had been held by his family for upwards of eighty years, on the assigned reason that it was required for a temporary Foreign Office. He received the value of his lease, and some compensation for the inconvenience to which he was subjected. He did not believe that the lessees of Hamilton Place would resist any fair proposal that might be made to them. With respect to the argument that these improvements ought to be paid for out of the general rates of the metropolis, he did not think there was much force in it. The argument might have been a good one twenty or thirty years ago, but now it did not stand upon the same ground. The fact was that the impediment was caused by the enormous concourse of people whom the railways brought from the country. If the metropolis were left to the regular inhabitants there would be room for every one in the streets, but owing to the new invention of railways, which gave facilities to every one to come to London, the streets were becoming choked. He thought, therefore, it would only be fair that the improvements rendered necessary by this influx of visitors should be paid for out of the general taxation; indeed, no tax could be more fair than a general tax for the relief of the principal streets of London.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, that the inconvenience now experienced in Park Lane would be remedied to a great extent by simple police regulation. It was a most monstrous thing that the whole traffic should be stopped because one or too tradesmen choose to allow their carts to stand for hours together at their doors. One cart standing at a particular part of the Lane, just opposite the entrance of his house, permitted only one line of carriages to pass, putting an entire stop to the flow the other way. He did not see why the police should not have power to prevent any carts being allowed to stop in Park Lane for two, four, or five minutes at a time. He did not know whether they had the power, but was told they had not, and it was a power which might advantageously be intrusted to them. He agreed with his noble Friend who had just spoken, that the railways had an effect upon the streets of the metropolis. Since he (the Duke of Cambridge) had lived where he did, the traffic through Park Lane had enormously increased. This was caused, to a great extent, by the opening of the Victoria station. Formerly there were no omnibuses passing down Park Lane; now there was a regular service of them; and the flow from the Paddington station to that of Victoria was enormous. He might assume that this was not the proper London traffic, and he could not help thinking that the expense of the improvements should be borne not by the ratepayers of St. George's or of the metropolis, but by the country generally.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW said, that nothing more was required to relieve Park Lane than to give the public possession of the small angle of the Park between Grosvenor Gate and Hyde Park Corner. The communication between Bayswater and Kensington had been facilitated in a similar way. No expense would be thrown either upon the metropolis or upon the country at large.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS BILL—[H.L.] (No. 30.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, its object was to provide that any person accepting office in a public school should do so subject to the future legislation of Parliament.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>.

LORD LYTTTELTON said, he wished to take this occasion to refer to one or two points raised the other evening by the noble Earl (Earl Stanhope). His noble Friend had hardly done justice to the head master of Eton in representing him to have said that at Eton nothing was done in the way of teaching English. It was true that at Eton nothing was done in regard to the direct teaching of English, but the head master distinctly stated in his evidence that they did profess to teach English through the teaching of the classics; and if proper attention were paid to the matter, no doubt a very real and substantial amount of instruction in English might be imparted in that way; but it was a question whether it was enough. His noble Friend had expressed an opinion that undue prominence was given in the recommendations of the Commissioners to the subject of applied mathematics. The Commissioners, however, were bound to consult, not merely their own views, but the state of public feeling in the country, and the opinions of men of experience and authority. Accordingly, in assigning the positions they had done to applied mathematics, they had been guided very much by the evidence of the Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, Dr. Whewell. In regard to physical science, he must confess his own ignorance of the subject. He had, therefore, no personal authority on the subject; but he felt that, in face of the testimony borne by such men as Sir Charles Lyell, Professor Owen, Professor Faraday, and other eminent men of science, the Commissioners would not have been justified in recommending less than they had done. This matter was connected with another, which he might term rather elegant accomplishments than learning—music and drawing. His noble Friend opposite (Earl Stanhope) had made some very amusing observations, that a man who did not like music did not necessarily like drawing, and vice versa. Now, it was very well known that as a general rule boys did not like any work at all; and what the Commissioners desired was that the opportunity of ascertaining whether they had capacity and taste for certain studies should be not only offered, but actually forced on them, without which they never would know it. It had been stated that many persons in mature life, having discovered an aptitude for particular branches of natural science, had expressed deep regret that their attention had not been called to these subjects when they were young. It was in order to draw out the dormant powers of the boys that the Commissioners wished these things to be brought before them; and he had no doubt they would be thankful for the recommendation. These studies or accomplishments were generally taught in private schools and in families; and there appeared no reason why they could not be introduced into the public schools with advantage. There was no risk of the health of the boys being injured by the addition of these new subjects of study. The actual amount of work would not be increased, although there would be greater variety. It was his own opinion and he believed that of several of his colleagues on the Commission, that in one or two of the public schools, and especially in some of the greater and more important establishments, the amount of work might be augmented without any danger to health; but in no case would the recommendations of the Commissioners necessarily lead to any increase of labour. Indeed, in certain respects, they had even advised a diminution in the amount of work done. He was anxious that there should be no misapprehension on this matter, and he would just state the distribution which they proposed of an Eton boy's day. Eight hours would be allowed for sleep, two hours for meals, and a short daily chapel service, while the remaining fourteen would be equally divided between work and recreation—seven hours to each. The work would include all the preparation of school tasks, in which some boys might be slower than others, but which all would be able to accomplish without losing their share of relaxation. They recommended that, with all those safeguards, when a boy had arrived at a certain age he should be enabled to drop certain parts of his work, if he had clearly shown inaptitude for them, in order to take up other parts in which he had proved himself likely to succeed better. They recommended that this course might be adopted when a boy was about sixteen years of age. His noble Friend opposite had said, when a boy was arriving at proficiency in a subject the Commissioners would take him from it. That was precisely what they would not do; but when a boy had not arrived at proficiency in a particular study, and showed no likelihood of doing so, they recommended that he should be removed from it and put to other work. The recommendation was one which he hoped the House would adopt, because it was based upon some very strong evidence; he referred particularly to that of Mr. Evans, at Rugby. There was little more with which he wished to detain the House, except in reference to what had been said about Greek and Latin composition. In his admirable Life of Pitt, his noble Friend opposite (Earl Stanhope) said, he thought perhaps with somewhat questionable accuracy, that that great man was not a proficient in the "laborious inutilities of classical metre." That was his noble Friend's expression, and it was one which had rankled in his mind ever since he read it. And the other day his noble Friend said that the verses done for the Porson Prize for Greek Iambics at Cambridge were a preposterous attempt. [Earl STANHOPE: I never said anything of the kind.] Yes; his noble Friend said that if the shadow of Shakespeare could revisit the earth he would turn to raillery the preposterous attempts made to put him into Greek metre—Shakespeare or Massinger, or some such dramatist, being the authors selected for those Iambics, and that was the Porson Prize. He apprehended that Shakespeare did not know Greek; but if his noble Friend could find a single person acquainted with Shakespeare and also with the Greek tragedians who would adopt his opinion that the Porson Prize Poems were preposterous productions, he would almost promise to agree with his noble Friend likewise. His noble Friend had alluded to the Germans. They were, no doubt, very laborious and deeply learned; but in knowledge of the languages he was not aware that they excelled English scholars. Nor could his noble Friend produce one Oxford or Cambridge tutor among those who had given evidence before the Commission who had advocated the abolition of that practice. One eminent man, Mr. Neate, might be quoted; but he was no witness for his noble Friend, as he went far beyond him, and was for abolishing the study of Greek altogether. The question was, if any one could be found who, while in favour of the study of Greek, was against Greek composition. Dean Liddell had been quoted, but he, though he gave some damaging evidence as to the imperfect preparation of boys from public schools, was certainly not against the practice of composition. And with regard to Dr. Whewell,

as an old pupil of his, he spoke with the utmost reverence of him; but he would himself admit that the classical languages were not the subject in which he spoke with special authority. He ventured to say that no such authority could be found. His noble Friend had wholly overlooked the great general argument against him—namely, the intense pleasure, delight, and interest which boys with any turn for the classics manifested in Greek and Latin composition. No doubt he spoke from experience, and, perhaps, with some little bias; but he was sure not only he but others felt both at Eton and Cambridge the utmost pleasure in the work of composition. Half their interest in their work would have been removed if composition had been taken away. He thought it was wise in the present Session to limit legislation on these matters to the extent proposed; and he agreed to a great extent with their Colleague in the House of Commons (Sir Stafford Northcote), that the main object of Parliament should be to reform the governing bodies of the schools and then wait and see what they would do themselves in the way of improvement. Whether the Government ought to appoint an Executive Commission to negotiate with the schools on points of detail was another point; but at present he held that the main thing for Parliament to do was to reform the governing bodies. The Commissioners had recommended in almost all of the schools the addition to the governing body of a small number of persons of distinction appointed by the Crown. If he was concerned in the management of one of those schools, he should be of opinion that such a system would add honour and dignity to the establishment. Recently a good deal had been done to improve schools. The most of these attempts had been made since the appointment of the Commission; but he hoped that what had been done in this way would be regarded as merely provisional, and would be overhauled by the new governing bodies. He had heard with regret that in some of the schools there was some soreness and some complaints of unfairness on the part of the Commissioners. But he must say that having regard to the nature and extent of the work undertaken by the Commissioners, it was hardly to be expected that this could be altogether avoided; and he did not think any serious objection had been taken to the general scope of the inquiry or to the conduct of the Government in having appointed a Commission. He had always thought that after the Universities had been subjected to a severe inquisition, it was quite impossible for those great schools to escape inquiry, or to be left to self-action for reform in their system. Before sitting down he begged to acknowledge in the heartiest way on the part of the Commissioners the spirit in which they had been met by the heads of the various schools. The Government were met in the same way in the first instance, when the late Sir George Lewis opened communications with the authorities of these nine schools; and there was not one subject as to which they were not willing to co-operate with the Commissioners. As to the proposals made in the Report, many of the Commissioners had the utmost affection for these schools, and would have been better satisfied if they could have recommended that less change should take place in them. But the Commissioners felt bound to report according to the evidence as they found it, and he hoped their Lordships would approve the spirit in which they conducted this inquiry.

LORD DE ROS expressed his surprise at the statement of the Commissioners, that boys of nineteen or twenty went to the University from the Public Schools grossly ignorant of the classics, knowing very little of the Christian religion, and not desirous of learning more. Why, was it possible their Lordships did not recollect that the Christian religion was inculcated in these young men by their mothers and guardians in early infancy, and was it likely they would permit such gross neglect as that young gentlemen of Eton should go up to the Universities in this state of ignorance? Then it was said to be the habit of some of the Eton boys to get half drunk on the Sunday afternoon in public-houses. Why, there never was a grosser calumny. The "Christophers" was not a public-house where bargemen or such persons went; when any of their Lordships went at four o'clock to their clubs for a glass of sherry it might as well be said that they went to drink at public-houses. On certain days the Eton boys might be seen wandering all over the country, but there was hardly an instance of complaint against them on the part of farmers and gardeners. This could not be said of private schools. When Dr. Hawtrey showed a French gentleman the boys at their boating, cricketing, and other amusements, the visitor said, "This is all very delightful; but where is your surveillance?" To which Dr. Hawtrey replied, "We have no surveillance; that is my system." He certainly thought that an Eton boy was an admirable model of what an English gentleman ought to be. In the army the colonels of the best regiments always said, "Give us an Eton boy." And in the navy the same thing was said. He confessed that he thought the details of these schools might be too much meddled with, and that it was dangerous to interfere with a system which had given satisfaction for so long a period. In the Report of the Commissioners a good deal was said about fagging. Now, he thought this was one of the most useful trials to which boys were exposed. In early days he had the honour of frequently cleaning the shoes of the most rev. Prelate at the head of the Bishops' Bench, and he had never found himself the worse for it. The most rev. Prelate treated him with the kindness and good nature which his Grace had ever since displayed, and he (Lord de Ros) had never felt degraded by fagging for him in this way. He hoped, therefore, that no recommendations of the Commission would affect the practice of fagging. With regard to Greek Iambics, he agreed that it would be far better to substitute for them some modern language—French or German.

THE DUKE OF MONTROSE thought that the evidence of the Dean of Christ Church as to the classical knowledge of the young men who went up to the University could not be very much depended upon, because it was notorious that no young men whatever went to Christ Church for the purpose of reading. They were supposed to be rich, and went to the University mainly for amusement. There might also be some little wish on the part of the Dean to uphold the School of Westminster; but, before he made such sweeping assertions, it might be well that he should look better at home.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I certainly think that the statement of the Dean of Christ Church was one of the most astounding I ever heard, and one which, so far as my own limited means of information goes, is hardly borne out by my own recollection of the facts. I must, however, protest against the statement of the noble Duke (the Duke of Montrose), that Members of Christ Church go there merely for amusement. My Lords, I do not think that such has been and I hope that such never will be the case, though I hope also that amusements will always form a considerable part of the pursuits there. As to the Bill itself, I do not think it desirable to oppose it; but, at the same time, I beg to observe that considerable alteration may be necessary when we go into Committee. It was only this afternoon that on reading the Bill I became aware of what seems to me an extraordinary proposal. The preamble sets forth that—

“Whereas it is expedient that no impediment should be created to the free action of the Legislature in making the said changes in the governing bodies of the said colleges and schools, by the acquisition of vested interests in the property of the said colleges and schools, by persons who may be appointed to offices in the governing bodies thereof, after the date of the introduction of this Act into the House of Commons.”

Why the House of Commons? Why should it not date from the period of its introduction into this House?

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: It is a mistake in the first print of the Bill. The Bill is now to date from its introduction into the House of Lords.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: That is all very well; but it is by no means the whole of my objection, for if this Bill is to run from the date of its introduction into this House—

EARL GRANVILLE: The 30th of May.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: Then a great and an unjustifiable wrong will be done by the operation of the Bill. On the 1st of June a gentleman who has been an assistant-master and lower master at Eton for twenty-five or thirty years was elected a Fellow; and, therefore, if this Bill is to stand in its present form, it would by one single day cut him off from the hard-earned fruits of his long service; it would be a direct privilegium levied against him—a Bill of pains and penalties to deprive him of the position to which he has so long looked forward. Such a proposal would be perfectly monstrous, and I conclude that the Committee will, without any hesitation, strike out these words. Now as to the subjects which have arisen in the course of this debate, I think all parties agree that classical studies should be made the foundation and groundwork of our school teaching. The only difference of opinion is as to the nature and extent of the additions to be made in the school work, and the relation which these additions are to bear to the original field of studies existing in the various schools. Your Lordships will see that there are two principal and obvious considerations—first, the time available for these additional studies; and, secondly, looking to the age and the variety of intellect of the boys, the nature and extent of these studies. Bearing this in mind, and applying it to the observations made by my noble Friend as to Greek composition, I should be inclined to draw a strong line of demarcation between Greek composition in verse and prose. It seems to me that the study of prose is necessary and most profitable, but that the study of verse is more a matter of luxury. I, for one, should be glad to see the study of Greek verse confined to the highest forms of public schools. Exercise in composition in prose, however, I think is absolutely necessary in order to attain grammatical accuracy and scholarship. But it is perfectly clear that so long as the Universities maintain Greek composition as an integral part of their system, and assign honours to it, so long will it be necessary for public schools, in preparing boys for the Universities, to bestow close attention on the subject. My noble Friend (Lord Lyttelton) advocates the addition of a very large amount of work to that already imposed, and he has numbered up the various studies which it is proposed to add. They consist of modern languages, either French or German, music or drawing, and history. I think your Lordships will agree with me in the opinion that the most important of these recommendations is the study of modern languages, especially French. I would not for a moment undervalue the acquisition of French or any other modern language. On the contrary, I attach the highest possible importance to that department of study. I would give a boy every encouragement in the study of foreign languages, and make success a point of honour with him. I would make failure a point of shame; but I think it is absolutely impracticable to incorporate them as an integral portion of the public school system, and I think I can show the House ample reasons for that opinion. Obviously the best, if not the only good, mode of teaching French is by means of a French master; but if you employ a French teacher to teach French, and incorporate the French as an integral part of your system, the result will be that you must place the French master upon the same footing and give him the same authority as the other assistant-masters. The other assistant-masters, however, have intrusted to them the maintenance of discipline, the formation of the mind, and the inculcation of certain great principles and traditions which are handed down from one generation to another, and in the performance of these duties I absolutely deny that a foreign master can take any part. If this view be correct, you are driven to the necessity of teaching French, not by French, but by English masters. Is it possible to conceive that an English master can undertake such a duty in a public school like Eton? I acknowledge that it is quite possible for the master to be critically and grammatically correct, but, to take the most obvious objection, he must, in nine cases out of ten, find some difficulties in accentuation. It would, consequently, be in the power of any clever and intelligent lad who, from family reasons, had been educated abroad to turn his master into such ridicule that his authority would be endangered. But it has been urged that this mode of instruction is already adopted in some public schools. That I believe to be quite true; but I would ask whether the result has been successful? I hold in my hands conclusive evidence to show that no such success has practically attended these studies. As to conversation in French, it has been acknowledged that a boy will learn more of the language in three months' residence abroad than in five or six years' study at home. I say, then, that it is a simple waste of time to attempt to incorporate these studies with your present school system, because you must sacrifice classics and other work in order to make room for them. As to the music and drawing, I shall not enter upon the discussion of their merits. I beg, however, to enter my protest against the proposed study of English composition. I have been at a loss to know what is meant by English composition. Is it intended to turn out all these boys as great authors and poets when they leave school? Such a result would be a most terrible infliction. All that is necessary for a boy when leaving school is, so far as composition is concerned, that he shall be able to write a clear and intelligible letter and draw up a clear and intelligible statement. The best discipline for the study of English composition is not to be found in the study of the English language as such

in the first instance, but in the study of Latin literature, which gives you the key, so to speak, of the greater part of the European literature. I should as soon have thought that the Commissioners would have recommended that the boys should be taught Lindley Murray as that they should be specially taught English composition. I think that classical studies, if fairly worked out and completely mastered, are the best introduction to every other department of study. So, too, with regard to the study of modern history, the boy who has mastered thoroughly the history of the Roman Commonwealth, will best understand the constitutional history of England in Hallam, and the boy who has become perfectly acquainted with the rivalries and jealousies of the Greek States will most readily appreciate the complicated relationship of the Italian republics as viewed in the pages of Sismondi. The Commissioners recommend also the study of natural science, which, as they themselves admit, involves chymistry on the one hand, and physics on the other. But is it supposed that it will be possible for a boy to master even a portion of the subjects comprised under all these heads—especially when the numerous divisions and sub-divisions are taken into account? The only subjects upon which I think all would desire to see an increase of study attempted in our public schools are French and mathematics, though the former, as I have said, cannot well be made obligatory. There is an impression abroad that the Commissioners, with the very best intention, in their Report, are endeavouring to do too much, by imposing upon boys an amount of study which they cannot possibly give. If that be so, one of two evils will happen—either you will raise the standard of education at our public schools to too high a level, and thus do mischief to the boys by imposing too difficult a task, or you will greatly contribute to produce that most mischievous of all mischievous systems—cramming. I am sure that my noble Friends in their Report have no intention of doing anything of that kind, but such, I am convinced, will be the result of the course they propose to take. You may give a smattering of education—a general knowledge upon many points—but that general knowledge will, in the long run, turn out to be but particular ignorance. I have to apologise for having occupied your Lordships' time—but while I have thought it my duty to express my views with some particularity, and to criticize somewhat freely the Report of the Commissioners, I beg my noble Friend to believe that I am not blind to its merits, and the great care which has been bestowed upon it.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, that having been educated at Eton, he naturally felt great interest in the subject before the House. He could not agree with the noble Lord who had just spoken, in defending without qualification the system of education pursued at Eton. He admitted that that system had many good points, but he also agreed with the Commissioners that it required very considerable modification. He accepted classics as the basis of education, but he thought there were other subjects to which greater attention should be given than was at present done, and that some branches of education which were not now taught should be added. He would remind their Lordships that education had two objects—one, the training and strengthening the faculties of the mind, and the other the acquisition of useful knowledge. Of the two, perhaps the former was the most important. To some extent the system pursued at Eton was deficient in its means to obtain these results, and especially as to that important branch of education—the acquisition of the French language. He regretted to hear his noble Friend say that French ought not to be made a part of the education, as he did not think it was fair to allow boys belonging to the highest classes in the country to pass through their time at Eton without being compelled to acquire a sound knowledge of the French language. It was inconvenient and sometimes difficult for a young man after the age of eighteen to acquire a knowledge of a not very easy language. He would not go beyond French, but the study of that language, he contended, ought to be made an integral part of education; and he would not be deterred from insisting upon that condition by any difficulty of employing a French master. Indeed, he could not see why a distinguished French gentleman might not accept a post at Eton or other public schools, to teach French, just as the master who taught Latin. Then it was said that as some changes had been made at Eton, therefore no other changes were required. He could not take that view. It was to the credit of the Eton masters that they had made some useful changes, and he only wanted them to go somewhat further in the same direction. He had often noticed to masters at Eton that it was an actual disgrace to the school to send up to Cambridge, where mathematics was held in peculiar esteem, young men in whose education that study had not been made an integral part. That consideration, urged by others of greater authority, had prevailed with the Eton masters, who had made a salutary change by introducing mathematics as an integral part of school work. That instance showed that it was possible to make some changes in a good system of teaching without injury to general results. He only wished to add French as a branch of study, for he did not agree with the Commissioners that music and drawing ought to be made parts of public school work. He even felt a doubt as to the natural sciences, although a lecturer upon those subjects might be of advantage to the boys. The introduction of these additional branches of education might, to some extent, justify an observation made on a former evening that too much work would be imposed upon the boys, and that, therefore, it was necessary to consider whether any portion of the present studies could be reduced. That consideration brought him to the much debated questions of Greek and Latin composition. Upon that point he had always held a strong opinion, believing that too much time was devoted to verse making; to be sure he had never attained that proficiency in it which had been displayed by the noble Lord near him (Lord Lyttelton). In former days at Eton, the making of Latin and Greek verses was held to be a most essential part of education; but he desired to see the time occupied in that way materially reduced. There was only one other point to which he would advert. The Report of the Commissioners had been regarded as speaking unfavourably of Eton, which belief had raised a spirit of opposition. He would much regret if that were so, as the labours of the Commissioners had been most useful to public schools, and had been conducted in a spirit of fairness to the public schools which he hoped would be responded to. It was quite true that there were many boys who went from Eton to Christ Church imperfectly prepared; but then, again, there had been many young men from Eton who had greatly distinguished themselves. If, therefore, Eton could produce such creditable pupils, he urged upon the masters of the school to make such judicious alterations in the system of education as would raise the average results. There could be no doubt that a considerable number of boys had left Eton in a state of ignorance which reflected no credit upon the school. That fact had been stated by the Commissioners, and the reasons given, together with the remedies they suggested, and he hoped the good sense and public spirit and love for the school which prevailed among Eton masters would induce them to adopt such of the recommendations of the Commissioners as would remedy the evils admitted to exist.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, he desired to say a few words in explanation of what had fallen from a noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon). The noble Earl had spoken of the date at which the Bill was to take effect. He regretted if the delay in bringing in the Bill should have done any harm to any one, for certainly that was not the intention of the Commissioners. Those who were interested in a reform of certain schools had wished that it should date from the presentation of the Public Schools Commissioners' Report; but that was felt to be too strong a proceeding. The course of dating the Bill from the period of its introduction was, he was informed, according to usage and precedent in such cases. Their Lordships were aware that the Commissioners had reported in favour of certain changes in the governing bodies of schools; but if new interests were created it was manifest that the changes would be postponed, and the object of the Commissioners defeated, because Parliament always dealt lightly with vested interests. He did not think any objection would have been raised to the Bill if it had not been for the particular case to which the noble Earl had drawn attention. But if the Bill was not actually brought in, the intention to bring it in was announced a month ago by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It must, therefore, have been notorious to the Provost and Fellows of Eton. They must also have been aware of the recommendations in the Report of the Commissioners. It would, therefore, have been only wise and proper that they should have communicated with the Government as to the line which they intended to pursue. There was, therefore, the knowledge they might have had and the knowledge they must have had of the actual introduction of the Bill, and with that knowledge they had proceeded to elect a Fellow. The gentleman so elected must have known that he took the election subject to any change that Parliament might think proper to adopt. The proceeding at Harrow was very different. The appointment which had been made there was accepted subject to any future change if the school were remodelled. His feeling, however, was this—he would much rather postpone a reform than do injustice; and, therefore, if it were the opinion of their Lordships that the Bill should not be operative till it passed he should have no objection.

LORD BROUGHAM begged to express on his own behalf, on behalf of all the friends of education and of the community at large, the deepest obligations to his noble Friend the noble Earl (the Earl of Clarendon) and his Colleagues for the able and diligent manner in which they had conducted this great inquiry, the result of which was the production of a body of great bulk, and certainly of unprecedented value, of the most important information derived from the most authentic sources, and accompanied with valuable suggestions. Even those who differed from those suggestions and other parts of the Report were entirely agreed as to the great ability and diligence which had been shown by the Commissioners.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, he did not rise to enter at length on the great question of education at our public schools—a subject which he felt convinced affected the future destinies of the country; but he was anxious to say a few words upon one point, on which he thought the Report of the Commissioners had been somewhat misunderstood. If the object of their recommendation had been to impose an additional amount of labour on an industrious boy he should have considered it more injurious than useful. But the object of the Commissioners was entirely different. They did not want an industrious boy to work more, their object was to give work to the idle by enlarging the choice of their studies. They took a very narrow view of education who would give a boy only the knowledge of two dead languages, and yet that appeared to be the average result of our educational system. With every admiration for the Greek and Latin languages, and fully sensible of the advantages to be derived from their study, he would nevertheless object to say that if a boy had no turn for Greek and Latin he should study nothing else, and that he should be either a dunce or an idiot. Boys might be found by the hundred who, although they had no turn for Greek and Latin, had very good understandings, and it was a great hardship that because they could not attach themselves to the study of the classics they were not to be instructed in other branches of knowledge. It was not always the case that boys who attained the greatest proficiency in classical studies afterwards became the most useful members of society. The Commissioners intended to give other objects of study; how they were to be adopted was the difficulty. Where pronunciation entered so largely into the possession and utility of modern languages it would be exceedingly difficult to engraft them on an English school. The difficulty was not confined to England. Foreign nations had found the difficulty themselves. But with regard to mathematics and physical science there might be a much larger infusion of that element, not so much to make a busy boy do more as to give boys a choice of studies. This was done at Marlborough School. Therefore he hailed the Report of the Commissioners as turning the attention of all those who had to do with public schools to the importance of enlarging their sphere of study. What was wanted was, not that the work for industrious boys should be increased, but that the number of boys who were industrious should be increased. It was a scandal that English gentlemen should so often be wholly ignorant of the commonest things pertaining to physical science, while the less cultivated classes were familiar with them. As to the controversy which had been going on relative to Greek composition, his own impression was that no man could understand a language well without writing in it. Although not agreeing in all the suggestions of the Commissioners, he yet approved them in the main, and anticipated great benefit from their adoption.

THE EARL OF POWIS was understood to suggest that the precedent set in a former Act, in regard to the filling up of cathedral appointments, should be followed in the present Bill—namely, that the Bill should only apply to appointments to be filled up after the passing of it.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON expressed his dissent from the statement made by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon) with respect to Rugby School. He understood the noble Earl to say, that the attempt of Dr. Arnold to engraft the study of modern languages in the ordinary studies of that school had been a complete failure. But his own experience in that matter was quite the reverse. It was true they might not be able to impart a Parisian accent to the boys who learned French at a public school, but they could be taught to read the French language and literature, and so be put in the way of more easily acquiring a more delicate and intimate knowledge of the language if they should afterwards have the good fortune to spend a short time in France. He agreed with the noble Earl that it would not be easy for a Frenchman or German speaking English imperfectly to teach a number of English boys; but it was not impossible that both French and German might be taught by persons who were not natives of France or Germany. When he first took charge of Rugby School, the Chevalier Bunsen had mentioned to him the name of a linguist of European reputation, who afterwards became Professor of Modern Languages at Oxford, as being a man who then might undertake the office of instructing boys at Rugby in modern languages. So that it was quite possible to find foreigners of the highest capacity to undertake the office of instructing boys in public schools in modern languages. Again, many an Englishman of education had spent great part of his life abroad, and would afterwards be qualified to teach a foreign language in a public school. He believed that at Rugby there was now an Englishman who was able to teach German and teach it well; while another foreigner, who was not a Frenchman, was able to teach French with great advantage to his pupils. He wished further to state that his experience did not lead him to suppose that instruction in the modern languages at all diminished boys' opportunities of acquiring a knowledge of the ancient classics. On that point he would refer to what was stated in the evidence of the Dean of Christ Church respecting Eton. The accuracy of that evidence had been questioned by the noble Duke (the Duke of Montrose); but the Dean of Christ Church was not a likely person to make any statement of which he was not prepared to prove the accuracy. Now, certainly, modern languages were neglected at Eton, and yet Eton did not possess a higher reputation for classical teaching than many establishments in which the modern languages were taught. He thought the speech of the noble Earl opposite was calculated to do mischief, by giving his great authority to the idea that the public schools were at present in so satisfactory a state that they did not require any of the reforms recommended by the Commissioners. He should be sorry to force any particular system of education on the public schools, because any change to be useful must be made voluntarily. He believed there was every disposition on their part to adopt the very valuable suggestions made by the Commissioners, and he trusted that the noble Earl's remarks would not tend to impress them with the idea that they were now so perfect that they needed no improvement. What was wanted in all these schools was that they should have the best possible master. They should do away with the restriction, where it existed, as to selecting the master from the teaching staff. It was often better to introduce fresh blood and a little free trade in these as in most other matters. Then, if the best head master possible were appointed, let him have liberty to carry out suggested improvements. Public opinion would be brought to bear upon him, and they would then get the best possible system of instruction. He would have liked to see in the Report some recommendation for making it more easy for classes not in opulent circumstances to avail themselves of the public schools. All the recommendations he had seen rather went the other way. The present practice of receiving a number of boys from the town or neighbourhood in which the school was situated was disparaged, and an examination at which a few clever boys should obtain scholarships was rather suggested as a substitute. Now, at Rugby, a number of widows of naval officers, clergymen, and others of that class, availed themselves of the opportunity of living there to send their sons to school. He did not say that that might not be altered with some advantage, but he did not think it would be well to rely entirely on competitive examinations for introducing the sons of persons in narrow circumstances. There was a tendency to think that it was their duty to educate clever boys only, whereas the object of these schools was to educate stupid boys as well. He was not clear that Sir Walter Scott or the late Duke of Wellington would have succeeded in such an examination. He was anxious to see these schools made available to the largest possible portion of the upper classes of this country.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he was anxious to take that opportunity of declaring his views were in accordance with those of the right rev. Prelate. He was quite sure that whatever advantage might be derived from the education of a particular number of clever boys in foundation schools, which were more or less of an eleemosynary character—and he did not deny that some benefit might be obtained from open scholarships even in those schools—anything like the rejection of boys who might not be thought clever would defeat the intention of the original founders, and would be contrary to the duty of the trustees. It would be a great misfortune if, for the purpose of encouraging a few clever boys to obtain advantages which probably they might not require, the managers of grammar schools should pay no attention to the benevolent intention of founders to provide a good education for boys whose parents were in moderate circumstances, and who otherwise might be unable to acquire the advantages of a good education—at all events to the same extent. He wished to make one or two observations on another point adverted to in the Report of the Commissioners, to which the attention of Parliament had not been directed in the course of the recent discussions. He mentioned it because he was afraid that some of the recommendations of the Commissioners tended to aggravate that which he could not help thinking was a prevailing and increasing evil. Although he believed it was necessary to add to the present course of study at public schools a greater attention to mathematics, history, and some of the modern languages, yet he was afraid that the recommendations of the Commissioners, if carried out to their full extent, would introduce such an amount of variety that they would rather tend to foster a superficial education in a great number of subjects without a well-grounded knowledge of any one of them. He hoped the country would understand that whatever alterations might be made in the public school system, the real evil could not be removed by the public schools themselves—that was to say, boys were now sent to a public school at a comparatively advanced age, with very little groundwork of education, but with a considerable amount of superficial knowledge of a great number of things, which was not only not a good groundwork of education, but was actually worse than no foundation at all. The other day a head master told him that he had in his school boys of the age of fourteen, three of fifteen years, and one of sixteen, who were just beginning, after two years spent in the school, to work their way through the easiest Latin books, such as were the usual studies of boys of ten. He went on to say—and to this he (the Earl of Derby) requested particular attention, that certain private schools, piqued themselves upon the great progress their boys made; whereas they made no progress whatever in anything which deserved the name of education. He mentioned one boy who came to him with a great reputation for lyrics, but who knew little or nothing of the Latin grammar, and another who had gone through the greater part of Newton, but who in reality could not do the simplest problems in Euclid. Such boys were afterwards sent to college, and their parents were frequently dissatisfied with the progress they made there, but the truth was they had to begin everything over again; it was impossible to ground a boy in Latin grammar, which was the basis of all grammar, twice over, and if he had not had the groundwork laid early he had no foundation upon which the superstructure could be raised. A public school was not a place for teaching the elements of grammar, for it was not possible there to give the requisite attention to each particular boy, to find out what his difficulties were, to assist him in getting over them, and to make him sag at the hard work which must be encountered at the beginning of all grammar, and which ought to be done either at home or in a private school. Whatever, then, might be the defects of the public school teaching, he believed a large proportion arose, not from the public school system, but from the fact that boys were sent to Eton or Harrow partially instructed up to a certain point in a great number of things, but really ignorant of the first elements of education. It was impossible, in teaching the Latin grammar, to follow the plan suggested by the Irish gentleman who, on being told that the first two lessons were the hardest, proposed to begin with the third. Where the first and second lessons were not thoroughly mastered there could be no foundation to build upon, and he hoped parents and the teachers of private schools would be impressed with the conviction that it was their business to lay the groundwork, thus giving the public schools and the Universities a fair chance of being able to rear the superstructure. If, on the other hand, they persisted in contenting themselves with imparting a superficial knowledge of a great number of things, which was not education at all, or even the foundation of it, their work would be thrown away, and all the labour of public schools would be incapable of producing fruit.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, the noble Earl could be scarcely aware how the Commissioners were at one with him in this point. He hoped that the noble Earl's remarks would go forth to the country, and that the attention of parents and persons interested in education would be drawn to that portion of the Report in which the Commissioners commented at some length and with some spirit on the state of ignorance in which boys were sent to the public schools. It was exactly because they thought, as his noble Friend thought, that boys should be grounded at school, that they had recommended that there should be an examination for entrance to the public schools, that examination to be proportionate and adapted to the age of the boys.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, that as an old head master, he desired to tender his cordial thanks to the Commissioners for the patient industry and indefatigable zeal with which they had prosecuted their inquiries, and for the most valuable Report which they had presented to Her Majesty; so valuable that it had been read everywhere with avidity. It was agreed on all sides that classical literature should be the staple of public school education, the object of which was, not to communicate a vast amount of information, but to cultivate the moral and intellectual faculties—and (if he might venture to speak of the intellect as an instrument)—to strengthen, sharpen, and polish the intellect to the highest degree, so that it might be made as efficient as possible for any purpose to which it might be applied in after life. The danger of introducing too many subjects was, that they might distract the attention of a boy and prevent him from exercising his mind as he ought to do; and hence he was rather inclined to think that the Commissioners had recommended too great a variety of subjects. At the same time he thought that French or German ought to be made an integral part of public school education. The reason, as he believed, why so much attention had not been paid to these matters was, that the French or German master was not placed in a position of sufficient respect. Hitherto boys had been obliged to attend the French or German master out of school hours, and therefore he was naturally unpopular with them; and, besides, discipline had not been so rigidly enforced in his case as in that of the other masters. If, however, French or German were made an integral part of the school work, and the head master were to attend to the representations of the French or German master as much as to those of the master of any other department, he had no doubt that the languages might be cultivated with great advantage to the boys. He spoke from experience when he said that a very early acquaintance with French, followed in after life by a little intercourse with foreign countries, enabled one to speak the language with comparative ease. As the subject of Greek composition had been spoken of, he would say that while he thought it would be undesirable to make Greek composition a necessary qualification of every boy, he was persuaded that as long as there were prizes in the Universities for Greek prose, or verse, it would be impossible to view the accomplishment in any other light than as one suited for boys who had a turn for it. Allusion had been made to the governing bodies of public schools. In some instances there was a very limited area from which the governors were chosen. It would not always be expedient to extend the area from which the governors were chosen, but he had in view cases in which schools had suffered from a too limited area. The great thing, after all, was that trustees and governors should choose the best master they could, and, having chosen him, that they should leave him to his own discretion and judgment in the management of the school. If they did otherwise they would never have first rate men. As to the council which had been proposed, it would not be desirable to have one the decisions of which should be binding; but he thought there might be advantage in having a council to give advice. Reference had been made by his noble Friend (Lord de Ros) to the high opinion of Eton entertained by general officers. He had himself heard an anecdote of the Duke of Wellington, when about to despatch a young officer on some duty of importance, asking at what school he had been educated, and on being told, "Westminster," replying, "That will do— all right." The public schools were undoubtedly very valuable institutions, but still they were susceptible of improvement, and he thought that the Report of the Commissioners contained some important recommendations which it would be well to follow.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON explained that it was not his intention to make any charge against Rugby. He found, however, on referring to some memoranda which he had by him, that in quoting from memory he had attributed to the head master of Rugby a statement made by the head master of St. Paul's; but the general burden of the evidence bore out his view—that where French was obligatory as a study the pupils might be taught to read, but not to speak the language conversationally.

EARL STANHOPE said, that if even he had not intended to take part in the debate, he must, after the numerous references which had been made to him, have felt it necessary to say a few words. In the first place, he would briefly recapitulate his former argument. The Commissioners had recommended the introduction of five or six new branches of study in the public schools, and, as he stated the other evening, it seemed impossible to accomplish that object without either undue pressure on the time and health of the boys, or without withdrawing some of the existing tasks. He admitted the value and necessity of these new studies, and the main object of his remarks on the former occasion was to show how other studies of less practical utility might be curtailed or relinquished. Above all, he had pointed out the disproportion between the value of a knowledge of Greek versification and the time and trouble that were requisite for its attainment. In support of that view he cited the opinion of a high authority—Dr. Whewell. In reply to that statement, it had been stated in the present evening that Dr. Whewell was eminent only as a mathematician; but those who spoke thus must surely be unacquainted with the extent of Dr. Whewell's labours in classic literature—in Plato for example. In point of fact, he was distinguished as a great scholar as well as a great mathematician. But if Dr. Whewell's testimony was not sufficient, perhaps Lord Macaulay's might be accepted; and it was to the same effect. In his short but excellent Life of Pitt Lord Macaulay said—

"Mr. Pitt had never while under his tutor's care been in the habit of composing in the ancient languages, and he, therefore, never ac-

EARL GRANVILLE said, their Lordships would agree with the noble Earl (the Earl of Lucan) that the overcrowded state of Park Lane occasioned a perpetual nuisance owing to the stoppages which constantly occurred there. The real question was how it could be relieved, and there was a difference of opinion respecting the best mode of doing this. Some years ago a Committee of the other House recommended, by way of improvement, that Hamilton Place should be opened for traffic. The First Commissioner introduced a Bill for that purpose, but it was opposed by the Treasury on two grounds—first, that in the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown it would be a breach of faith with the lessees to open Hamilton Place; and, secondly, that it was not the business of the Government but of the Metropolitan Board of Works to make the opening. He believed the matter was now under the consideration of the Metropolitan Board.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he could hardly think the statement of the noble Earl the President of the Council to be valid. In the first place, the Law Officers of the Crown did not appear to be consistent in their opinions. Three years ago he (the Earl of Malmesbury) had been ejected from a house which had been held by his family for upwards of eighty years, on the assigned reason that it was required for a temporary Foreign Office. He received the value of his lease, and some compensation for the inconvenience to which he was subjected. He did not believe that the lessees of Hamilton Place would resist any fair proposal that might be made to them. With respect to the argument that these improvements ought to be paid for out of the general rates of the metropolis, he did not think there was much force in it. The argument might have been a good one twenty or thirty years ago, but now it did not stand upon the same ground. The fact was that the impediment was caused by the enormous concourse of people whom the railways brought from the country. If the metropolis were left to the regular inhabitants there would be room for every one in the streets, but owing to the new invention of railways, which gave facilities to every one to come to London, the streets were becoming choked. He thought, therefore, it would only be fair that the improvements rendered necessary by this influx of visitors should be paid for out of the general taxation; indeed, no tax could be more fair than a general tax for the relief of the principal streets of London.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, that the inconvenience now experienced in Park Lane would be remedied to a great extent by simple police regulation. It was a most monstrous thing that the whole traffic should be stopped because one or two tradesmen choose to allow their carts to stand for hours together at their doors. One cart standing at a particular part of the Lane, just opposite the entrance of his house, permitted only one line of carriages to pass, putting an entire stop to the flow the other way. He did not see why the police should not have power to prevent any carts being allowed to stop in Park Lane for two, four, or five minutes at a time. He did not know whether they had the power, but was told they had not, and it was a power which might advantageously be intrusted to them. He agreed with his noble Friend who had just spoken, that the railways had an effect upon the streets of the metropolis. Since he (the Duke of Cambridge) had lived where he did, the traffic through Park Lane had enormously increased. This was caused, to a great extent, by the opening of the Victoria station. Formerly there were no omnibuses passing down Park Lane; now there was a regular service of them; and the flow from the Paddington station to that of Victoria was enormous. He might assume that this was not the proper London traffic, and he could not help thinking that the expense of the improvements should be borne not by the ratepayers of St. George's or of the metropolis, but by the country generally.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW said, that nothing more was required to relieve Park Lane than to give the public possession of the small angle of the Park between Grosvenor Gate and Hyde Park Corner. The communication between Baywater and Kensington had been facilitated in a similar way. No expense would be thrown either upon the metropolis or upon the country at large.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, its object was to provide that any person accepting office in a public school should do so subject to the future legislation of Parliament.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2<sup>d</sup>.

LORD LYTTTELTON said, he wished to take this occasion to refer to one or two points raised the other evening by the noble Earl (Earl Stanhope). His noble Friend had hardly done justice to the head master of Eton in representing him to have said that at Eton nothing was done in the way of teaching English. It was true that at Eton nothing was done in regard to the direct teaching of English, but the head master distinctly stated in his evidence that they did profess to teach English through the teaching of the classics; and if proper attention were paid to the matter, no doubt a very real and substantial amount of instruction in English might be imparted in that way; but it was a question whether it was enough. His noble Friend had expressed an opinion that undue prominence was given in the recommendations of the Commissioners to the subject of applied mathematics. The Commissioners, however, were bound to consult, not merely their own views, but the state of public feeling in the country, and the opinions of men of experience and authority. Accordingly, in assigning the positions they had done to applied mathematics, they had been guided very much by the evidence of the Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, Dr. Whewell. In regard to physical science, he must confess his own ignorance of the subject. He had, therefore, no personal authority on the subject; but he felt that, in face of the testimony borne by such men as Sir Charles Lyell, Professor Owen, Professor Faraday, and other eminent men of science, the Commissioners would not have been justified in recommending less than they had done. This matter was connected with another, which he might term rather elegant accomplishments than learning—music and drawing. His noble Friend opposite (Earl Stanhope) had made some very amusing observations, that a man who did not like music did not necessarily like drawing, and vice versa. Now, it was very well known that as a general rule boys did not like any work at all; and what the Commissioners desired was that the opportunity of ascertaining whether they had capacity and taste for certain studies should be not only offered, but actually forced on them, without which they never would know it. It had been stated that many persons in mature life, having discovered an aptitude for particular branches of natural science, had expressed deep regret that their attention had not been called to these subjects when they were young. It was in order to draw out the dormant powers of the boys that the Commissioners wished these things to be brought before them; and he had no doubt they would be thankful for the recommendation. These studies or accomplishments were generally taught in private schools and in families; and there appeared no reason why they could not be introduced into the public schools with advantage. There was no risk of the health of the boys being injured by the addition of these new subjects of study. The actual amount of work would not be increased, although there would be greater variety. It was his own opinion and he believed that of several of his colleagues on the Commission, that in one or two of the public schools, and especially in some of the greater and more important establishments, the amount of work might be augmented without any danger to health; but in no case would the recommendations of the Commissioners necessarily lead to any increase of labour. Indeed, in certain respects, they had even advised a diminution in the amount of work done. He was anxious that there should be no misapprehension on this matter, and he would just state the distribution which they proposed of an Eton boy's day. Eight hours would be allowed for sleep, two hours for meals, and a short daily chapel service, while the remaining fourteen would be equally divided between work and recreation—seven hours to each. The work would include all the preparation of school tasks, in which some boys might be slower than others, but which all would be able to accomplish without losing their share of relaxation. They recommended that, with all those safeguards, when a boy had arrived at a certain age he should be enabled to drop certain parts of his work, if he had clearly shown inaptitude for them, in order to take up other parts in which he had proved himself likely to succeed better. They recommended that this course might be adopted when a boy was about sixteen years of age. His noble Friend opposite had said, when a boy was arriving at proficiency in a subject the Commissioners would take him from it. That was precisely what they would not do; but when a boy had not arrived at proficiency in a particular study, and showed no likelihood of doing so, they recommended that he should be removed from it and put to other work. The recommendation was one which he hoped the House would adopt, because it was based upon some very strong evidence; he referred particularly to that of Mr. Evans, at Rugby. There was little more with which he wished to detain the House, except in reference to what had been said about Greek and Latin composition. In his admirable Life of Pitt, his noble Friend opposite (Earl Stanhope) said, he thought perhaps with somewhat questionable accuracy, that that great man was not a proficient in the "laborious inutilities of classical metre." That was his noble Friend's expression, and it was one which had rankled in his mind ever since he read it. And the other day his noble Friend said that the verses done for the Porson Prize for Greek Iambics at Cambridge were a preposterous attempt. [Earl STANHOPE: I never said anything of the kind.] Yes; his noble Friend said that if the shadow of Shakespeare could revisit the earth he would turn to raillery the preposterous attempts made to put him into Greek metre—Shakespeare or Massinger, or some such dramatist, being the authors selected for those Iambics, and that was the Porson Prize. He apprehended that Shakespeare did not know Greek; but if his noble Friend could find a single person acquainted with Shakespeare and also with the Greek tragedians who would adopt his opinion that the Porson Prize Poems were preposterous productions, he would almost promise to agree with his noble Friend likewise. His noble Friend had alluded to the Germans. They were, no doubt, very laborious and deeply learned; but in knowledge of the languages he was not aware that they excelled English scholars. Nor could his noble Friend produce one Oxford or Cambridge tutor among those who had given evidence before the Commission who had advocated the abolition of that practice. One eminent man, Mr. Neate, might be quoted; but he was no witness for his noble Friend, as he went far beyond him, and was for abolishing the study of Greek altogether. The question was, if any one could be found who, while in favour of the study of Greek, was against Greek composition. Dean Liddell had been quoted, but he, though he gave some damaging evidence as to the imperfect preparation of boys from public schools, was certainly not against the practice of composition. And with regard to Dr. Whewell,

as an old pupil of his, he spoke with the utmost reverence of him; but he would himself admit that the classical languages were not the subject in which he spoke with special authority. He ventured to say that no such authority could be found. His noble Friend had wholly overlooked the great general argument against him—namely, the intense pleasure, delight, and interest which boys with any turn for the classics manifested in Greek and Latin composition. No doubt he spoke from experience, and, perhaps, with some little bias; but he was sure not only he but others felt both at Eton and Cambridge the utmost pleasure in the work of composition. Half their interest in their work would have been removed if composition had been taken away. He thought it was wise in the present Session to limit legislation on these matters to the extent proposed; and he agreed to a great extent with their Colleague in the House of Commons (Sir Stafford Northcote), that the main object of Parliament should be to reform the governing bodies of the schools and then wait and see what they would do themselves in the way of improvement. Whether the Government ought to appoint an Executive Commission to negotiate with the schools on points of detail was another point; but at present he held that the main thing for Parliament to do was to reform the governing bodies. The Commissioners had recommended in almost all of the schools the addition to the governing body of a small number of persons of distinction appointed by the Crown. If he was concerned in the management of one of those schools, he should be of opinion that such a system would add honour and dignity to the establishment. Recently a good deal had been done to improve schools. The most of these attempts had been made since the appointment of the Commission; but he hoped that what had been done in this way would be regarded as merely provisional, and would be overhauled by the new governing bodies. He had heard with regret that in some of the schools there was some soreness and some complaints of unfairness on the part of the Commissioners. But he must say that having regard to the nature and extent of the work undertaken by the Commissioners, it was hardly to be expected that this could be altogether avoided; and he did not think any serious objection had been taken to the general scope of the inquiry or

to the conduct of the Government in having appointed a Commission. He had always thought that after the Universities had been subjected to a severe inquisition, it was quite impossible for those great schools to escape inquiry, or to be left to self-action for reform in their system. Before sitting down he begged to acknowledge in the heartiest way on the part of the Commissioners the spirit in which they had been met by the heads of the various schools. The Government were met in the same way in the first instance, when the late Sir George Lewis opened communications with the authorities of these nine schools; and there was not one subject as to which they were not willing to co-operate with the Commissioners. As to the proposals made in the Report, many of the Commissioners had the utmost affection for these schools, and would have been better satisfied if they could have recommended that less change should take place in them. But the Commissioners felt bound to report according to the evidence as they found it, and he hoped their Lordships would approve the spirit in which they conducted this inquiry.

LORD DE ROS expressed his surprise at the statement of the Commissioners, that boys of nineteen or twenty went to the University from the Public Schools grossly ignorant of the classics, knowing very little of the Christian religion, and not desirous of learning more. Why, was it possible their Lordships did not recollect that the Christian religion was inculcated in these young men by their mothers and guardians in early infancy, and was it likely they would permit such gross neglect as that young gentlemen of Eton should go up to the Universities in this state of ignorance? Then it was said to be the habit of some of the Eton boys to get half drunk on the Sunday afternoon in public-houses. Why, there never was a grosser calumny. The "Christophers" was not a public-house where bargemen or such persons went; when any of their Lordships went at four o'clock to their clubs for a glass of sherry it might as well be said that they went to drink at public-houses. On certain days the Eton boys might be seen wandering all over the country, but there was hardly an instance of complaint against them on the part of farmers and gardeners. This could not be said of private schools. When Dr. Hawtrey showed a French gentleman the boys at their boating, cricketing, and other amusements, the visitor said, "This is all very delightful; but where is your surveillance?" To which Dr. Hawtrey replied, "We have no surveillance; that is my system." He certainly thought that an Eton boy was an admirable model of what an English gentleman ought to be. In the army the colonels of the best regiments always said, "Give us an Eton boy." And in the navy the same thing was said. He confessed that he thought the details of these schools might be too much meddled with, and that it was dangerous to interfere with a system which had given satisfaction for so long a period. In the Report of the Commissioners a good deal was said about fagging. Now, he thought this was one of the most useful trials to which boys were exposed. In early days he had the honour of frequently cleaning the shoes of the most rev. Prelate at the head of the Bishops' Bench, and he had never found himself the worse for it. The most rev. Prelate treated him with the kindness and good nature which his Grace had ever since displayed, and he (Lord de Ros) had never felt degraded by fagging for him in this way. He hoped, therefore, that no recommendations of the Commission would affect the practice of fagging. With regard to Greek Iambics, he agreed that it would be far better to substitute for them some modern language—French or German.

THE DUKE OF MONTROSE thought that the evidence of the Dean of Christ Church as to the classical knowledge of the young men who went up to the University could not be very much depended upon, because it was notorious that no young men whatever went to Christ Church for the purpose of reading. They were supposed to be rich, and went to the University mainly for amusement. There might also be some little wish on the part of the Dean to uphold the School of Westminster; but, before he made such sweeping assertions, it might be well that he should look better at home.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I certainly think that the statement of the Dean of Christ Church was one of the most astounding I ever heard, and one which, so far as my own limited means of information goes, is hardly borne out by my own recollection of the facts. I must, however, protest against the statement of the noble Duke (the Duke of Montrose), that Members of Christ Church go there merely for amusement. My Lords, I do not think that such has been and I hope of doing so, they recommended that he should be removed from it and put to other work. The recommendation was one which he hoped the House would adopt, because it was based upon some very strong evidence; he referred particularly to that of Mr. Evans, at Rugby. There was little more with which he wished to detain the House, except in reference to what had been said about Greek and Latin composition. In his admirable Life of Pitt, his noble Friend opposite (Earl Stanhope) said, he thought perhaps with somewhat questionable accuracy, that that great man was not a proficient in the "laborious inutilities of classical metre." That was his noble Friend's expression, and it was one which had rankled in his mind ever since he read it. And the other day his noble Friend said that the verses done for the Porson Prize for Greek Iambics at Cambridge were a preposterous attempt. [Earl STANHOPE: I never said anything of the kind.] Yes; his noble Friend said that if the shadow of Shakespeare could revisit the earth he would turn to raillery the preposterous attempts made to put him into Greek metre—Shakespeare or Massinger, or some such dramatist, being the authors selected for those Iambics, and that was the Porson Prize. He apprehended that Shakespeare did not know Greek; but if his noble Friend could find a single person acquainted with Shakespeare and also with the Greek tragedians who would adopt his opinion that the Porson Prize Poems were preposterous productions, he would almost promise to agree with his noble Friend likewise. His noble Friend had alluded to the Germans. They were, no doubt, very laborious and deeply learned; but in knowledge of the languages he was not aware that they excelled English scholars. Nor could his noble Friend produce one Oxford or Cambridge tutor among those who had given evidence before the Commission who had advocated the abolition of that practice. One eminent man, Mr. Neate, might be quoted; but he was no witness for his noble Friend, as he went far beyond him, and was for abolishing the study of Greek altogether. The question was, if any one could be found who, while in favour of the study of Greek, was against Greek composition. Dean Liddell had been quoted, but he, though he gave some damaging evidence as to the imperfect preparation of boys from public schools, was certainly not against the practice of composition. And with regard to Dr. Whewell,

as an old pupil of his, he spoke with the utmost reverence of him; but he would himself admit that the classical languages were not the subject in which he spoke with special authority. He ventured to say that no such authority could be found. His noble Friend had wholly overlooked the great general argument against him—namely, the intense pleasure, delight, and interest which boys with any turn for the classics manifested in Greek and Latin composition. No doubt he spoke from experience, and, perhaps, with some little bias; but he was sure not only he but others felt both at Eton and Cambridge the utmost pleasure in the work of composition. Half their interest in their work would have been removed if composition had been taken away. He thought it was wise in the present Session to limit legislation on these matters to the extent proposed; and he agreed to a great extent with their Colleague in the House of Commons (Sir Stafford Northcote), that the main object of Parliament should be to reform the governing bodies of the schools and then wait and see what they would do themselves in the way of improvement. Whether the Government ought to appoint an Executive Commission to negotiate with the schools on points of detail was another point; but at present he held that the main thing for Parliament to do was to reform the governing bodies. The Commissioners had recommended in almost all of the schools the addition to the governing body of a small number of persons of distinction appointed by the Crown. If he was concerned in the management of one of those schools, he should be of opinion that such a system would add honour and dignity to the establishment. Recently a good deal had been done to improve schools. The most of these attempts had been made since the appointment of the Commission; but he hoped that what had been done in this way would be regarded as merely provisional, and would be overhauled by the new governing bodies. THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I certainly think that the statement of the Dean of Christ Church was one of the most astounding I ever heard, and one which, so far as my own limited means of information goes, is hardly borne out by my own recollection of the facts. I must, however, protest against the statement of the noble Duke (the Duke of Montrose), that Members of Christ Church go there merely for amusement. My Lords, I do not think that such has been and I hope that such never will be the case, though I hope also that amusements will always form a considerable part of the pursuits there. As to the Bill itself, I do not think it desirable to oppose it; but, at the same time, I beg to observe that considerable alteration may be necessary when we go into Committee. It was only this afternoon that on reading the Bill I became aware of what seems to me an extraordinary proposal. The preamble sets forth that—

“Whereas it is expedient that no impediment should be created to the free action of the Legislature in making the said changes in the governing bodies of the said colleges and schools, by the acquisition of vested interests in the property of the said colleges and schools, by persons who may be appointed to offices in the governing bodies thereof, after the date of the introduction of this Act into the House of Commons.”

Why the House of Commons? Why should it not date from the period of its introduction into this House?

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: It is a mistake in the first print of the Bill. The Bill is now to date from its introduction into the House of Lords.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: That is all very well; but it is by no means the whole of my objection, for if this Bill is to run from the date of its introduction into this House—

EARL GRANVILLE: The 30th of May.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: Then a great and an unjustifiable wrong will be done by the operation of the Bill. On the 1st of June a gentleman who has been an assistant-master and lower master at Eton for twenty-five or thirty years was elected a Fellow; and, therefore, if this Bill is to stand in its present form, it would by one single day cut him off from the hard-earned fruits of his long service; it would be a direct privilegium levied against him—a Bill of pains and penalties to deprive him of the position to which he has so long looked forward. Such a proposal would be perfectly monstrous, and I conclude that the Committee will, without any hesitation, strike out these words. Now as to the subjects which have arisen in the course of this debate, I think all parties agree that classical studies should be made the foundation and groundwork of our school teaching. The only difference of opinion is as to the nature and extent of the additions to be made in the school work, and the relation which these additions are to bear to the original field of studies existing in the various schools. Your Lordships will see that there are two principal and obvious considerations—first, the time available for these additional studies; and, secondly, looking to the age and the variety of intellect of the boys, the nature and extent of these studies. Bearing this in mind, and applying it to the observations made by my noble Friend as to Greek composition, I should be inclined to draw a strong line of demarcation between Greek composition in verse and prose. It seems to me that the study of prose is necessary and most profitable, but that the study of verse is more a matter of luxury. I, for one, should be glad to see the study of Greek verse confined to the highest forms of public schools. Exercise in composition in prose, however, I think is absolutely necessary in order to attain grammatical accuracy and scholarship. But it is perfectly clear that so long as the Universities maintain Greek composition as an integral part of their system, and assign honours to it, so long will it be necessary for public schools, in preparing boys for the Universities, to bestow close attention on the subject. My noble Friend (Lord Lyttelton) advocates the addition of a very large amount of work to that already imposed, and he has numbered up the various studies which it is proposed to add. They consist of modern languages, either French or German, music or drawing, and history. I think your Lordships will agree with me in the opinion that the most important of these recommendations is the study of modern languages, especially French. I would not for a moment undervalue the acquisition of French or any other modern language. On the contrary, I attach the highest possible importance to that department of study. I would give a boy every encouragement in the study of foreign languages, and make success a point of honour with him. I would make failure a point of shame; but I think it is absolutely impracticable to incorporate them as an integral portion of the public school system, and I think I can show the House ample reasons for that opinion. Obviously the best, if not the only good, mode of teaching French is by means of a French master; but if you employ a French teacher to teach French, and incorporate the French as an integral part of your system, the result will be that you must place the French master upon the same

footing and give him the same authority as the other assistant-masters. The other assistant-masters, however, have intrusted to them the maintenance of discipline, the formation of the mind, and the inculcation of certain great principles and traditions which are handed down from one generation to another, and in the performance of these duties I absolutely deny that a foreign master can take any part. If this view be correct, you are driven to the necessity of teaching French, not by French, but by English masters. Is it possible to conceive that an English master can undertake such a duty in a public school like Eton? I acknowledge that it is quite possible for the master to be critically and grammatically correct, but, to take the most obvious objection, he must, in nine cases out of ten, find some difficulties in accentuation. It would, consequently, be in the power of any clever and intelligent lad who, from family reasons, had been educated abroad to turn his master into such ridicule that his authority would be endangered. But it has been urged that this mode of instruction is already adopted in some public schools. That I believe to be quite true; but I would ask whether the result has been successful? I hold in my hands conclusive evidence to show that no such success has practically attended these studies. As to conversation in French, it has been acknowledged that a boy will learn more of the language in three months' residence abroad than in five or six years' study at home. I say, then, that it is a simple waste of time to attempt to incorporate these studies with your present school system, because you must sacrifice classics and other work in order to make room for them. As to the music and drawing, I shall not enter upon the discussion of their merits. I beg, however, to enter my protest against the proposed study of English composition. I have been at a loss to know what is meant by English composition. Is it intended to turn out all these boys as great authors and poets when they leave school? Such a result would be a most terrible infliction. All that is necessary for a boy when leaving school is, so far as composition is concerned, that he shall be able to write a clear and intelligible letter and draw up a clear and intelligible statement. The best discipline for the study of English composition is not to be found in the study of the English language as such

in the first instance, but in the study of Latin literature, which gives you the key, so to speak, of the greater part of the European literature. I should as soon have thought that the Commissioners would have recommended that the boys should be taught Lindley Murray as that they should be specially taught English composition. I think that classical studies, if fairly worked out and completely mastered, are the best introduction to every other department of study. So, too, with regard to the study of modern history, the boy who has mastered thoroughly the history of the Roman Commonwealth, will best understand the constitutional history of England in Hallam, and the boy who has become perfectly acquainted with the rivalries and jealousies of the Greek States will most readily appreciate the complicated relationship of the Italian republics as viewed in the pages of Sismondi. The Commissioners recommend also the study of natural science, which, as they themselves admit, involves chymistry on the one hand, and physics on the other. But is it supposed that it will be possible for a boy to master even a portion of the subjects comprised under all these heads—especially when the numerous divisions and sub-divisions are taken into account? The only subjects upon which I think all would desire to see an increase of study attempted in our public schools are French and mathematics, though the former, as I have said, cannot well be made obligatory. There is an impression abroad that the Commissioners, with the very best intention, in their Report, are endeavouring to do too much, by imposing upon boys an amount of study which they cannot possibly give. If that be so, one of two evils will happen—either you will raise the standard of education at our public schools to too high a level, and thus do mischief to the boys by imposing too difficult a task, or you will greatly contribute to produce that most mischievous of all mischievous systems—cramming. I am sure that my noble Friends in their Report have no intention of doing anything of that kind, but such, I am convinced, will be the result of the course they propose to take. You may give a smattering of education—a general knowledge upon many points—but that general knowledge will, in the long run, turn out to be but particular ignorance. I have to apologize for having occupied your Lordships' time—but while I have thought it my duty to express my views with some particularity, and to criticize somewhat freely the Report of the Commissioners, I beg my noble Friend to believe that I am not blind to its merits, and the great care which has been bestowed upon it.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, that having been educated at Eton, he naturally felt great interest in the subject before the House. He could not agree with the noble Lord who had just spoken, in defending without qualification the system of education pursued at Eton. He admitted that that system had many good points, but he also agreed with the Commissioners that it required very considerable modification. He accepted classics as the basis of education, but he thought there were other subjects to which greater attention should be given than was at present done, and that some branches of education which were not now taught should be added. He would remind their Lordships that education had two objects—one, the training and strengthening the faculties of the mind, and the other the acquisition of useful knowledge. Of the two, perhaps the former was the most important. To some extent the system pursued at Eton was deficient in its means to obtain these results, and especially as to that important branch of education—the acquisition of the French language. He regretted to hear his noble Friend say that French ought not to be made a part of the education, as he did not think it was fair to allow boys belonging to the highest classes in the country to pass through their time at Eton without being compelled to acquire a sound knowledge of the French language. It was inconvenient and sometimes difficult for a young man after the age of eighteen to acquire a knowledge of a not very easy language. He would not go beyond French, but the study of that language, he contended, ought to be made an integral part of education; and he would not be deterred from insisting upon that condition by any difficulty of employing a French master. Indeed, he could not see why a distinguished French gentleman might not accept a post at Eton or other public schools, to teach French, just as the master who taught Latin. Then it was said that as some changes had been made at Eton, therefore no other changes were required. He could not take that view. It was to the credit of the Eton masters that they had made some useful changes, and he only wanted them to go somewhat further in the same direction. He had often noticed to masters at Eton that it was an actual disgrace to the school to send up to Cambridge, where mathematics was held in peculiar esteem, young men in whose education that study had not been made an integral part. That consideration, urged by others of greater authority, had prevailed with the Eton masters, who had made a salutary change by introducing mathematics as an integral part of school work. That instance showed that it was possible to make some changes in a good system of teaching without injury to general results. He only wished to add French as a branch of study, for he did not agree with the Commissioners that music and drawing ought to be made parts of public school work. He even felt a doubt as to the natural sciences, although a lecturer upon those subjects might be of advantage to the boys. The introduction of these additional branches of education might, to some extent, justify an observation made on a former evening that too much work would be imposed upon the boys, and that, therefore, it was necessary to consider whether any portion of the present studies could be reduced. That consideration brought him to the much debated questions of Greek and Latin composition. Upon that point he had always held a strong opinion, believing that too much time was devoted to verse making; to be sure he had never attained that proficiency in it which had been displayed by the noble Lord near him (Lord Lyttelton). In former days at Eton, the making of Latin and Greek verses was held to be a most essential part of education; but he desired to see the time occupied in that way materially reduced. There was only one other point to which he would advert. The Report of the Commissioners had been regarded as speaking unfavourably of Eton, which belief had raised a spirit of opposition. He would much regret if that were so, as the labours of the Commissioners had been most useful to public schools, and had been conducted in a spirit of fairness to the public schools which he hoped would be responded to. It was quite true that there were many boys who went from Eton to Christ Church imperfectly prepared; but then, again, there had been many young men from Eton who had greatly distinguished themselves. If, therefore, Eton could produce such creditable pupils, he urged upon the masters of the school to make such judicious alterations in the system of education as would raise the average results. There could be no doubt that a considerable number of boys had left Eton in a state of ignorance which reflected no credit upon the school. That fact had been stated by the Commissioners, and the reasons given, together with the remedies they suggested, and he hoped the good sense and public spirit and love for the school which prevailed among Eton masters would induce them to adopt such of the recommendations of the Commissioners as would remedy the evils admitted to exist.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, he desired to say a few words in explanation of what had fallen from a noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon). The noble Earl had spoken of the date at which the Bill was to take effect. He regretted if the delay in bringing in the Bill should have done any harm to any one, for certainly that was not the intention of the Commissioners. Those who were interested in a reform of certain schools had wished that it should date from the presentation of the Public Schools Commissioners' Report; but that was felt to be too strong a proceeding. The course of dating the Bill from the period of its introduction was, he was informed, according to usage and precedent in such cases. Their Lordships were aware that the Commissioners had reported in favour of certain changes in the governing bodies of schools; but if new interests were created it was manifest that the changes would be postponed, and the object of the Commissioners defeated, because Parliament always dealt lightly with vested interests. He did not think any objection would have been raised to the Bill if it had not been for the particular case to which the noble Earl had drawn attention. But if the Bill was not actually brought in, the intention to bring it in was announced a month ago by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It must, therefore, have been notorious to the Provost and Fellows of Eton. They must also have been aware of the recommendations in the Report of the Commissioners. It would, therefore, have been only wise and proper that they should have communicated with the Government as to the line which they intended to pursue. There was, therefore, the knowledge they might have had and the knowledge they must have had of the actual introduction of the Bill, and with that knowledge they had proceeded to elect a Fellow. The gentleman so elected must have known that he took the election subject to any change that Parliament might think proper to adopt. The proceeding at Harrow was very different. The appointment which had been made there was accepted subject to any future change if the school were remodelled. His feeling, however, was this—he would much rather postpone a reform than do injustice; and, therefore, if it were the opinion of their Lordships that the Bill should not be operative till it passed he should have no objection.

LORD BROUGHAM begged to express on his own behalf, on behalf of all the friends of education and of the community at large, the deepest obligations to his noble Friend the noble Earl (the Earl of Clarendon) and his Colleagues for the able and diligent manner in which they had conducted this great inquiry, the result of which was the production of a body of great bulk, and certainly of unprecedented value, of the most important information derived from the most authentic sources, and accompanied with valuable suggestions. Even those who differed from those suggestions and other parts of the Report were entirely agreed as to the great ability and diligence which had been shown by the Commissioners.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, he did not rise to enter at length on the great question of education at our public schools—a subject which he felt convinced affected the future destinies of the country; but he was anxious to say a few words upon one point, on which he thought the Report of the Commissioners had been somewhat misunderstood. If the object of their recommendation had been to impose an additional amount of labour on an industrious boy he should have considered it more injurious than useful. But the object of the Commissioners was entirely different. They did not want an industrious boy to work more, their object was to give work to the idle by enlarging the choice of their studies. They took a very narrow view of education who would give a boy only the knowledge of two dead languages, and yet that appeared to be the average result of our educational system. With every admiration for the Greek and Latin languages, and fully sensible of the advantages to be derived from their study, he would nevertheless object to say that if a boy had no turn for Greek and Latin he should study nothing else, and that he should be either

a dunce or an idiot. Boys might be found by the hundred who, although they had no turn for Greek and Latin, had very good understandings, and it was a great hardship that because they could not attach themselves to the study of the classics they were not to be instructed in other branches of knowledge. It was not always the case that boys who attained the greatest proficiency in classical studies afterwards became the most useful members of society. The Commissioners intended to give other objects of study; how they were to be adopted was the difficulty. Where pronunciation entered so largely into the possession and utility of modern languages it would be exceedingly difficult to engraft them on an English school. The difficulty was not confined to England. Foreign nations had found the difficulty themselves. But with regard to mathematics and physical science there might be a much larger infusion of that element, not so much to make a busy boy do more as to give boys a choice of studies. This was done at Marlborough School. Therefore he hailed the Report of the Commissioners as turning the attention of all those who had to do with public schools to the importance of enlarging their sphere of study. What was wanted was, not that the work for industrious boys should be increased, but that the number of boys who were industrious should be increased. It was a scandal that English gentlemen should so often be wholly ignorant of the commonest things pertaining to physical science, while the less cultivated classes were familiar with them. As to the controversy which had been going on relative to Greek composition, his own impression was that no man could understand a language well without writing in it. Although not agreeing in all the suggestions of the Commissioners, he yet approved them in the main, and anticipated great benefit from their adoption.

THE EARL OF POWIS was understood to suggest that the precedent set in a former Act, in regard to the filling up of cathedral appointments, should be followed in the present Bill—namely, that the Bill should only apply to appointments to be filled up after the passing of it.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON expressed his dissent from the statement made by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon) with respect to Rugby School. He understood the noble Earl to say, that the attempt of Dr. Arnold to engraft the study of modern languages in the ordinary studies of that school had been a complete failure. But his own experience in that matter was quite the reverse. It was true they might not be able to impart a Parisian accent to the boys who learned French at a public school, but they could be taught to read the French language and literature, and so be put in the way of more easily acquiring a more delicate and intimate knowledge of the language if they should afterwards have the good fortune to spend a short time in France. He agreed with the noble Earl that it would not be easy for a Frenchman or German speaking English imperfectly to teach a number of English boys; but it was not impossible that both French and German might be taught by persons who were not natives of France or Germany. When he first took charge of Rugby School, the Chevalier Bunsen had mentioned to him the name of a linguist of European reputation, who afterwards became Professor of Modern Languages at Oxford, as being a man who then might undertake the office of instructing boys at Rugby in modern languages. So that it was quite possible to find foreigners of the highest capacity to undertake the office of instructing boys in public schools in modern languages. Again, many an Englishman of education had spent great part of his life abroad, and would afterwards be qualified to teach a foreign language in a public school. He believed that at Rugby there was now an Englishman who was able to teach German and teach it well; while another foreigner, who was not a Frenchman, was able to teach French with great advantage to his pupils. He wished further to state that his experience did not lead him to suppose that instruction in the modern languages at all diminished boys' opportunities of acquiring a knowledge of the ancient classics. On that point he would refer to what was stated in the evidence of the Dean of Christ Church respecting Eton. The accuracy of that evidence had been questioned by the noble Duke (the Duke of Montrose); but the Dean of Christ Church was not a likely person to make any statement of which he was not prepared to prove the accuracy. Now, certainly, modern languages were neglected at Eton, and yet Eton did not possess a higher reputation for classical teaching than many establishments in which the modern languages were taught. He thought the speech of the noble Earl opposite was calculated to do mischief, by giving his great authority to the idea that the public schools were at present in so satisfactory a state that they did not require any of the reforms recommended by the Commissioners. He should be sorry to force any particular system of education on the public schools, because any change to be useful must be made voluntarily. He believed there was every disposition on their part to adopt the very valuable suggestions made by the Commissioners, and he trusted that the noble Earl's remarks would not tend to impress them with the idea that they were now so perfect that they needed no improvement. What was wanted in all these schools was that they should have the best possible master. They should do away with the restriction, where it existed, as to selecting the master from the teaching staff. It was often better to introduce fresh blood and a little free trade in these as in most other matters. Then, if the best head master possible were appointed, let him have liberty to carry out suggested improvements. Public opinion would be brought to bear upon him, and they would then get the best possible system of instruction. He would have liked to see in the Report some recommendation for making it more easy for classes not in opulent circumstances to avail themselves of the public schools. All the recommendations he had seen rather went the other way. The present practice of receiving a number of boys from the town or neighbourhood in which the school was situated was disparaged, and an examination at which a few clever boys should obtain scholarships was rather suggested as a substitute. Now, at Rugby, a number of widows of naval officers, clergymen, and others of that class, availed themselves of the opportunity of living there to send their sons to school. He did not say that that might not be altered with some advantage, but he did not think it would be well to rely entirely on competitive examinations for introducing the sons of persons in narrow circumstances. There was a tendency to think that it was their duty to educate clever boys only, whereas the object of these schools was to educate stupid boys as well. He was not clear that Sir Walter Scott or the late Duke of Wellington would have succeeded in such an examination. He was anxious to see these schools made available to the largest possible portion of the upper classes of this country.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he was anxious to take that opportunity of declaring his views were in accordance with those of the right rev. Prelate. He was quite sure that whatever advantage might be derived from the education of a particular number of clever boys in foundation schools, which were more or less of an eleemosynary character—and he did not deny that some benefit might be obtained from open scholarships even in those schools—anything like the rejection of boys who might not be thought clever would defeat the intention of the original founders, and would be contrary to the duty of the trustees. It would be a great misfortune if, for the purpose of encouraging a few clever boys to obtain advantages which probably they might not require, the managers of grammar schools should pay no attention to the benevolent intention of founders to provide a good education for boys whose parents were in moderate circumstances, and who otherwise might be unable to acquire the advantages of a good education—at all events to the same extent. He wished to make one or two observations on another point adverted to in the Report of the Commissioners, to which the attention of Parliament had not been directed in the course of the recent discussions. He mentioned it because he was afraid that some of the recommendations of the Commissioners tended to aggravate that which he could not help thinking was a prevailing and increasing evil. Although he believed it was necessary to add to the present course of study at public schools a greater attention to mathematics, history, and some of the modern languages, yet he was afraid that the recommendations of the Commissioners, if carried out to their full extent, would introduce such an amount of variety that they would rather tend to foster a superficial education in a great number of subjects without a well-grounded knowledge of any one of them. He hoped the country would understand that whatever alterations might be made in the public school system, the real evil could not be removed by the public schools themselves—that was to say, boys were now sent to a public school at a comparatively advanced age, with very little groundwork of education, but with a considerable amount of superficial knowledge of a great number of things, which was not only not a good groundwork of education, but was actually worse than no foundation at all. The other day a head master told him that he had in his school boys of the age of fourteen, three of fifteen years, and one of sixteen, who were just beginning, after two years spent in the school, to work their way through the easiest Latin books, such as were the usual studies of boys of ten. He went on to say—and to this he (the Earl of Derby) requested particular attention, that certain private schools, piqued themselves upon the great progress their boys made; whereas they made no progress whatever in anything which deserved the name of education. He mentioned one boy who came to him with a great reputation for lyrics, but who knew little or nothing of the Latin grammar, and another who had gone through the greater part of Newton, but who in reality could not do the simplest problems in Euclid. Such boys were afterwards sent to college, and their parents were frequently dissatisfied with the progress they made there, but the truth was they had to begin everything over again; it was impossible to ground a boy in Latin grammar, which was the basis of all grammar, twice over, and if he had not had the groundwork laid early he had no foundation upon which the superstructure could be raised. A public school was not a place for teaching the elements of grammar, for it was not possible there to give the requisite attention to each particular boy, to find out what his difficulties were, to assist him in getting over them, and to make him sag at the hard work which must be encountered at the beginning of all grammar, and which ought to be done either at home or in a private school. Whatever, then, might be the defects of the public school teaching, he believed a large proportion arose, not from the public school system, but from the fact that boys were sent to Eton or Harrow partially instructed up to a certain point in a great number of things, but really ignorant of the first elements of education. It was impossible, in teaching the Latin grammar, to follow the plan suggested by the Irish gentleman who, on being told that the first two lessons were the hardest, proposed to begin with the third. Where the first and second lessons were not thoroughly mastered there could be no foundation to build upon, and he hoped parents and the teachers of private schools would be impressed with the conviction that it was their business to lay the groundwork, thus giving the public schools and the Universities a fair chance of being able to rear the superstructure. If, on the other hand, they persisted in contenting themselves with imparting a superficial knowledge of a great number of things, which was not education at all, or even the foundation of it, their work would be thrown away, and all the labour of public schools would be incapable of producing fruit.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON said, the noble Earl could be scarcely aware how the Commissioners were at one with him in this point. He hoped that the noble Earl's remarks would go forth to the country, and that the attention of parents and persons interested in education would be drawn to that portion of the Report in which the Commissioners commented at some length and with some spirit on the state of ignorance in which boys were sent to the public schools. It was exactly because they thought, as his noble Friend thought, that boys should be grounded at school, that they had recommended that there should be an examination for entrance to the public schools, that examination to be proportionate and adapted to the age of the boys.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, that as an old head master, he desired to tender his cordial thanks to the Commissioners for the patient industry and indefatigable zeal with which they had prosecuted their inquiries, and for the most valuable Report which they had presented to Her Majesty; so valuable that it had been read everywhere with avidity. It was agreed on all sides that classical literature should be the staple of public school education, the object of which was, not to communicate a vast amount of information, but to cultivate the moral and intellectual faculties—and (if he might venture to speak of the intellect as an instrument)—to strengthen, sharpen, and polish the intellect to the highest degree, so that it might be made as efficient as possible for any purpose to which it might be applied in after life. The danger of introducing too many subjects was, that they might distract the attention of a boy and prevent him from exercising his mind as he ought to do; and hence he was rather inclined to think that the Commissioners had recommended too great a variety of subjects. At the same time he thought that French or German ought to be made an integral part of public school education. The reason, as he believed, why so much attention had not been paid to these matters was, that the French or German master was not placed in a position of sufficient respect. Hitherto boys had been obliged to attend the French or German master out of school hours, and therefore he was naturally unpopular with them; and, besides, discipline had not been so rigidly enforced in his case as in that of the other masters. If, however, French or German were made an integral part of the school work, and the head master were to attend to the representations of the French or German master as much as to those of the master of any other department, he had no doubt that the languages might be cultivated with great advantage to the boys. He spoke from experience when he said that a very early acquaintance with French, followed in after life by a little intercourse with foreign countries, enabled one to speak the language with comparative ease. As the subject of Greek composition had been spoken of, he would say that while he thought it would be undesirable to make Greek composition a necessary qualification of every boy, he was persuaded that as long as there were prizes in the Universities for Greek prose, or verse, it would be impossible to view the accomplishment in any other light than as one suited for boys who had a turn for it. Allusion had been made to the governing bodies of public schools. In some instances there was a very limited area from which the governors were chosen. It would not always be expedient to extend the area from which the governors were chosen, but he had in view cases in which schools had suffered from a too limited area. The great thing, after all, was that trustees and governors should choose the best master they could, and, having chosen him, that they should leave him to his own discretion and judgment in the management of the school. If they did otherwise they would never have first rate men. As to the council which had been proposed, it would not be desirable to have one the decisions of which should be binding; but he thought there might be advantage in having a council to give advice. Reference had been made by his noble Friend (Lord de Ros) to the high opinion of Eton entertained by general officers. He had himself heard an anecdote of the Duke of Wellington, when about to despatch a young officer on some duty of importance, asking at what school he had been educated, and on being told, "Westminster," replying, "That will do— all right." The public schools were undoubtedly very valuable institutions, but still they were susceptible of improvement, and he thought that the Report of the Commissioners contained some important recommendations which it would be well to follow.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON explained that it was not his intention to make any charge against Rugby. He found, however, on referring to some memoranda which he had by him, that in quoting from memory he had attributed to the head master of Rugby a statement made by the head master of St. Paul's; but the general burden of the evidence bore out his view—that where French was obligatory as a study the pupils might be taught to read, but not to speak the language conversationally.

EARL STANHOPE said, that if even he had not intended to take part in the debate, he must, after the numerous references which had been made to him, have felt it necessary to say a few words. In the first place, he would briefly recapitulate his former argument. The Commissioners had recommended the introduction of five or six new branches of study in the public schools, and, as he stated the other evening, it seemed impossible to accomplish that object without either undue pressure on the time and health of the boys, or without withdrawing some of the existing tasks. He admitted the value and necessity of these new studies, and the main object of his remarks on the former occasion was to show how other studies of less practical utility might be curtailed or relinquished. Above all, he had pointed out the disproportion between the value of a knowledge of Greek versification and the time and trouble that were requisite for its attainment. In support of that view he cited the opinion of a high authority—Dr. Whewell. In reply to that statement, it had been stated in the present evening that Dr. Whewell was eminent only as a mathematician; but those who spoke thus must surely be unacquainted with the extent of Dr. Whewell's labours in classic literature—in Plato for example. In point of fact, he was distinguished as a great scholar as well as a great mathematician. But if Dr. Whewell's testimony was not sufficient, perhaps Lord Macaulay's might be accepted; and it was to the same effect. In his short but excellent Life of Pitt Lord Macaulay said—

quired that knack of versification which is sometimes possessed by clever boys whose knowledge of the language and literature of Greece and Rome is very superficial."

It seemed then, that in Lord Macaulay's view, exactly as in Dr. Whewell's, boys might have a knack of Greek and Latin versification and yet possess only a superficial knowledge of the Greek and Latin languages. The rising intelligence of the age was beginning more and more to declare against the enormous consumption of mental labour, for an accomplishment learnt only to be again immediately forgotten, or which, if retained, could only rank at best as a graceful pastime. It seemed impossible that such an object could much longer "stop the way," or be taken as a substitute for other and far preferable branches of knowledge. Looking more especially to Eton, it was significant and unfortunate that in exact proportion as Greek versification had increased the study of French had declined. The late Prince Consort in a generous spirit founded prizes at Eton for French and German; and from conversations he had had the honour of holding with His Royal Highness he knew that this was an object he had much at heart. But this liberality on the part of the Prince had not been met by any corresponding energy on the part of the school. Indeed, so far from it—the study of French at Eton appeared of late to have gone backwards, instead of forwards. There was the testimony on that point of Mr. William Johnson, one of the ablest of the assistant-masters. He was questioned by Sir Stafford Northcote to the following effect:—

"French counts in the examination on trials, does it not?"—"It was dropped in the last examination for the middle division." "What was the cause of that?"—"I do not know." "Does it not seem rather hard that it should have been dropped?"—"Yes."

He rejoiced to find that his noble Friend on his left (the Earl of Derby) and the right rev. Prelate opposite concurred in the view that French and, to some extent, German, ought to form part of the course of the study in the public schools. Indeed, that seemed to be the general opinion of their Lordships, as indicated by the debate. The only opinion to the contrary had been stated by his noble Friend near him (the Earl of Carnarvon), from whose views, as expressed that evening, he (Earl Stanhope) must say that he entirely dissented. His noble Friend seemed to stand forward as the champion of all those errors of system at Eton, which the highest authorities at Eton had themselves condemned. As to the employment of a French gentleman as teacher, he saw no reason why he should not be respected as much as any other master.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON explained that all he said was that a French gentleman would probably fail to exercise that influence over the boys which he ought to possess.

EARL STANHOPE saw no reason why, if he were a gentleman of education and intelligence, that should be the case. Foreign gentlemen were engaged in education at Oxford, Cambridge, and elsewhere without any such result, and why should it be otherwise at Eton? He hoped that, after the weighty and authoritative expression of opinion which had been elicited on this question, the governing body of Eton would be induced to reconsider this question, and to remedy the deficiency in their course of education. Reforms of this kind are far better made from within than from without. It is most desirable to carry along the existing powers towards the measures of improvement that have become necessary, instead of overruling and compelling those powers by the force of extrinsic legislation. He therefore earnestly desired to see the necessary reforms carried out by the governing bodies; but, in order that they might be, it behoved those bodies to weigh well the very judicious statements in the Report of the Commissioners, and also the comments which those statements had elicited in that and the other House of Parliament.

NEW ZEALAND LOAN.—QUESTION.

MR. AYTOUN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to ask Parliament for its sanction of a guarantee of interest for a Loan for New Zealand; and, if so, what is the amount of the Loan for which a guarantee is to be asked, and whether the guarantee will be applied for during the present Session; and, if so, at what period of the Session?

MR. CARDWELL: It appears, Sir, from the papers which have already been laid upon the table with reference to New Zealand, that the Imperial Government is engaged to the Colonial Government to submit to Parliament a proposal for a Loan for the various expenses connected with the war in New Zealand; and it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to make a proposal on the subject during the present Session. The papers are now being printed, and will, I believe, be in the hands of Members in a few days. I shall then take the earliest opportunity of making a statement on the subject.

MILITARY EXPENDITURE OF CEYLON. QUESTION.

MR. LYALL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, What arrangement has been made between the Ceylon and the English Government for reducing the charge on the Imperial Exchequer for the Military Expenditure in that Colony; and whether, in consequence of the great prosperity of the Island, there is an early prospect of releasing this Country altogether from that charge, and placing Ceylon, in that respect, on the same footing as India?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, the military expenditure of Ceylon is £200,000. It is paid in equal proportions by the Imperial and the Colonial Governments. In the present year, 1864, an additional sum of £30,000 has been set apart out of the colonial resources to be applied to this purpose. An inquiry is about to take place in the Island with a view to reduce the amount of expenditure, and I hope and believe that in a short time the hon. Gentleman will be gratified by the whole expenditure being defrayed out of the resources of the colony in the way he wishes.

GERMANY AND DENMARK—THE CONFERENCE.—QUESTION.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Conference has arrived at any decision respecting the maintenance of the Treaty of London, and whether the noble Lord is in a situation to communicate it to the House; and whether the suspension of arms between Denmark and the conflicting Powers has been prolonged?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: With regard, Sir, to the first part of the Question, I trust that neither the hon. Member nor the House will think that I am wanting in respect if I am unable, with propriety, to state what have been the proceedings of the Conference with regard to the general matters which they have in hand. In the first place, an agreement was come to by the Plenipotentiaries, that the proceedings should be known only to themselves until some final arrangement was arrived at, and I am sure that the House will see that communications from time to time of what may have passed at particular meetings of the Conference, so far from rendering more easy a satisfactory arrangement, would probably interpose difficulties which it would not be easy to overcome. With respect to the latter part of the Question, I am at liberty to say that no arrangement has yet been made for the continuation of the suspension of arms, which will last till the 12th of this month, but there is good reason to hope that at the next meeting of the Conference some arrangement for that purpose may be made.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished to know whether the armistice would not expire on Sunday next?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: As Sunday is the day fixed, the armistice will, if it is not renewed, expire on that day.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord whether he can state on what day the next sitting of the Conference will be held?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: No day has yet been fixed, for this reason; that the Plenipotentiaries are waiting for answers to Despatches which have been sent to their respective Courts. Some few days must elapse before those replies are received, and then the members of the Conference will be summoned to re-assemble.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he wished to know whether any arrangement has been made to prevent the war being renewed between the expiration of the armistice and the next meeting of the Conference, if that meeting should not take place until the existing suspension of hostilities is at an end.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: No such arrangement could be made. There is no reason to doubt that the Conference will meet again before the expiration of the armistice.

THE WAR IN NEW ZEALAND.

QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any official confirmation of the recent news from New Zealand has been received by the Government?

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, we have not received so much news as has appeared in the newspapers. Through our Consul at Alexandria we received the earlier information contained in the newspapers, which was favourable to the success of our arms. The second part, which is of a mixed character, and apparently involving the discomfiture of our arms more or less, has not been received through any official source.

SIR ROWLAND HILL.

VICTORIA R.

Her Majesty, taking into consideration the eminent Services of Sir Rowland Hill, K.C.B., late Secretary to the General Post Office, in devising and carrying out important improvements in postal administration, and being desirous, in recognition of such services, to confer some signal mark of Her favour upon him, recommends to Her faithful Commons that She should be enabled to grant Sir Rowland Hill the sum of Twenty Thousand Pounds.

Referred to the Committee of Supply.

COUNTESS OF ELGIN AND KINCARDINE.

VICTORIA R.

Her Majesty, taking into consideration the distinguished Services performed throughout a long series of years by the late James, Earl of Elgin and Kincardine, Her Majesty's Viceroy and Governor General of India, and being desirous, in recognition of such Services, to confer some signal mark of Her favour upon his widow, Mary Louisa, Countess of Elgin and Kincardine, recommends to Her faithful Commons that She should be enabled to make provision for securing to the Countess of Elgin a pension of One Thousand Pounds per annum for the term of her natural life.

Committee thereupon on Thursday.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

OFFICERS OF THE INDIAN ARMIES.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES rose to call attention to the grievances of the Officers of the local Armies of India. Since the Royal Commission reported upon this subject six grievances had been added to those of which the Officers previously had to complain, and the dissatisfaction was now extending to the Native portion of what was formerly the Regular Native Army of India. According to the accounts which he received, what was called "the re-organization" of the Native Army of India had occasioned very considerable disquiet, mistrust, and suspicion. Some explanation of this phrase "re-organization of the Army of India" was necessary to a right understanding of his Question. In early days—about 1757—the East India Company raised men to defend their factories, and these gradually increased in number till companies grew into battalions, battalions into brigades, and brigades into armies; but during the whole of that time the officering of those regiments by European gentlemen or adventurers was dependent upon accident, and in the history of the Bengal army they rarely heard of more than ten or twelve officers to each. The experience of fifty years showed that such a proportion was inadequate to give full efficiency to Native troops, and in 1796 a re-organization took place, by order of the home authorities, under which twenty-four officers were assigned to each regiment. From 1796 to 1856, however, our dominions in India extended so rapidly that officers were withdrawn from the regiments in large numbers to perform what were called staff duties, political, civil, army, staff, &c., and it constantly happened that not more than from ten to fifteen remained to do duty with their regiments. Such a state of things did not escape the attention of the Indian Government, and a letter from the Governor General to the Court of Directors, dated the 5th April, 1856, stated that urgent representations had been made to him of the paucity of European officers, and he recommended the appointment of supernumerary cadets to the Indian Service. That letter was answered by the Court of Directors on the 10th of September, 1856. In their reply they said they need hardly state that the mere appointment of one or more officers to the rank of ensign in addition to those on the establishment of the Native infantry, was not the proper remedy required to meet effectually the exigencies of the Indian Army. From their youth and inexperience, and want of rank, such additional officers would form no adequate substitute for the older and experienced officers withdrawn from regimental duty, and they distinctly stated that the withdrawal of officers to the extent that reduced the numbers to ten or twelve could not be done except with great risk to the discipline of the regiments. They admitted that the want was pressing, and they went on to say that they took that opportunity of expressing their opinion that Native regiments should always have present with them for regimental duty in time of peace thirteen officers—one for command, ten eligible for the command of companies, two eligible for the regimental staff, besides a few young men. The mutiny of the Bengal Army broke out; and then a feeling unhappily sprang up—chiefly amongst those who were ignorant of the character of the Native troops and did not look to their past devotion—for it was by their aid our Indian Empire was chiefly obtained—that the army should be immediately reduced and ultimately put down. That had been done. The reason for that proceeding was stated to be economy; 230,000 Native troops being considered an overwhelming number. The Bengal army, with the exception of fourteen Regiments, which had remained faithful, disappeared; the Bombay and Madras armies remained faithful with the exception of two regiments, and there was a reduction of between 110,000 and 115,000 men out of the 230,000, at a saving of a million of money. But what had been the result? Why, that the European troops had been doubled. From 40,000 men when the mutiny broke out in Bengal, they increased at one time to 112,000, and there were now seventy-two thousand European troops in India with a reserve force of 9,000 in England, at a cost of £2,000,000 to India. And the practical result of the saving of £1,000,000 by the reduction of the native troops was to increase the cost of the Indian Army £2,000,000 by the additional 40,000 European troops. The Staff Corps also was established, which had ever since been a source of the greatest difficulty and injustice. It was stated that the selection for the Staff took away the élite of regiments. But it did nothing of the kind; it took away all the officers who had interest, and in nine cases out of ten the élite remained behind because they had no interest. Personal illustrations were always unsatisfactory; but he knew in his own case that he passed as interpreter in two languages before he was twenty, and yet might have remained all his life with his regiment, but that he was fortunate enough twelve years after he had passed as interpreter in two native languages to obtain private interest that withdrew him from it. Nothing was more deceptive than this phrase “re-organization;” but which the armies at large called “annihilation.” At one stroke of the pen Native soldiers who had become veterans in the British service, and whose ancestors had fought gallantly for the Crown, were without reference to their self-respect and soldierly pride converted into Irregulars by an Order dated December 28, 1863, and the number of officers doing duty with those regiments was reduced at one blow from twenty-four to six. The Act of Parliament guaranteed to all officers that their usages and privileges should be maintained, and one of those privileges was that no officer belonging to another regiment should come into their ranks and supersede their regimental rights; but the Act of Parliament had been violated. The General Order of December which recognized the Indian army, affected the position of every officer of every regiment in the local armies.

Three regiments of cavalry in the Bombay army, which carried on their standards the names of the battles in which they had been engaged in Afghanistan, Persia, and elsewhere, were converted into Irregulars; and they now found among them officers who had never before belonged to them, nor had ever served with them. It rested with the Commander-in-Chief to take away the old officers of the regiments, and put them aside entirely in favour of perfect strangers. In the Bombay army there was only one regiment out of three regiments of cavalry and thirty of infantry, in which there had not been an intrusion of that kind into the regiment. There were fifty-six cases of officers posted to regiments who had never served in those regiments before. This was contrary to the usages of the service, contrary to policy, prejudicial to discipline, and how such a course could have been pursued was to him, an officer of half a century's standing, perfectly unintelligible. All these fifty-six officers were occupying the places of the old regimental officers, who had been divorced from their regiments, and who existed only upon paper in what was called the cadre of the regiment, and were strangers to the old Native officers and men. The effect of the working of the Staff Corps had been that the officers, by their promotion in that corps, after fixed periods of service without reference to their regimental standing, when they returned to their regiments superseded officers of older standing in the regiment, and who had been longer in the army. The House would understand the feeling created by these measures among the old Native officers, some of whom had served for fifty years uninterruptedly in their regiments, and also among the Sepoys, many of whom had served for twenty years, and who looked upon their regiments as their homes, and the officers of their regiments as their friends and fathers. The course pursued was undoubtedly dangerous, because it was exciting a feeling of dissatisfaction, distrust, and suspicion that might inflict upon this country injury of a very serious character by loosening the loyal ties, which had formerly existed between the Sepoys and the Government. He would give the House two or three illustrations of the effect of the posting of officers to regiments to which they did not belong. A communication dated January 24, and which he supposed was addressed to the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Wood), complained of a measure which deprived half-a-dozen officers of their rank in their regiments, hindered their prospective advancement, and cancelled or annulled the agreement made by the East India Company, and which had been transferred to and undertaken by the Crown; and the right hon. Baronet was asked whether he would persist in approving a measure which, by sending strangers to regiments to fill the places of old regimental officers, injuriously affected the efficiency of the army. Another communication from India of the same date spoke of a General Order as a most shameful piece of jobbery, and gave an instance of a lieutenant on the General List who had never been posted to a regiment, being made adjutant of a Native regiment, and responsible for the discipline of 800 men, after a residence in India of only three years. The writer stated that Sir Hugh Rose had been warned of the danger of placing boys in command of the Natives, and in posts which men of ten years' standing before the mutiny could hardly hope to attain. The case of Captain Richardson, of the Bombay army, eighteen years in India with his regiment, but now only attached to his own regiment, was another instance in point. It was very hard for such an officer to find an officer of the Staff placed over him. Only on Saturday last he had received by the mail a letter, dated May 11, 1864, reciting the case of Captain Farquharson, of the 2nd Light Cavalry, who was senior squadron officer of the 3rd Cavalry, although he belonged to the 2nd Light Cavalry, and who had been recently appointed to an acting paymastership, which would take him from the 33rd regiment for eighteen months. Captain and Brevet-Major W. A. Dick, who belonged to the 3rd Cavalry, but now second in command of the Scinde Horse, who had been twenty-one years in the service, and who had been with the regiment in Afghanistan, where it had gained so many laurels, applied for permission to rejoin his old regiment. He was refused, and, to everybody's astonishment, an infantry officer and a captain of eight months' standing only, who had never served in the cavalry, was appointed by Sir William Mansfield to fill the vacancy. And another officer of the 3rd Bombay Light Cavalry was equally refused permission to rejoin his regiment, that the stranger infantry officer might be provided for. All the cavalry officers were calling out, and many of them were furious; and well they might be. He had been in the service half a century, and never in all his experience did he know of an instance such as that. There might be reasons of urgency or expediency of which the public was not aware to justify that extraordinary departure from usage, and that outrage upon the feelings of the officers. He hoped and trusted there were, for Sir William Mansfield's sake; but, in the absence of such reasons, he had no hesitation in saying that that appointment was a scandalous abuse of power, and as such he would leave Sir William Mansfield to justify it. But there was another power given to the Commander-in-Chief with regard to the re-organization of those regiments. They were considered Irregulars, and as not having the rights of regulars at all which involved regimental seniority. The Commander-in-Chief had a right to appoint any one at his pleasure or caprice. In the case of the former Irregular regiments, few in number, it was an act of prudence and policy to select the most active officers and put them into those regiments. But here were the old regular veteran regiments, of the armies of Madras and Bombay, and with regard to them it was a different thing. There was an Order by Sir William Mansfield, contained in the Overland Times, dated from the 28th of February to the 14th of March last, in which the Commander-in-Chief was pleased to intimate that it had been ruled by the Government of India that in all cases the officers appointed to command a regiment under the new system in virtue of his appointment should command a regiment, the second in command should rank next in the corps, and the other officers according to army standing. Well, suppose Sir William Mansfield selected a junior officer and made him commandant, and another second in command, all the senior officers would be compelled to obey their juniors. Was there ever such a subversion of discipline, or of the ordinary rules and usages of an army? He knew his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Wood) was anxious to promote the welfare of the army, but most unhappily he had been subjected to influences which had subverted his judgment and warped his better feelings, and he had done that which most probably would result in disaster. He had no hesitation in saying that such things never would have taken place under the East India Company, who would not have disgraced themselves by such injustice. He begged to ask, Whether the recent appointment or employment (except in emergent cases) of Officers of the Indian Armies with regiments to which they do not belong, in supersession of the regimental rights of the officers or usages of those regiments, is not contrary to the spirit of the Act 21 & 22 Vict. c. 106, which guaranteed

"That the Military and Naval Forces of the East India Company should be deemed to be the Military and Naval Forces of Her Majesty, and should be under the same obligations to serve Her Majesty as they would have been under to serve the said Company, and should be liable to serve under the same territorial limits only, for the same terms only, and be entitled to the like pay, pensions, allowances, and privileges, and the like advantages as regards promotion and otherwise, as if they had continued in the service of the said Company."

And whether such appointments have been approved by the Secretary of State?

MR. VANSITTART said, that there was no doubt, as mentioned by his hon. and gallant Friend, that the Officers of the Indian Army generally had great grounds for complaint. In referring to the Report of the Commissioners and the appendix which had been placed upon the table a few days ago, it could not fail to strike any candid mind that those officers had been superseded in the most grievous manner. The Commissioners in the 42nd paragraph of their Report were constrained to acknowledge it, inasmuch as they said that the Parliamentary assurances had not been adhered to. The injustice complained of might be ascribed entirely to the creation of that new-fangled corps, called the Staff Corps; for by the rules of that body all promotion went to advance officers who had been so fortunate as to be attached to it, to the prejudice of officers who were serving in their own regiments. In fact, persons had been appointed to the command of regiments they had never heard of. Instances had been brought to his notice of officers belonging to the Madras Presidency having been sent over to the Bengal Presidency to supersede officers who had never left their regiments. But this injustice was not entirely confined to the Military Service—it extended even to the Civil Service of India, because civilians serving in the Punjab and out-provinces having obtained furloughs to return to Europe in order to recruit their shattered health found upon coming back that their appointments had been conferred upon striplings who commanded sufficient interest, and had been fortunate enough to be attached to the Staff. They were thus thrown for promotion upon the North West Provinces. He had received a letter from an eminent authority, who was thoroughly conversant with all the circumstances of the case, who stated that promotion in the North West Provinces had been most materially retarded by all the civilians who had taken furloughs in the Punjab and North West Provinces having been superseded by military men. Under these circumstances it appeared to him a matter of no surprise that a feeling of great dissatisfaction and indignation prevailed in India, and it was high time that it should be remedied. The remedy was a simple one; he would at once abolish this highly favoured Staff Corps, which had been so hastily established by the Secretary of State for India, and which had been the means of crushing many a noble spirit, and creating such unspeakable woe and misery.

MR. TORRENS said, that when the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India introduced his Bill for the amalgamation of the Royal and Indian armies, he did not seem to have sufficiently considered the difficulties attending that step, and the detailed provisions which were required, and that circumstance was a sufficient justification for the opposition offered by some hon. Members. The right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) in consequence took steps to secure for the Indian army all the privileges which they had previously enjoyed; and those who opposed the Bill were only induced to withdraw their opposition on the distinct pledge of that House and the Government, that the rights and privileges of the officers of the Indian army should be respected. It is now three years since that pledge was given, and how had that pledge been kept? He was sorry to say for the sake of the honour of the House that it had been broken; and he entreated the right hon. Gentleman, for the sake of the honour of the House and for his own, to redeem the pledge that was given, and in reliance on which opposition to the Bill was withdrawn.

CAPTAIN JERVIS trusted that there would be no delay in placing before Parliament the warrant on which Sir William Mansfield had acted; but before that warrant was before the House, he would carefully avoid any allusion to cases to which the hon. Gentleman who introduced the subject had alluded. He would wish to point out, however, that it was four, not three, years since the pledge referred to was given. It was given on the 3rd of

July, 1860; and although he had consented to postpone his Motion for a Committee pending the Report of the Commission—and it reported in October last—yet nothing had since been done in the matter, except the issue of an Order in the Bengal Presidency, which had made matters ten times worse.

SIR CHARLES WOOD was understood to say that he did not think it desirable at present to go into all the questions referred to by the hon. and gallant Member behind him (Colonel Sykes). He regretted much that the warrant to which allusion had just been made was not on the table of the House; but it was not his fault—he had done his best to get it completed. The preparation of it had received from the noble Lord the Secretary for War, and from the Commander-in-Chief, as well as from himself, considerable attention and pains, and they had endeavoured by every means to reconcile the claims and wishes of both classes of officers, and he hoped the result would be satisfactory to the House. The principle had been agreed upon some time ago, but a variety of modifications had been proposed; but it took more trouble and pains to come to a fair conclusion than could be supposed. The warrant had now been completed, and he hoped that in two or three days it would have received the sign manual. Before it was signed he could not, of course, in accordance with the ordinary practice, lay it upon the table. He did not quite understand what had fallen from the hon. Member for Windsor (Mr. Vansittart) relative to the Civil Service. Of course, when an officer came home on leave he ipso facto vacated his office, and it became necessary to appoint another to the vacancy; and when the former returned to India he must wait till some other appointment was open to him.

MR. VANSITTART said, what he wanted to convey, and what he believed he did convey, was, that all the civil appointments in Oude and the Punjab, when a civil officer returned to England to recruit his shattered health, were filched away from them and given to the officers of the Staff Corps.

SIR CHARLES WOOD would say to the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, as he would to the hon. and gallant Member who had introduced this subject, that it was exceedingly inconvenient that, on a question of this general kind, particular cases like those which had been referred to should be cited without notice. Had the

hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) previously furnished him with names of the officers whose cases he intended to refer to, he might have been able to inquire into them, and offer some explanation to the House. From what he had seen of Indian affairs, he believed that the appointments were given, not by favour or interest, but to the best men; and seeing the way the service had been performed at all times in India, the hon. and gallant Member was not justified in saying that unfit men had been appointed to the different posts. He deprecated the sweeping assertion that Sir William Mansfield had been guilty of a scandalous perversion of authority, for had unfit persons been appointed, the duties of the offices could not have been performed in the satisfactory manner in which they had been. All that he could do on the present occasion was, to deal with the general question. The hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Sykes) said that it was not true that the best men were taken for Staff employments; that the best men were kept with the regiments, and that those taken for Staff employments were chosen by favour. But when complaints were formerly made of the want of discipline in the regiments, many persons attributed it to the practice of taking the best men from the regiments for the Staff employments, and stated that the practice was so dangerous that it was a wonder there was any discipline left at all. The universal testimony given of the inconveniences of that practice was one of the strongest motives why he (Sir Charles Wood) had taken part in the institution of a Staff Corps in order to provide a body of officers for the regiments organized on what was called the Irregular system, and for Staff employments of different kinds without having recourse to a practice, so universally condemned, of taking officers from their regiments. The hon. and gallant Member complained that the Native army was being considerably reduced; but if there was one point on which no difference of opinion, he thought, was entertained, it was this—namely, that to provide for the safety of the English rule and of English subjects in India, it was advisable to increase the English garrison there, and to reduce the Native army.

COLONEL SYKES said, his argument was based on the question of finance.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, no doubt the English troops were more expensive than the Native ones, but the difference of expense was by no means one that could be set against the safety of our Indian possessions. There had been a great reduction in the number of officers in the different regiments. There was not that feeling of confidence and attachment to their officers in these regiments which the hon. and gallant Officer said would be destroyed by the new system, for the mutiny had proved that in the old regiments the officers were not, as was supposed, acquainted with the feelings of their men. All the regiments which were raised during the mutiny were framed on the Irregular system, which not only required fewer officers, but gave opportunity of employing Native officers in higher grades. It secured an efficient body of troops, at a much less expense. The House should bear in mind that India was mainly saved to England by these Irregular Native troops, who formed a great part of the force which took Delhi; and therefore efficiency as well as economy had been furthered. What had been done had not been done on English or Imperial grounds, but on Indian grounds, and with the sanction and advice of the present Viceroy of India, Sir John Lawrence (the highest authority we could have on Indian matters), and of a majority of the Council of India. Then came the question, how were those Irregular regiments to be officered. That could only be done by the creation of a Staff Corps. That was the best, if not the only mode of providing the requisite number of officers. The hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen had stated that officers had been superseded in their own regiments by officers of the Staff Corps; but he (Sir Charles Wood) was not aware of the existence of a single case of the kind. [Colonel Sykes: There are many cases.] If there were, they had occurred in direct opposition to the positive orders which had been issued by the Government. The hon. and gallant Member complained of officers being sent to command regiments in supersession of what he seemed to think were the regimental rights of the officers of that regiment. But suppose that in one regiment all the officers had elected to join the Staff Corps except the six senior captains, and in another all had gone except the six junior subalterns, would the hon. and gallant Member say that the six captains ought to be left to do all the subaltern duties in one regiment, and the six subalterns to do all the captains' duties in the other; or would he not rather leave three captains and three subalterns in each regiment. Certainly he did not admit that such an arrangement would be at all derogatory to any regimental rights. In making these arrangements the Government had had no object in view but the good of the service generally, and he was sure that the Commander-in-Chief, in all he had done, had endeavoured to do that which was for the benefit of the general body of officers.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, that when the subjects of the transfer to the Crown and the re-organization of the Indian army were before the House he was present and took a humble part in the debates. Throughout the speeches that were made on these occasions, those holding high positions in the Government said that it was but fair and right that full consideration should be given to the claims of the Indian army. The right hon. Baronet was then warned of the difficulties which must attend the amalgamation of the Indian with the Royal Army. Those difficulties had arisen; and the right hon. Gentleman, notwithstanding his cleverness and his desire to do justice, had been unable to contend with them. Upon that occasion a full pledge was given to the officers of the Indian army, that all their rights and privileges should be faithfully preserved to them. The right hon. Gentleman had been saying that he had to take care that no injustice was done to the officers of the Royal army. Now he (Sir Minto Farquhar) would be the last person to sanction the slightest injustice to the Royal army—indeed he had a son in that army—but why did the right hon. Gentleman mix up the two armies? He ought to have known that if no injustice was to be done to the Royal army, how difficult it would be to carry out his promises to the Indian army. The petitions sent to this country from officers in the Indian army were not a single petition, or half-a-dozen, or twenty, but absolutely hundreds—officers who felt that the pledge made to them had not been carried out. The hon. and gallant Member for Harwich (Captain Jervis) and himself in 1862 asked for a Committee to investigate the subject-matter of these petitions. The right hon. Gentleman, after taking a month to consider the subject, said he did not think it would be advantageous to the service to have such a Committee. Thereupon his gallant Friend immediately placed a notice on the paper, that he would move the appointment of a Committee himself; and when, after having the circumstances put before them, the pressure of the House was about to be put on the right hon. Gentleman, he came forward and proposed to meet the case by a Royal Commission. He thanked the right hon. Baronet for that Commission—but what did that Commission prove? Why, that in many cases the pledge of the House had not been fully and entirely carried out. When the right hon. Baronet was asked to lay the details of his amalgamation scheme, before he carried it out, on the table, his reply was, "You must leave the details to the discretion of the Executive." Again, there was the question of the warrant. That was sent out to India, and carried out without the House having any previous opportunity of expressing an opinion upon it. The Royal Commission stated cases in which the promise had not been fulfilled. Then, who established the Staff Corps? Why, the right hon. Baronet. He was frequently told that if he did establish it, as proposed by him, he would to a certainty do an injustice to other officers. He (Sir Minto Farquhar) must remind the right hon. Baronet that it had always been argued that the amalgamation of the two armies was brought forward by Government as an Imperial measure for Imperial purposes; and that, having been admitted by Parliament, Parliament was in honour bound to insist that the promises made and guaranteed to the officers of the late Indian army should be completely fulfilled.

DENMARK AND GERMANY—THE CONFERENCE.—QUESTION.

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Sir, before you leave the Chair, I am anxious to put a Question to my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Bernal Osborne) whether he is satisfied with the nature and the tenour of the reply he just now received from the noble Viscount at the head of Her Majesty's Government? for, if he is satisfied, I feel no hesitation in saying that he is the only Member in the House who is so; and when to-morrow morning the newspapers carry the intelligence over the country, I venture to say that few of their readers will sympathize with the answer of the noble Viscount. The noble Lord and the Government have all along discouraged any attempt on the part of the House to inquire what was going on in the Conference; and if complete secrecy had been observed throughout Europe with regard to what was going on in the Council Chamber in Downing Street I should be the very last to undertake the responsibility of pressing upon

Her Majesty's Government or my hon. and gallant Friend a course which would jeopardize the satisfactory issue of the deliberations which are being held there. But such is not the case. Though Her Majesty's Government maintain silence on the subject, the journals of Paris, Vienna, and Berlin teem with news of what passes, or is supposed to pass, in the Council Chamber of Downing Street. It will be recollected that when the Session began, the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, and his noble Colleague in another place, came down night after night and declared that it was the firm intention of Her Majesty's Government to abide by the Treaty of 1852. On a subsequent occasion the noble Viscount announced that the efforts of the Government had been successful in bringing about a Conference, which was immediately to meet to settle the most difficult and perplexing question to which I am now referring. The noble Lord added, amid the sympathizing cheers of his party, that the Conference was about to assemble on the basis of maintaining the integrity of the dominions of King Christian IX. The noble Viscount and his noble Colleague having over and over again declared, that the Government was pledged to that policy, is, I think, a sufficient excuse to my gallant Friend to press his Question on the Government. I wish, therefore, before you, Sir, leave the Chair, to ask my hon. and gallant Friend whether he will give to the House an assurance that he will on an early day again call the attention of the House to this subject—I am sure that if he does he will receive the sympathy of a majority of the House and of the country—and endeavour to elicit from Her Majesty's Government whether the statements which are contained in the foreign journals be or be not true; and whether it be a fact that the Government, who early in the Session declared in favour of the Treaty of 1852 and the integrity of the Danish dominions, are now, by their representatives sitting in the Conference, which would not be sitting at all except on the basis of the effectual annihilation of the Treaty of 1852, by which alone King Christian sits on the throne of Denmark; and whether that basis is conducive to the dismemberment of Denmark?

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: I do not know what assurance I can give the House on this subject. Before I give any I should wish hon. Gentlemen on the other side to give me some assurance that, in the event of my again resuscitating the discussion on the Treaty of 1852 I shall not be met by the "Previous Question." The course which I have hitherto taken in this matter has not met with very great encouragement from hon. Gentlemen opposite. My noble Friend now asks me whether I feel satisfied with the answer which I to-night received from the noble Lord at the head of the Government? Well, Sir, I may say in reply, that so far as my own private feelings are concerned—though I am thankful for the smallest favour—I do not feel exactly satisfied with that answer. I may add that it struck me from the first that this Conference was instituted rather to preserve the integrity of the Treasury Bench and to prevent the dismemberment of Her Majesty's Ministers than to maintain the integrity of Denmark. I would remind the House, too, that we have been going on in this way from day to day, and from week to week, and that we seem likely to go on in the same manner until at last the month of July will have arrived, when hon. Gentlemen on both sides will be leaving town, and this question will die a natural death. For my own part, I am surprised at the reticence which the House has observed on the matter. Up to a certain point the Government were probably right in deprecating the discussion of the subject, and I, perhaps, was wrong in bringing on my Motion when I did. Now, however, that we have arrived at the 6th of June, and we see that the Question is allowed to drag its slow length along from day to day, I think the House of Commons ought to be put in possession of some definite information with respect to it. What, I would ask, is the present position of the House and of the country generally? Why, that while the lowest inhabitant of the most petty capital on the Continent learns from his paper what is taking place at the Conference, we get "the best information" from foreign newspapers. So that it comes to this—that we, the subjects of a constitutional Sovereign, are the worst informed persons in Europe on a subject which is transacted in our own capital under our very noses. How long, I should like to know, is this to continue? If I were to use the word "farce," Sir, in connection with these proceedings I should, I believe, be called to order by you; but this I may say, that the House of Commons is placed in regard to them in a most humiliating position, and is being tricked into silence by the Members of the Government, who appear to have taken the vows usually taken by the monks of La Trappe. Whether they are digging their own graves is a different question; but of this I am certain, that if we submit to be put off day after day with evasive answers, in which the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton is so great a proficient, that he would be eminently qualified on that score alone for the degree which he took the other day at Cambridge, we shall be digging the grave, not only of the dignity of the House of Commons, but of the national honour.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I hardly know anything in our Parliamentary system which to my mind is more to be admired than the reserve which obtains in Parliament when it is known that Her Majesty's Government are engaged in important negotiations upon which the question of peace or war may turn. I think it a characteristic of our system which marks it out from all other attempts at Parliamentary government, and is one of the surest guarantees for the endurance of constitutional rule. But I must say that, after listening to the observations and accepting without annoyance the taunt of the hon. Gentleman who has just addressed us about moving the "Previous Question,"—I having moved the "Previous Question" on a former occasion, when I thought it was for the interest of the country and due to Her Majesty's Government—I must say that I was disappointed by the answer which the noble Lord gave to the Question which was put to him by the hon. Gentleman at the commencement of our proceedings this evening. Wishing for the sake of the highest considerations, for the advantage of the country, to acknowledge in the fullest spirit the sound privilege which attaches to a Government in the position of carrying on negotiations—and negotiations by a Conference—I think that, in the circumstances in which we now find ourselves, it would have been salutary, and it would have been wise and politic on the part of Her Majesty's Government, to have shown more candour and frankness than has been exhibited by the noble Lord to-night. Because you must remember that Parliamentary reserve under these circumstances depends upon one constitutional condition, and when that is observed the Parliamentary reserve is perfectly intelligible and constitutional. The condition of the reserve of Parliament when a Government is engaged in negotiations is that Parliament is acquainted with the principles upon which the negotiations are conducted, and approves the general policy of the Government. That is the condition which has always been acknowledged, and on which the salutary system of Parliamentary reserve under these circumstances is founded. But what the House of Commons is alarmed about—I am sure I do not misrepresent the general feelings of the House in this matter—what at this moment agitates the House is, that they are not convinced that the policy which was frankly announced by the Government before these communications commenced is the one which they are now pursuing; and the House and the country too are becoming anxious because they are not satisfied that the condition of Parliamentary reticence any longer exists and is observed. I do not want to penetrate the secrets of the Conference, but it has been well said by the Gentlemen who have addressed us, that there is not that reserve in other countries which is observed in England. I myself read in a German paper the other day an absolute account of what took place on a most critical day in the Conference, and that not by way of rumour or on dit, but with all the forms of diplomatic accuracy, and I have reason to believe from subsequent inquiry that it was an authentic document. Now, Sir, although the House of Commons and those who sit on this side of the House are more than desirous, when these critical and important questions arise, not to interfere with the course of Her Majesty's Government or to embarrass negotiations, it is utterly impossible, it would be most pedantic for us to pretend that we are entirely ignorant, or believe that we are entirely ignorant, of what is taking place within a few yards of the House in which we are assembled; and there are rumours—rumours which appear to us of an authentic nature—which are enough to disquiet and disturb us all. No one could expect that while conducting negotiations of this kind the noble Lord would enter into any details; we should not expect minute communications from a Government who are conducting negotiations upon matters of detail which must change almost every day or even hour; still, it would have been satisfactory to the House if we had been informed by the noble Lord, that though the negotiations are not concluded—

though the Conference was sitting and might sit for some time, still he could assure the House that the principles of policy which he had announced to the country were those upon which the Government entered into the Conference, were those which were guiding and animating their councils; that he believed that there was a fair prospect that they would succeed; and that if they did not succeed, Her Majesty's Government would have had the opportunity of vindicating, as far as their opinion was concerned, the policy which they recommended, and would appeal with confidence to the candid consideration of Parliament. But when we hear, as we do hear, that the course which the Government is pursuing is one exactly contrary to that which was announced in this House, it is impossible to expect from an assembly in which the popular element prevails to so large an extent as it does in the House of Commons, that we upon these Benches should hold ourselves in dignified reserve, and should not expect from the Ministers, whom under such circumstances we are inclined and prepared to trust, some communication to guide and enlighten public opinion. I therefore very much regret that the noble Lord has not said something which the House had a right to expect. I think that when we are informed that the question now in agitation is the continuation of the suspension of hostilities, the noble Lord ought to have given some general assurance to the House as to what had been the course of the negotiations. It would certainly have been satisfactory to the House to have heard something that would have persuaded us that what every man says in the city is not correct. I should have been glad to hear something from the noble Lord which would have assured us that Her Majesty's Ministers are not pursuing in the Conference a policy directly contrary to that which was announced in this House as the basis of their negotiations, and by the announcement of which, allow me to remind the House, they have obtained this Parliamentary reticence and reserve. It is because the noble Lord frankly declared what was the policy of the Government that he obtained that reserve. It was not because we are indifferent. It was because when such great interests were at stake the general policy of the Government was satisfactory to our convictions and to the conscience of the nation that we felt it was our duty to be silent; but I must say that the silence of the noble Lord and his answer to the Question that was asked at the commencement of the proceedings this evening fill me with great anxiety and apprehension. If the policy of the Government has been entirely changed—if at the moment when the renewal of the suspension of hostilities is in debate that policy has been entirely changed—I say that it is due to Parliament that some announcement should be made. We all know what was the general policy of Her Majesty's Government. In matters of this kind no one wishes to pin the Ministry to minute particulars. The noble Lord told us frequently, he told us continuously, that the policy of Her Majesty's Government was to maintain the Treaty of 1852—or, rather, I should say, describing as he did the scope and tendency of the policy of 1852, it was to maintain the integrity and independence of Denmark. That was what the noble Lord has constantly told us; and because he went into the Conference to maintain that policy, and to uphold the integrity and independence of Denmark, the House of Commons has been silent, and it has in my mind exercised a wise and salutary Parliamentary reticence; so that it should not be said that we interfered and threw obstacles in the way of a happy solution of these circumstances of great difficulty and peril. But if, as rumour tells us, it is now otherwise—which appears to me too incredible to accept—if it be true that the Government who but five months ago were making overtures to the Emperor of the French to stir up a European war in order to maintain the integrity of Denmark; if, incredible as the fact may be, the men who followed such a policy—I think, at that time, a most dangerous, but at least a candid policy—should be the men who, having at last succeeded in calling together a Conference, are themselves accomplishing the destruction of the integrity and independence of Denmark—then I say that some explanation is due to the House of Commons, and the noble Lord may rest assured that neither Parliament nor the country can long be silent under circumstances so extraordinary. No one wishes to interfere with the course of Her Majesty's Government, if that course is a frank one; but, I say, no Minister is entitled to ask for Parliamentary reticence and reserve during the progress of negotiations if he has not first fulfilled the great condition of such Parliamentary reserve—that his policy shall be known to the country and generally approved by Parliament. If he follows a policy totally contrary it may be right—it may be possible to justify it; but when that change takes place, especially at a moment like the present, when the continuation of an armistice is in question, he is bound to come forward and frankly tell us, "Our policy is changed. We are perfectly prepared to vindicate our course. All we ask is, that you should continue your confidence to us, or at least that you should call our conduct in question, and let it receive either the sanction or reprobation of the House of Commons." If the hypothesis—which I should call wild, were it not for the authentic rumours and, I fear, accurate information which have reached me—is correct, I must say that it is impossible that any body of men should have been more elaborately deceived and mistaken than the House of Commons has been. Is it that we have relied merely upon the assurance of the Government? Is it merely that the noble Lord has come forward and told us that the policy upon which he was conducting his negotiations—that the basis upon which subsequently he entered into the Conference—was to maintain the integrity and independence of Denmark? Is that all? If that had been all we might have said that the noble Lord might be able to allege circumstances which might explain his conduct—that we might have misconceived him—that we might have placed too favourable a construction upon the declaration of the Minister. But that is not all. The noble Lord brought, as it were, Europe into witness and testimony of his policy. When we pressed the noble Lord for information he was always ready with assurances that "It is not merely the English Government that are prepared to maintain the integrity and independence of Denmark. Austria is equally anxious; Berlin is now desirous to maintain the integrity and independence of Denmark. So futile are your fears that I myself have this moment received a despatch." He told us one night, I remember, when I asked for some information—and the House was delighted to hear it from so high an authority and from so authentic a quarter—that Prussia was as desirous to maintain the integrity of Denmark as was the noble Lord himself. I should think the House of Commons and the country generally must have been surprised at the attitude maintained towards the Government. I do not regret it, for I would rather we should err on that side—nay, I think the noble Lord, with his long experience of difficult matters, must himself have been a little startled at the temper shown by the House of Commons. When on any evening he came into the House and found it anxious and agitated in consequence of news which had reached it, the noble Lord could hardly have speculated on the felicitous conclusion of his own management. Let the House remember what has occurred, and then let them contrast with that the silence and reserve which have been observed—silence and reserve not arising from indifference, from want of sympathy with others, from any want of feeling as to the magnitude of the conjuncture, or any want of perception as to the great interests at stake, but arising from a sentiment of patriotic prudence on both sides of the House, and a determination, under the circumstances, to assist the Government. Let me remind the House of some of the great incidents which it was the duty of the noble Lord to announce, and the replies which the noble Lord gave to appeals that were addressed to him. First of all, the House will remember the anxiety originally felt when the subject was first brought under our consideration. Parliament was about to be prorogued, when we had an assurance from the noble Lord that sent us all to our constituents without a care—I am sure it must have made every heart in Copenhagen happy and serene when the House of Commons was assured by the Premier that if difficulties ever arose, Denmark would not find herself alone. There are many like myself who—I will not say trembled, but hesitated, when they heard that war might be imminent, remembering, on the one hand, that grave national interests, and, on the other, that national honour, were concerned. But we were soon informed that we need not be nervous, for the noble Lord, whose prescience as a politician is celebrated, while he informed Denmark that she would not be alone if attacked, assured England that there was not the slightest probability of any such eventuality. When we met again, the Federal Execution, which before had been ridiculed, was impending. The House was prepared if Execution were carried out on constitutional principles that it could not interfere with the action of the Diet in Holstein; and I do not believe that we should have done so. But then came the passage of the Eider. That was a great point on which the House and the country had fixed their attention, and there was a general understanding that if the Eider were passed Her Majesty's Government must take such steps as would assert the spirit of their policy. But the Eider was passed, other rivers were passed, and at last Jutland was invaded. The House cannot have forgotten the answer which the noble Lord gave to my question on that subject. He said the invasion of Jutland was an atrocity. That was the language used by the head of the Government—language which might rank with some of the great invectives that are recorded, and it shows what was the spirit of the Government at that time. After those various occurrences we found ourselves in the midst of Conferences and negotiations. And the House, notwithstanding the disappointments to which it had been exposed—notwithstanding matters affording ground for the belief that the conduct of the Government was very far from satisfactory—generously supported Her Majesty's Government the moment that a Conference was called. The House of Commons did so because the noble Lord told us frankly and candidly, and often repeated the statement, that the Government entered into that Conference for a definite object and with a definite view. We do not want to hold the noble Lord pedantically to the fulfilment of any particular detail which he may have announced at such a moment. All we want is that the spirit of his policy shall be observed and maintained. It was because we credited the noble Lord with this assurance that we were silent. A suspension of arms took place for a month; and that I held to be an incident of great importance, having ventured to remind the House that a Conference without an armistice or cessation of hostilities is generally fruitless and unsatisfactory. The month has now expired or is about to expire; and were there no rumours or suppositions, no causes to justify men in thinking that that is happening which is not for the honour or the interests of England—were there no causes existing to make the House suppose that the policy of Her Majesty's Government has in any way changed—were everything as smooth as a summer sea, and were there no grounds for anxiety and dark mistrust in the public mind—it would still, I maintain, have been the office and duty of the Minister on an occasion such as the expiration of an armistice to come forward and give some account to Parliament of the progress of these negotiations. He ought at least to have re-assured the public mind and given them some confidence in the conduct of these discussions, and have reiterated the spirit of that policy which Parliament had sanctioned, if not by a formal vote, at least by its silence. The House will see that the noble Lord ought to be called to account, even if there were no cause for anxiety. But if what I have ventured to call a wild hypothesis be true, if it be the fact that Her Majesty's Government in this interval have entirely changed their policy, if they themselves are participating in the partition of Denmark, which only five months ago they were stirring up an European war to prevent, then I say it is a mockery of the House of Commons if, under such circumstances, the noble Lord remains silent.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, We have just had a magnificent display of virtuous indignation from the right hon. Gentleman, who knows that he is attacking me in a position in which I cannot go into the defence that he challenges. He is like a man that attacks another who has his arms tied behind him. He knows that, because he has been in office. He knows that I am tongue-tied at the present moment, and that I cannot enter into an ample reply to the attacks which he has showered upon me. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman declares that he has a policy; he always moots this policy, and reproaches us, who, he thinks, have not a policy. Well, I challenge him to say what his policy is. Let him tell us fairly what he wants the Government to do; and let him ask this House to give a vote in support of Her Majesty's Government if they will adopt the policy which he thinks they ought to carry out. Let him propose that this House will support the Crown by all the means that may be necessary to give effect to the policy he contemplates. When he does that I shall say he is sincere in the course that he adopts in this House. We know what a negotiation is, especially a negotiation carried on with a great variety of Powers, having different views and different interests at stake; and the right hon. Gentleman ought to feel that to state from day to day what have been the points of difference, what have been the results of this interview or that Conference, must endanger the result which everybody who is anxious for the peace of Europe must desire to see attained. And therefore, in spite of the taunts of the right hon. Gentleman, I shall not be induced to violate what I consider my duty, and to throw impediments in the way of a successful result by telling the hon. Gentleman that which I dare say would be satisfactory to him, and which I can quite understand would be satisfactory to the House, from day to day, and from meeting to meeting, what each member of the Conference has proposed, and what each member of the Conference has objected to. ["Oh!"] Yes, that is what the right hon. Gentleman asks ["No, no!"]; that is exactly what he wants. ["No!"] The foreign papers tell him certain things, and he wants me here to go into those very details which he sees in the foreign papers. There is a great difference in statements made by a Minister of the Crown in this House and reports which are circulated through Europe and are told in the foreign newspapers. The right hon. Gentleman may take as much or as little as he pleases of those statements. But though I have the greatest desire to show every possible respect to this House, and though I am quite aware they ought to be informed of everything which can with propriety towards the public interest be communicated to them, I will not, even to gratify the desire of this House, depart from what I consider to be my duty. When Members calmly reflect on the motives which prevent Her Majesty's Government in the present state of affairs from going into details which they are anxious to hear, I am sure they will see that we are acting rightly. When the negotiations now going on have arrived at a stage at which, consistently with the national interests, the Government can make known what we have agreed to or proposed, I am quite satisfied we shall be able to convince the House that in this matter we have acted in accordance with our duty and with the soundest opinions that we have been enabled to form.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: Sir, I think that those who have listened to the speech of my right hon. Friend must feel satisfied that the noble Lord who has just sat down has entirely misrepresented him. There is a reticence and reserve based on the ground that premature disclosure would be injurious to the public service. There is also a reticence and reserve which it may be prudent for Ministers to observe when frankness may be injurious to the Government. It is not true that my right hon. Friend or the

House wishes the noble Lord to give day by day details of all that has occurred in the Conference, or to state what has been said by this or that Plenipotentiary. That is not what my right hon. Friend wants. That is not what the House of Commons desires at the present moment. When this Conference was first proposed I put a question to the noble Lord and asked him on what basis he proposed to go to this Conference. The noble Lord replied that, in order to avoid hurting the susceptibilities of certain Foreign Powers, the noble Earl had assembled the Conference on the basis of maintaining the peace of Europe. ["Hear!"] Yes—but the noble Lord added (and I will thank the hon. Gentleman who cheered to cheer this also) that the only principle on which the Government could go into the Conference was that of maintaining the integrity of Denmark. But was that all? We all know that the noble Lord the Foreign Minister addressed a despatch to France and Russia in the winter for the purpose of inviting their concert and co-operation to settle the affairs of Denmark; and when the noble Lord was asked what he meant by "concert and co-operation," he distinctly said that he meant the lending of material assistance to Denmark by the three great Powers. The noble Lord upon being asked upon what event that material assistance was to be given to Denmark, said it was to be given if any proposition were made for the dismemberment of that monarchy. It is not from day to day that we want to know what is going on; but it is now stated in such form and on such authority that the House cannot discredit it, that not only has the Government taken the question into consideration, but that they have themselves been parties to propose that very dismemberment which they denounced only a few months ago, and which they said would be a just cause of war, and with respect to which they said they were prepared to join France and Russia in lending material assistance to prevent. We want to know, has the Government done that? We want to know whether they are themselves parties to an expressly opposite policy from that which they announced to this House. We want to know whether the Government have taken up a course and position which, I undertake to say, five out of six in this House and out of it would consider a humiliation and a disgrace to the country. We wish to know from the noble Lord, before we agree to continue confidence in the Government, whether that rumour—that more than rumour—whether that statement, which is generally believed to be true, is true—that the Government have been parties to that course which, before the Conference, they were the first to denounce?

LORD ROBERT CECIL: Sir, I regret that no member of the Treasury Bench has thought fit to answer my hon. Friend, but that the Government seem determined to bring this debate to a conclusion without giving the House of Commons any of the information that it seeks. The noble Lord has told us calmly to reflect upon the motives of Her Majesty's Government. I have done my best calmly to reflect upon them, and I have come to the conclusion that the answer to that appeal is, that this is the 6th of June. The noble Lord knows that if by such answers he can veil himself behind his position of negotiator—if he can put off day by day the necessity of giving the House of Commons the account he is bound to render—if he can put off explanations until an advanced period of the summer, the Government is safe, at least for this year—and to the noble Lord and those who sit with him the welfare of Denmark, the maintenance of treaties, and the fulfilment of the pledged word of England, are trifles compared with that which is paramount in their minds, namely, the advanced stage of the Session. I think the noble Lord is making an experiment on the patience of the House and the country, which will not be answered by the results. It is idle to talk of details. We all know he has made a complete change of policy. We all know, from sources which we cannot doubt, although they are not officially confirmed, that the dismemberment of Denmark has been approved—nay, proposed—by Her Majesty's Government themselves. I say it is idle to attempt to withdraw their conduct from the judgment of the country and the House of Commons. The reason why the House of Commons and the country are becoming impatient of the length of time that the Conference has dragged on, and are beginning to intrude on that sacred reserve which the noble Lord claims for the position of negotiator, is that they are made to suspect that under the auspices of the noble Lord, England, under pretence of serving and defending Denmark, is in reality betraying her. She has pushed Denmark from concession to concession—she has first forced her to retire from Holstein, then to abandon Rendsburg, then to consent to an armistice, then to abandon Schleswig south of the Schlei, and now there are rumours that the noble Lord intends to yield to the extravagant and flagitious demand of the Germans, and hand over a Danish population to German rule. I venture to say that neither the House of Commons nor the country will long submit to the silence the noble Lord wishes to impose on them, but that they will require from him that account which he is constitutionally bound to render, and not permit him to stifle discussion, under pretence of friendship for Denmark, by asking the House not to interfere while negotiations are going on.

MR. KINGLAKE said, he thought it would be lamentable if the language used on this or the other side of the House should have the effect of extorting from Her Majesty's Government any disclosures perilous to the cause of peace. He frankly acknowledged that he appreciated to the full the argument addressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks to the Government, for he put it with great force, that the silence of the House during several weeks had been purchased by the declaration made by the Government of the views and principles with which they were going into the Conference. But he must call upon the House to remember, that during the discussions which took place at an earlier period, just before the Conference commenced, the Government, being asked repeatedly to state on what basis they proposed to go to the Conference, at length stated, though with the greatest reluctance, that the parties to the Conference were meeting without any other basis than a common desire of restoring peace to the North of Europe. Surely that statement was a retraction of that other and impossible principle which the Government propounded to the House at an earlier period of the Session; and he thought, therefore, that those who valued the peace of Europe should welcome the retirement of Her Majesty's Government from a position which was perceived, all over Europe, to be untenable, rather than taunt them with the words which they used earlier in the Session.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that there was a fear lest the delay would be injurious chiefly to one party, and that the weakest. The present period of the year was more favourable than any other to naval operations in the Baltic, and it might be said by the friends of Denmark that the Conference were tying the hands of the weaker party by further postponement. It was plain that the noble Lord's expectation was, that the weaker party would be brought to consent to a prolongation of the armistice. The noble Lord, however, in taking such a course was undertaking a great responsibility. The policy pursued by the noble Lord's Government exposed them to the imputation that the delays which were unfavourable to Denmark were favourable to Her Majesty's Government. If the armistice was prolonged so as to be carried into July, Her Majesty's Government might deal with the matter almost as they pleased. Being pretty familiar with the feelings of the Danes upon the subject, he (Mr. Darby Griffith) knew that what they wanted was some geographical boundary line, which would separate them permanently from a people so unfeeling and unscrupulous as the Germans had proved themselves to be; and if the Government, without extending the armistice too long, were able to discover such a line, he, for one, would not complain, but would rather rejoice at the separation of two nations who were now as hostile to one another as the Russians and the Poles.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he was glad to hear the hon. Gentleman speaking of the separation between the different portions of the disputed territory. Any union whatever of the German population of Schleswig and Holstein with the Crown of Denmark would not lead to permanent peace. Whatever was to be done should be done with the assent of the population, otherwise permanent peace would not be secured. It would not do for that House, or any other authority, to deal with the people of the Duchies without ascertaining their wishes by means of a constitutional vote of the people, or of an assembly elected for the purpose. He hoped Holstein would not receive any accession of Schleswig territory which might contain a hostile population; nor, on the other hand, would it add to the strength of Denmark if an unfriendly population were united to it.

ECCLESIASTICAL REGISTRY.

QUESTION.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the promised Ecclesiastical Registry Bill will be introduced by the Government, and if he will lay on the table of the House the Correspondence between the Government and the Bishops, that this House may know what are the objections of the Prelates which prevent Her Majesty's Government from introducing any measure for the reform of the Ecclesiastical Courts? He had on various occasions brought this subject before the House, but unfortunately without effect. From year to year Her Majesty's Government had promised that some Bill should be introduced for the reform of those courts. In 1856 they themselves introduced a Bill, drawn by the present Lord Chancellor when Attorney General, which dealt fully with the matter, and which received the general approbation of ecclesiastical reformers in both Houses of Parliament. That Bill was, however, unfortunately defeated in the other House by a small majority; but it drew from the Irish Prelates an unanimous declaration addressed to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, thanking him for having introduced such a measure, and stating that no private emoluments for themselves or their families should induce them to stand in the way of the passing of a similar measure of reform. The Bill was thrown out by the efforts of certain English Prelates, who had misrepresented various portions of the Bill, as was afterwards proved when it was too late. Another Bill was introduced by certain Prelates who had opposed the former measure, but it then appeared that they would never consent to any Bill for the improvement of Church discipline which would not place the parochial clergy completely under their control. The head and front of the offending of the Bill of the noble Lord was that it did not do that, and that was the reason, which they dared not avow, why certain Prelates opposed it. When Lord Derby's Government came into office in a year or two afterwards another Bill was introduced to the same effect with regard to Ireland; it passed in another place, got two readings in that House, and was prevented from becoming law only by the dissolution of Parliament. That Bill provided an efficient remedy for those defects in the administration of Church discipline, and those abuses of patronage which to a very great extent he was sorry to say still disfigured ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Since that time various efforts had been made. Year after year he had himself introduced a Bill, and he had never received an an-answer to one single fact which he stated in that House, and which he brought forward upon the authority of Committees. Some fourteen years ago a Committee was preaided over by his right hon. Friend the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. E. P. Bouverie), in which the late Sir James Graham took a distinguished part, and which pointed out abuses which prevailed and large fees which were levied for the benefit of those upon whom the Prelates wished to shower their benefits. The Report stated that these abuses were equally against ecclesiastical law and the common weal of the Kingdom, and deserved the attention of Government. Since that period a Liberal Government had sat for the greater time on the Treasury Benches; but nothing seemed to induce the Liberal Government to introduce Liberal measures with spirit. There had been a political fallow for the last four years, during which period scarcely one measure a year of any importance to the Liberal party had been introduced. In the present year, as in the last, they dragged on a miserable and sickly existence, and in the end they would be driven from the Ministerial side of the House with ignominy by those who, without declaring any policy of their own, could yet obtain possession of the Treasury Benches, simply on account of the universal disgust pervading the whole country at the inactivity of the Government. Year after year the Home Secretary had promised that this Question should receive attention—still there were no signs of the promised ecclesiastical reform. But it appeared that even a portion of the Prelates outstripped the Government in liberality, the Irish Bishops being anxious to see defects in their Church remedied, while the chief obstacles to a reform in the Irish Church were Her Majesty's Liberal advisers. On Thursday last the Archbishop of Armagh introduced in the House of Lords a Bill, in the very sense of the one brought in by Lord Derby's Government, with every prospect of success. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, told him at the beginning of the Session, that a general measure of Church reform, comprehending a Church Discipline Bill, as well as a reform of the Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries, was too large a measure for the Government to undertake; and all that the right hon. Gentleman could summon up courage to attempt was a very small portion of those reforms, and introduce during the present Session a Registry

Bill. Still, such a measure as that might lead to a general reform, because one of the principal impediments to improvement had been the question of registries, upon which offices there had been—for the most—expended £50,000 or £60,000 a year, levied as a tax on the laity for marriage licences and other purposes. That sum went in every bishopric to support the registries, in the offices of which, according to the Committee of 1848-9, might be traced the families of all those who had discharged the episcopal function in the dioceses of England. Some of the offices had been held by ladies, and some by children of three or four years of age. A late police magistrate was put into one of the offices by his father, a bishop, and enjoyed to the day of his death a sinecure of £400 a year, paying another to perform the duty. Another registrarship was held by an officer in the Artillery, who likewise paid a small sum—some £100 a year—for a person to do the work; and yet some of these registrarships were worth £1,000, £1,200, or £1,400 a year. The registries were in many instances very unfit for the preservation of documents. Very few were fire-proof, so that there was great risk to all documents deposited in them. The Prelates had rejected the proposal of the Government on the subject because they wished to keep their registries in their own hands. If they were to be kept up it ought not to be by a tax on the laity—if Bishops insisted on keeping up registries to provide for their families and dependents, they ought to find the funds themselves, and ought to limit the emoluments to the salaries considered sufficient by Act of Parliament. There had been want of firmness, energy, and tact on the part of the Government in the preparation and carrying of Bills in that House. A little of these qualities might be infused into the Government with great benefit to the country. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the Government were ready to bring in these Bills, but that the Prelates were not unanimous on the subject, and were averse to cutting off their old sources of profit. That was natural. No doubt they required a little gentle pressure from that House and the public, and especially from the Government, to induce them to consent to these necessary measures of reform. The Irish Prelates were unanimous in their desire for a measure on the subject, and he desired to know what were the objections of the English Prelates to such a measure, and what reasons they had urged which had been apparently so effective with the Government as to induce them to postpone this reform so long? Nothing was more detrimental to public policy and to the character of the House and the Government than to appoint Committees to inquire into abuses, and when the Committees reported that abuses existed to take no step to remedy them. There seemed to be a general reticence on the part of the Government in their home as well as foreign policy. He had understood the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) to say, that though he had agreed to postpone a certain portion of the measure of ecclesiastical reform, yet that he was determined to introduce the question of a Registry Bill. When the House met he (Mr. H. Seymour) called attention to the question; and the right hon. Gentleman said it had received the careful attention of the Government, and that he thought he might promise a little bit of reform in the shape of a Registry Bill, and that he thought it would be introduced before Easter. After Easter the Bill was not ready, and as Whitsuntide was now passed it was doubtful whether, if the Bill was introduced, it would be carried this Session. He regretted that a liberal Government should have left a subject of such importance as this to the clergy to remain unsettled for four years. He would ask whether the difficulty said to exist in filling ministerial offices in the Church had not some connection with the anomalous position of the clergy in regard to their Ecclesiastical Courts? He wished to remove what many considered to be a stigma on the Prelates and the clergy. The clergy—a body of 25,000 men—were placed under the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts in certain cases. At present the difficulty of weeding offenders out of the Church was so great, that many were allowed to remain in it. In one case a clergyman could not be proceeded against till the late Archbishop of Canterbury received from certain persons an indemnity amounting to several thousand pounds. In another case a compromise was effected in consequence of the enormous cost of carrying it through the Ecclesiastical Court. The case of Mr. Bonwell cost the Bishop of London £1,500, and he knew of a parish in which, in order to get rid of a notorious offender, a compromise had been made by which he had been induced to retire in consideration of an annuity for life. Both the clergy and the parishioners suffered from such a state of things. In justice to the clergy, to the public, and to the House, they ought to be informed why these abuses had been left so long unremedied. He begged to ask when the Ecclesiastical Registry Bill would be introduced, and whether the right hon. Gentleman would lay on the table the Correspondence he had alluded to between the Government and the Bishops, that the House might know what were the objections of the Prelates which prevented Government from introducing any measure for the reform of the Ecclesiastical Courts.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, his hon. Friend had—unintentionally, no doubt—ascribed to him words which he had never used, and had not correctly represented what he had said in answer to the questions addressed to him on the subject. The hon. Gentleman seemed under the impression that he (Sir George Grey) had said that, having prepared a Bill for the reform of the Ecclesiastical Courts, he had had a correspondence with some of the Prelates; that they, from interested motives, desiring to retain in their own hands for the benefit of their families certain appointments, objected to the measure, and that the Government yielded to their objections. Nothing could be further from a correct statement of the facts. He had never said anything conveying such an imputation.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR had only expressed a hope that there were other reasons for their opposition.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that any idea that there had been any correspondence with the Bishops on the subject, was wholly unfounded. What he stated had reference to a Bill prepared with great care by the Lord Chancellor for the reform of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and the amendment of the law of clergy discipline, and it was to this effect—that the Bill having been prepared, the noble and learned Lord had had conferences with some of the Prelates, which satisfied him that if he proposed the measure it would not receive that amount of support which would secure its success. Apart from the question as to where the funds for the prosecutions were to come from, and upon which the only proposal had been that they should be provided from the funds in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the main difficulty was the constitution of the ultimate court of appeal. Upon that question great difference of opinion existed, and the Lord Chancellor thought it better to endeavour if possible to devise some plan which was not open to the same objections, than to press his measure upon the House. He (Sir George Grey) stated, however, that with regard to the Ecclesiastical Registry Bill the objections that were entertained with reference to the other proposals did not exist, and that he was authorized by the Lord Chancellor to say that he hoped, in the course of the present Session, to introduce a Bill on the subject in the other House. He (Sir George Grey) never himself undertook to introduce such a measure. He regretted that the noble and learned Lord had not yet been able to give effect to his intention. There were causes which had delayed the preparation of the Bill, but he still hoped that it might be presented in the course of the present Session. He entirely agreed with his hon. Friend that it was the duty of the Government not to postpone what they considered a substantial measure of Church reform in consequence of any opposition by the Prelates; but at the same time it was desirable that any reform of this kind should be carried with as general an assent as it was possible to obtain, and he could not but think the noble and learned Lord had acted judiciously in endeavouring to meet the difficulties of the case by a conference with the Bishops. No correspondence had taken place between himself and the Bishops on the subject, and he believed the communications between the Bishops and the Lord Chancellor were entirely verbal.

£10,000, New National Gallery at Burlington House.

MR. COWPER said, he desired to take that opportunity of making some explanation on the subject. The Vote had its origin in the conviction on the part of the Government that the time was come when an attempt should be made to solve the difficulties which for the last twenty years had impeded the settlement of a long vexed question, and had compelled the retention of the national pictures in a building which was unsuited for their proper exhibition. In 1840 a plan had been prepared for making very extensive alterations in the existing National Gallery; a number of Committees and Commissions had inquired into the subject. The first Committee which made any definite Report on the subject was that which sat in 1848. They stated that they could not but regard the present building as deficient in space, and wanting in dignity and elevation, and they recommended that a large and improved building should be erected on the same site. In 1850 another Committee, consisting of almost the same Members, was appointed. Among their names were to be found those of Sir Robert Peel, Lord John Russell, Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Sidney Herbert, and Sir Benjamin Hall. They, however, thought better of the opinions which they had previously expressed, and stated that upon re-viewing the evidence they would not recommend that any expenditure should be incurred on the existing site. Then followed the Commission of 1851, on which sat Lord Seymour and other experienced persons, who, having fully considered the subject, decided against the site in Trafalgar Square, and recommended a site of fifteen or twenty acres fronting Hyde Park or else in Kensington Gardens; but they gave the preference to the latter. The next Committee was the one moved for by Colonel Mure, which followed the same course, and pronounced against Trafalgar Square, and recommending Kensington Gore. A Bill was brought into the House of Commons with the view of giving effect to that recommendation; but the House seemed unwilling, without further inquiry, to allow the National Gallery to be removed to so great a distance from the centre of London. The result of the debate and the division which took place on that occasion was that another Commission was appointed, at the head of which was Lord Broughton. That Commission reported that they found their choice practically limited to two sites, Trafalgar Square and Kensington Gore—but gave the preference to the former, stating that they did so in the expectation that the building which might be substituted for the present National Gallery should be one which would be worthy of the British people, which would command universal admiration, and do honour to the age. The cost of the building and site thus recommended was in the same year estimated in a paper which had been laid on the table of the House at £500,000. They proposed to take the barracks and workhouse, and also that portion of the west of St. Martin's Lane which lay between the workhouse and St. Martin's Church. The estimate framed was however, he believed, too low, and a building such as was described would be more likely to cost a million than only half a million of money. In 1861 there was a Committee of the House of Lords on the subject, which held out the prospect that a noble gallery might be erected on the present or any other site, but that, in the event of that prospect not being fulfilled, then a limited addition to the present building might be made. He had quoted these recommendations of the Committees and Commissions in order to show how strong was the weight of authority in favour of looking elsewhere for a site for the new National Gallery than Trafalgar Square. He would now proceed to state what the views of the Government were with regard to the building for which the present Vote was asked. The desire of the Government was to have the very best building that could be erected. He proposed that it should be all on one floor; that it should be lighted from the top; that there should be three spacious galleries of 200 feet in length and 40 feet in width, running parallel to one another; that these should be crossed by three other galleries of the same dimensions, and that between the interstices there should be galleries of smaller size and height. The effect produced by that arrangement would, he thought, be very grand. There would be ample space for all the pictures that might be received during many years, assuming the pictures to increase in the same ratio as hitherto. But the time would come when even the space provided under this plan—36,000 square feet—would be insufficient. One half of the pictures in the National Gallery had been obtained by gift or bequest, and he believed that if ample space were provided bequests and gifts would largely increase in number. They knew that the gift of Sir Francis Bourgeois was lost to the country because the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day was either unable or unwilling to build a gallery to receive the pictures; and the manner in which the pictures given by Mr. Vernon, Mr. Jacob Bell, and Mr. Turner had been exhibited had been no encouragement to donors. It would be the most miserable parsimony to grudge the expenditure necessary to provide galleries to receive the pictures which public spirited individuals might present to the nation. The space proposed to be given to the new gallery was calculated by the wants of the present gallery. The present gallery contained 470 pictures, which it was calculated would require to hang them properly about 2,250 feet lineal, exclusive of door and window spaces. The whole of the Burlington House site consisted of three acres and a half. About half of this was occupied by the gardens, upon which buildings might be placed which would give ample accommodation for the present needs and anticipated extensions of the gallery in future years. When those buildings became insufficient, an extension might be made over the part of the site now occupied by the buildings which surrounded the quadrangle, and a suitable architectural elevation might be substituted for the buildings of Burlington House. The upper gallery lighted would run round either all or the greater portion of the quadrangle, and the ground floor might be devoted to the use of the learned Societies and the University of London. If it was desired, that portion of the quadrangle next to Piccadilly might be treated like the front of Somerset House; the entrance might be through an archway in the centre of the building, and in that building might be placed the halls, theatres, and large rooms to be used by the learned Societies and the University in succession at different times. That was the way in which provision was made for future extension; but by building on the ground now vacant, leaving Burlington House untouched, all the present and proximate wants of the National Gallery would be provided for. The cartoons might, if it was thought fit, be brought up from Hampton Court; and, for his own part, he should desire that, as London already possessed the greatest works of sculpture—the Elgin Marbles—it should also have the greatest works in drawing—the Cartoons of Raphael. The cost of the building now to be erected was estimated at £152,000, and there was, he believed, no reason to fear that that estimate would be exceeded. The building would be a cheap one for its size and situation. The sides being concealed by the Albany and the Burlington Arcade it would be impossible to have any architectural facades to the east or west; but to the north there would be an opportunity of having a two-story building of stone, with proper architectural embellishments, in which it was proposed to place the offices of the Trustees and the apartments of the resident officers of the National Gallery. Without minutely comparing this site with others, he might remind the Committee, that while it was in the immediate neighbourhood of the great thoroughfare Piccadilly, it would have the advantage of being separated from it by the short distance that would make it less of a resort for idlers who would come for other purposes than to look at pictures. It was the habit of persons who happened to be without an umbrella in a shower of rain to go into the National Gallery for shelter; it was also the habit of persons who walked about the streets with their luncheons in their pockets to go into the National Gallery to eat them; and any one who had been there much would have observed that, owing to its proximity to the barracks, the soldiers were in the habit of meeting their friends there. It thus became to such an extent a lounging place for conversation, that the study and enjoyment of persons who went to see the pictures were very much interfered with. Piccadilly was central and easy of access to poor and rich, but the gallery would be out of the noise and throng. The effect of placing the entrance to the Geological Museum in Jermyn Street instead of in Piccadilly, had been to keep it chiefly for those who desired to inspect the collections and were interested in the subjects which they illustrated. The court-yard of Burlington House would supply a dignified entrance, and a convenient place for carriages to wait for persons who were visiting the gallery. Among other advantages attending the design was one easily understood; this was, that the site was actually ready. There was no purchase of a site, no necessity for pulling down and rebuilding; the moment the Vote of the House passed steps might be taken for commencing the new buildings. After the numerous Committees and Commissions that had investigated the subject, he thought the Committee would feel that it would be a very great advantage if they could have some certainty that steps would be immediately taken to begin the necessary work. If, however, this proposal should not be adopted, and they were thrown back upon another long round of Committees and Commissions, and to inquire over and over again into the subject—looking to all the possible sites that might be suggested—and many there had been already suggested which were not, however, half so good as Burlington House—he thought it possible that another twenty years might elapse before they came to any formal and satisfactory conclusion upon it. He thought he could undertake to say that the present would be the cheapest proposal that could be made—[“No, no!”]—the most convenient and altogether the best that could be found. [“No, no!”] He was sure it would enable them to get a better gallery than they could have anywhere else, and therefore, on that ground, as well as on the grounds both of economy and convenience, and in the hope of getting a perfect gallery in all its internal arrangements, he hoped the Committee would support the present proposal.

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in rising to move the rejection of the Supplementary Estimate for the new National Gallery, Burlington House, said he was disposed to concur in one observation which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman.

LORD ELCHO, who had risen at the same time, interposing, said, he thought it would greatly facilitate the discussion if the noble Lord would allow him to put the following Questions to the right hon. Gentleman. First, Whether he could state to the Committee the relative space contained in the Burlington House site compared with the present National Gallery buildings, the barracks, and the workhouse in the rear; and second, whether he could give them any information what accommodation space this portion of Burlington House would give, in comparison with the other large galleries of Europe?

MR. COWPER said, the military authorities had on many occasions strongly protested against their taking the barracks; but supposing they were to take in the barracks and the workhouse, it would give an area of three and a half acres, which was the size of the Burlington House site. The proposed Gallery at Burlington House would certainly be larger than the Galleries of Berlin or Munich, and more floor space than the Louvre, though not more wall space.

LORD JOHN MANNERS was about to say, when he was interrupted by the noble

Lord, that he quite concurred with the right hon. Gentleman that it would be very unsatisfactory to go the round of a fresh series of Committees and Commissions upon this subject, and that was one of the principal reasons which had induced him to put his Amendment on the paper, so that there might be no mistake in future with regard to the real intentions of Parliament upon this subject. He wished the House, by accepting the proposition, to place in the most unmistakable manner on record, the reiteration of their determination that the National Gallery should remain in Trafalgar Square. While, however, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman in his desire to escape more Committees and Commissions, he could not agree with his short and not very accurate description of the labour of these Committees and Commissions during the last twenty years. The whole tendency and scope of the evidence taken before them and their decisions had been unfavourable to the removal of the National Gallery from what the late Sir Robert Peel called "the finest site in Europe." He admitted that the right hon. Gentleman was correct in saying that the Committee of 1850 had recommended the removal of the national pictures from Trafalgar Square; but he did not tell them that the Committee recommended it under the apprehension that the pictures, if continued there, would be deteriorated by the smoke. That objection, however, had been entirely removed of late years, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman was rather unkind towards his noble Friend at the head of the Government (Viscount Palmerston), in not complimenting him on the great success that had attended, he believed, almost the only effort of Parliamentary legislation which the noble Lord had been successful in passing—namely, the Smoke Prohibition Bill. The result of that measure, he had been assured by those who had charge of the pictures, was to banish all fear of deterioration from the smoke—the only possible damage likely to arise to the pictures now being from the dirt which arose from the vast multitudes of people who went to look at the pictures—the numbers being, it seemed to him, a very good reason why they should not change the site of the National Gallery. That the right hon. Gentleman might not say he was overstating that part of the case, he would read a few lines from the Report of the Committee of 1850. They said that the present gallery did not afford sufficient space for the due exhibition of the pictures, but that a considerable addition of space might be obtained by the removal of the Royal Academy from their portion of the gallery; and the Committee further said that if the present site was in all respects suitable for the accommodation of the national pictures, the Committee would at once recommend that the portion now occupied by the Royal Academy should be added to the National Gallery; it appeared, however, to the Committee that the present site, although well adapted for an edifice, was considered by most of the witnesses as unfavourable for the preservation of pictures. That was the only ground alleged by the Committee; but the objections to which they referred had now been entirely removed; and if the Committee were re-appointed to-morrow, there could be no doubt they would recommend the course he was calling upon this Committee to pursue. On going through his catalogue of the Commissions and Inquiries that had been held on this subject, the right hon. Gentleman omitted that which took place about four years ago, and which went to show, in addition, the settled wish of those who took an interest in the subject that the national pictures should remain in Trafalgar Square. It was well known that his right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) announced that the Derby Government did not only recommend that the whole of the site in Trafalgar Square should be taken up for the national pictures, but that they had entered into negotiations with the Royal Academy to consent to convert at their own charge a portion of the Burlington House site, which would give them the requisite accommodation. That announcement, he believed, met with the general concurrence of the Members of that House, and of those out of doors who were interested in the question; and the present Government, by the course they pursued twelve months after they came into office, showed that they adopted and sanctioned and adhered to the decision of their predecessors. But perhaps they would be told in regard to this, as they had been in other important matters, that though they had come to the wise resolution of treading in the footsteps of their predecessors, they had not the moral courage and good sense to act up to it, and they had relapsed into that artistic heresy of which he complained. Well, he would show that, for at least a year after they came into office, the present adhered to the plan of the late Government. In 1860, when the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works asked the House of Commons first for £13,000, then for £15,000, and afterwards for £17,000, for the purpose of enlarging and improving the National Gallery, an hon. Member who suspected the intentions of Her Majesty's Government put question after question to the right hon. Gentleman, and a very awkward storm of disapprobation was raised at his proposal. It was then late in the Session, there were few independent Members present, and the Government were masters of the position; but so critical had that position become, that before the Vote was taken the noble Lord, as was his wont, put the right hon. Gentleman and his explanation entirely on one side, took the matter into his own hands, and assured the suspicious independent Members that Her Majesty's Government were absolutely determined that the pictures should remain in Trafalgar Square. He would refresh the right hon. Gentleman's memory with regard to what then took place. The noble Lord at the head of the Government said on that occasion—

"The Government assumed that the building in Trafalgar Square was to be given up to the National Gallery, and that that building, if so given up now, would suffice for some years for all the pictures belonging to the nation. . . . They proposed, therefore, to adopt the simplest possible course—to deck over the middle gulf and make an even floor upon the upper story, which for the present would afford sufficient space for the exhibition of the national pictures, and when the Royal Academy should otherwise be provided for would make the building more adapted for the purposes of a national collection, and for years to come would avoid the necessity for the large plan and great expenditure which had been suggested."—[3 Hansard, clx. 1541.]

He (Lord John Manners) should have thought that this was stringent enough, but the few Members who were in the House were still suspicious. More questions were put, and the noble Lord was obliged to speak a second time before the Vote was taken, and he said—

"The plan proposed was calculated to make the present building more suitable than at present for the permanent reception of the national collection."—[Ibid. 1544.]

Could any words be stronger? The Committee divided, and in consequence of these assurances, by a majority of eight, the expenditure of £17,000 for the purpose of adapting the building in Trafalgar Square for the permanent reception of the national pictures was carried. He could not tell how it was, but so suspicious were certain hon. Members of the intention of the Government that, on the bringing up of the Report, the debate was renewed, and the noble Lord had again to come into the field, and he said—

"Now that the Royal Academy should go elsewhere was, he apprehended, a question already decided. The material point to be determined upon was where they were to go. The arrangement now making involved the intention of appropriating the whole of the building to the national pictures."—[Ibid. 1591.]

After that statement what could the House think of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in coming to that House, and without any fresh evidence to rely on, and he might say without any substantial reason, to ask the House to forget that they had spent £17,000 on the faith of those assurances, and embark on a further expenditure of £150,000 for ten years, and at the end of that time upon a further expenditure, which he would leave the Committee to estimate? The right hon. Gentleman was rather liberal in his additions to the plans of the architects. One Commission thought that a very handsome building, might be erected for £500,000, but the right hon. Gentleman said they had understated the amount, and that the building to be worthy of the dignity and reputation of the country, could not be erected for less than a million. The right hon. Gentleman gave them no figures on which he founded his estimate, and he gave them no idea of the size of the building which he thought suitable for the dignity and reputation of the country. If, therefore, they were to begin, on his recommendation of a modest building, at £150,000, and then, after destroying the whole of Burlington House, to remodel everything and build over the three acres and a half, he should be doing no injustice to the right hon. Gentleman were he to say that an architectural design of that kind might well cost the million which he proposed to the House as a proper figure to put to the recommendation of the Commissioners. He should be disposed to say, having reference to the very remarkable statements made by the noble Lord in 1860, that if the Government proposed a scheme for the removal of the National Gallery to Burlington House, it would be something very like obtaining money under false Parliamentary pretences. No language could be stronger than the noble Lord's, and in consequence of that the House voted the £17,000. He would not press that point further. Every hon. Gentleman would be able to estimate for himself the value of those strong and decided asseverations of the noble Lord; but he said if, after the expenditure of the £17,000, they were now to incur a further outlay of £150,000 at once (and no human being could tell how much at the end of ten years), and to which they must add that £17,000 to the expenditure asked for then, the right hon. Gentleman ought to be able to show he had entered into an arrangement with the Royal Academy, in virtue of which they would refund to the Government the £17,000 which, under these circumstances, would have been expended for their sole and exclusive benefit. The Committee would observe that throughout the right hon. Gentleman's speech he had not uttered a single syllable what the future relations of the Government to the Royal Academy were to be. He had not told them under what form the arrangement with the Royal Academy was to be carried out—whether the £17,000 was to be refunded; whether the Royal Academy had entered into any arrangement as to rendering up the present building, which the noble Viscount stood alone in regarding as a creditable and handsome one, or for refronting that which the right hon. Gentleman had declared to be an ugly, poor, and miserable building. He had left the Committee entirely in the dark as to what was to be done with the building in Trafalgar Square when he had handed it over to the Royal Academy. All he had done was to assure the Committee that he did not intend at present to spend more than £150,000 in the rear of Burlington House, and at the end of ten years to come down and ask for more. The right hon. Gentleman went into the question of site, and not being successful in showing that the plan was a very economical one, he attempted to show that the Burlington House site was the best one for a national collection of pictures. He must say that he did not think that in that part of his argument the right hon. Gentleman had been more successful than in his appeal to the financial part of the question. It was admitted that the objection of smoke was got over, but he did not know whether the Committee required to be informed of the admirable nature of the Trafalgar Square site for a great national collection. The right hon. Gentleman, however, having pointed out a site which he had declared to be preferable, the Committee would not object to hear a few testimonials from men who were entitled to speak with authority upon this question. The late Sir Charles Barry, in 1848, expressed a decided opinion in his last examination in favour of the present site being retained, and he said he was more and more confirmed in opinion, that of all the sites in London it was the most desirable. The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Tite), in 1863, in his evidence before the last Commission, expressed himself favourable to the site, and said the general feeling in its favour had been well expressed by the late Mr. Alderman Cubitt, who said he was accustomed to go there easily—he knew his way there, and he thought it was a proper place for a national collection; and Mr. Tite added he thought it was a very common feeling, and he agreed in opinion with Sir Charles Barry. Mr. Hurlstone was of opinion that a central situation for a National Gallery was of vital importance, and that without that condition it did not fulfil the objects for which it was established. The present National Gallery was now occupying the finest site in Europe, and it possessed the advantage of an almost infinite capability of extension by a quadrangle in the rear, and of becoming inferior to none on the Continent for convenience and extent. Much of the evidence in favour of the Trafalgar Square site was given before certain great metropolitan improvements had been effected. If Trafalgar Square was the most accessible and most central situation ten or fifteen years ago, it was infinitely more so now. They had taken means for effecting the purification of the Thames, and for making an embankment along its shores; they had given facilities for railways to come into the heart of London, and at the present time they had a great railway station at Charing Cross, which would bring in thousands of the working classes to witness and admire the national pictures at Trafalgar Square. There were also a multitude of steamers plying on the Thames, which landed their passengers in close proximity to Trafalgar Square; and at no distant period the course of metropolitan improvements and new railways would tend to bring increased numbers from the northern districts. For the reasons he had stated, from the evidence before the Committee of 1861, and the Commission of 1863, and bearing in his recollection all the circumstances in connection with this subject, he saw no reason for the removal of the site in Trafalgar Square. The right hon. Gentleman talked of the inconvenience of the present site in Trafalgar Square, and told them that people took their umbrellas in. Was he serious in adducing this as an argument to the House of Commons for the removal of the National Gallery? And the right hon. Gentleman told them that the soldiers went in. Goodness gracious! why should they not? You could do the people no greater kindness than by giving them access to anything that would educate their taste. He should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman, attached as he was to a Government professing such a desire to elevate the lower classes, would not urge this as a reason for transferring the collection. Why did they not act on this principle on the present occasion? Why were they to remove the collection from the site that was fitted for and suitable to the great body of the people? Well, there is a reason, and the Committee will probably think it an extraordinary one. Before the Committee of the House of Lords in 1861, Lord Overstone stated his opinion that Burlington House would be the best site, and being asked his reasons for that opinion, said—

"In the first place, I think it is important, as regards a site for the National Gallery, that it should be in immediate connection with the great thoroughfares, at the same time, however, affording retirement and seclusion from them, and it seems to me that Burlington House presents, in that respect, peculiar facilities and advantages."

The right hon. Gentleman had enlarged on that, and pointed out what a benefit having a long passage to traverse would be to people who had to snatch half an hour or an hour from their daily labour to approach that passage. And then the noble Lord went on to say—

"I think, in the second place, the present elevation of Burlington House is peculiarly graceful and elegant"—

But at the end of ten years, according to the right hon. Gentleman, it was doomed—

"The equal of which, in the general opinion of the community, we should stand little chance in producing if we made the attempt. . . . In addition to that, such a removal of the National Gallery to Burlington House would enable the Royal Academy to remain in its present position, which, from its extreme publicity, is well suited for the purposes of the Royal Academy, while it is, on the same account, rather disadvantageous for the purposes of the National Gallery."

He (Lord J. Manners) ventured to take a totally different view. In his opinion, for the same reason, it was advantageous for the National Gallery. According to his view the National Gallery was something for the use of the nation, and not for any class. If it was on a site convenient for students that was a recommendation; if it was on a site convenient to the man of leisure, who could go at any time and often, all very well; but, above all other considerations, they should have a site that was convenient to the great masses of the people who had not leisure, and to whom every half hour was of importance. And so far from such a site not being a good one he thought it was the best, and differed entirely from those who thought a secluded site the best. Then, after Lord Overstone had given his evidence, Sir Charles Eastlake—Sir Charles Eastlake was not exactly, as Mrs. Malaprop said, three gentlemen at once, but he was undoubtedly two—the Director of the National Gallery and the President of the Royal Academy—and he (Lord John Manners) wished to take this opportunity of tendering his cordial tribute to his services in both capacities; but Sir Charles Eastlake being asked to give his opinion on this question of site, naturally felt himself in a difficulty, and the Committee would, no doubt, be amused by a reference to two parts of that gentleman's evidence. Sir Charles Eastlake, being asked by Lord Colchester why it was considered essential that the buildings for the Royal Academy should be erected upon that portion of Burlington House which was next to Piccadilly, replied—

"For the objects of the Royal Academy during the annual exhibition, it is essential that they should be near a thoroughfare."

Lord Colchester then asked—

"You would object to their being placed in the garden behind the existing houses?"

And Sir Charles promptly replied—

"It would be tantamount to the extinction of the institution."

The Committee—all able men—were naturally startled by so strong an expression of opinion, and he was further asked—

"What would be your opinion of Burlington House, with the present open space in front of it, and the gardens behind it, as a desirable or undesirable site for the National Gallery?—I think it would be a very good site."

"Can you suggest any better site?—I cannot."

Then Lord Stanley of Alderley—not a person, be it remembered, hostile to Her Majesty's Government, but a Member of the Cabinet—put this question—

"Is not the present site as good, if not better, than Burlington House, and would not all the reasons that have been urged to the advantage of the present site for the Royal Academy equally apply with regard to the exhibition of the National Gallery?"

That was certainly a very awkward question, and Sir Charles replied as follows:—

"I confess I think there is some truth in the reasons I have heard given by Lord Overstone, with regard to the comparative seclusion of Burlington House; I think that a quiet preparation before approaching pictures by the Old Masters is desirable. It never struck me before; but I have been impressed with that and other observations I have heard from Lord Overstone."

And again he is asked—

"You think that calm preparation, which is desirable before approaching the Old Masters, is not necessary before entering upon a collection by modern artists?"

To which he replies—

"I quite think so. I think that the works of our fellow citizens are more nearly allied to present and public interests; and that the transition is easier from the crowds of London to the efforts of living artists than to productions which belong to a remote period."

Now Lord Overstone, who started this view of the subject, seemed to be impressed by the very peculiar position which the Director of the National Gallery and the President of the Royal Academy had been made to occupy through his fault, and he put this question—

"Is not it the case that modern works have more the character of a show, while the exhibition of the Old Masters has more the character of study?"

To which the President of the Royal Academy replies—

"I do not like to use the word 'show,' with regard to the excellent pictures which we sometimes see on the walls of the Royal Academy, but I admit the principle completely."

The Under Secretary (Mr. Layard) said this was the true principle to go on. If that was so, had the country been under a delusion for many years? They had always assumed, and he did so now, that the national collection should be on a site where the nation could see it. Now, with respect to the Royal Academy, his noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), who was going to support this proposal, had found great fault with the management of that institution. He (Lord John Manners) did not profess to be a virtuoso, or to know much about the character, and results of the Royal Academy. He did not wish to say a single word against that body or the works which they had exhibited—he had great regard for the first, and great admiration for the second. But when they were asked, without a word of explanation from the Government, as to what was to be done respecting the Royal Academy, to hand over to them the finest site in Europe, he must entreat the Committee to reflect for a moment upon the essential distinction between the functions of the Royal Academy and of the National Gallery. The Royal Academy, from the necessity of its existence, could open its doors, and then only for a money payment during a very short period of the year. For a money payment during three months of the year only the public were admitted within its walls. The National Gallery was open without payment four days in every week all the year round; and, therefore, when the House of Commons was called upon to sanction a transfer of this sort, and to hand over this most valuable, this most desirable, and this which was described as "the finest site in Europe," to a private body, who charged a shilling for every person who went in, and who could not, from the nature of their operations, open their doors for nine months in the year, he thought this a very serious consideration of itself. They had heard something of "reticence and reserve," and when they added the "reticence and reserve" practised by the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works as to any stipulation or engagement entered into by the Royal Academy when they obtained possession of this national building, he thought the Committee would agree that this was a most rash and hasty conclusion to which Her Majesty's Government had arrived. So much as to site. Now, as to space. The right hon. Gentleman gave the Committee to understand that the true policy was to build new galleries vast enough to receive all the presents and bequests which in all time to come might be made to the nation. He thought this a most curious principle. It was notorious that the National Gallery had received as presents much which those intrusted with the management would rather not exhibit. It was said that if pictures were not liked they might be rejected. But when whole collections were left to the nation, it was necessary to accept or to reject the whole. He submitted, therefore, that it was a dangerous principle to build galleries in order to receive every bequest or gift that might possibly be made to the nation. The proper principle to proceed on was to build on a site capable of future additions a gallery large enough to receive the pictures the nation already had, and not one large enough for anything beyond that which they might or might not hereafter receive. If they provided sufficient space for the pictures they had, and sufficient space could hereafter be made available for those they might acquire, then the Committee had done all that was required. He believed there was ample space at Trafalgar Square to accommodate all the existing pictures, together with the probable accretions to the collection, at a slight expense. The time must come when the accretions must be brought to a termination. We could not go on adding to the collection indefinitely. Something like 2,000 pictures would be a collection to which it would not be advisable to make additions. He repudiated, therefore, the notion of having gigantic brick and mortar erections, for the accommodation of innumerable pictures—good, bad, and indifferent. The right hon. Gentleman said there was an available space at Burlington House, fully equal to the area of Trafalgar Square; but there was room in the National Gallery's own premises, after incurring only a small expense. Witness the evidence of Sir Charles Barry and Mr. Pennethorne before the different Committees. A scheme had been prepared by an officer of the National Gallery, according to which, at a very slight expense, an additional gallery, 200 feet by forty, could be obtained in the rear of the existing National Gallery without buying a single inch of land. The right hon. Gentleman said that scheme had not found favour with the military authorities; but he (Lord John Manners) had reason to believe that the highest military authorities had no objection whatever to the scheme. If further space were required in process of time, it was a great mistake to suppose that the military authorities were wedded to the site of Trafalgar Square for their barracks. They were perfectly ready to have their barracks put in another position; this was a mere question of cost, and there was no difficulty in the matter. The space which might thus be acquired on the present site, with a portion of the barrack-yard, would afford accommodation to the National Gallery for years to come, and might be cheaply and well given. There was a proposal of Sir Charles Barry for refronting the National Gallery, and adding three or four times the existing accommodation. He (Lord John Manners) did not recommend that plan, nor any other in particular; but there it was. Besides, Mr. Pennethorne had made a plan with a like view. So also had Captain Fowke, and his scheme would add tenfold to the present accommodation for about £50,000. All these schemes were before the House, with the sanction of eminent and practical names; and all he said with regard to them was, that they constituted reasons why the Committee might safely reject the proposed Vote, on the ground of expense, on the ground of space, and on the ground of site. It had been urged that if the National Gallery were retained at Trafalgar Square, and the Royal Academy spent £50,000, £60,000, or £70,000 in building rooms at Burlington House, they would have no money left to carry out their needed and projected reforms. This meant merely that if this Vote were passed the building in Trafalgar Square, upon which in 1860 some £17,000 was expended, was to be handed over to the Royal Academy in perpetuity, with no condition that they were to spend any money at all in improving it, and indeed with no probability of their doing so; for if the money is to be spent in effecting the reforms suggested by the noble Lord's (Lord Elcho's) Commission, it will not be available for other purposes. This was a proposal which would hardly find favour with the House or the country. He believed that if the House had any regard to space, to economy, and to the feelings and wishes of the great body of the people out of doors, he might with confidence ask them to reject the Supplemental Estimate, the more so as such a course would have the effect of settling the question, at all events for the present generation. Those who voted for the removal of the National Gallery to Burlington House would do their best to lose a situation which was in the highest degree popular, and at the same time admirably adapted to the requirements of such an institution; while those who voted against the proposal of the Government would have the satisfaction, if they succeeded, of knowing that they had prevented the carrying out of a mischievous, uncalled for, and extravagant scheme. The noble Lord, in conclusion, said he would vote for the rejection of the supplemental Estimate for the new National Gallery, Burlington House.

MR. GREGORY said, he intended to vote for the proposal of the Government with a perfect conviction that we had arrived at the point at which the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman was the only one that could be accepted. He believed that no person ever passed the present National Gallery building without feelings of disgust. There were buildings to whose unpretentious ugliness one became reconciled; but about the National Gallery building there was something perpetually intolerable and offensive. Inside, matters were almost worse. The whole of Europe might be ransacked without finding a building so unfitted in every respect for the reception of a national collection of pictures. If they wished to amend the exterior they must pull it down; they could only render the interior fit for use by gutting it entirely. The noble Lord opposite (Lord J. Manners) had referred to the opinion of Sir Charles Barry. Well, he (Mr. Gregory) had been looking to the evidence of Sir Charles Barry in 1848. He said—

"I am of opinion that if the site of St. Martin's Workhouse were purchased, if an alteration were made in the barrack-yard, if a piece of Castle Street were stopped, and if the portico and other portions of the building were taken down, and if considerable additions were made to the present building, then I should consider the site to be one of the best in England."

But the noble Lord had forgotten to state that when Sir Charles Barry was asked in 1857, whether he still continued to believe that the present site of the National Gallery was the best, he replied that he had modified that opinion, and that he considered the British Museum was the best site for the Gallery of Pictures. The question was, first of all, with regard to space. We had to house all the pictures, many of which were at present insufficiently housed. We had to bring into one collection the pictures now scattered about. But there were the national drawings, at this moment at the British Museum, and to dissociate which from the national pictures appeared to be a ridiculous solecism. The noble Lord had spoken of the determination evinced by the House of Commons, under Lord Derby's Administration, that the National Gallery should remain where it was and the Royal Academy be sent away; and he asked where was the further evidence to account for a change of opinion since that event. Well, since the Government of Lord Derby the subject had been under the consideration of a fresh Commission, and that Commission had recommended the removal of the Gallery to Burlington House. The Commission had also given it as their opinion that, even if the space now occupied by the Royal Academy were given up to the National Gallery, the remedy would be only temporary, as the pictures might be expected to outgrow in a few years the space available in the entire building. In a few years it would be necessary to obtain the ground occupied by the barracks, and the baths and wash-houses in the rear; and this would involve considerable practicable difficulty as well as expense. The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Tite) had been referred to by the noble Lord; but that hon. Member when examined before the Royal Commission said that, while retaining his opinion in favour of the existing site, he had re-considered the subject, and thought that it would cost half a million of money to place on it all that was necessary for the purposes of the National Gallery, while the Government scheme was estimated to cost no more than £152,000. Considering the cheering with which the noble Lord's speech was received, chiefly from below the gangway, it would seem that those vigilant guardians of the public purse had no scruple whatever in spending £500,000. ["No, no!"] He confessed he was not prepared to pay this sum to buy fresh ground, when, at that moment, they had got ground in two places, each fit for sites for our Galleries and Museums. They had bought ground at Burlington House, and they did not know what to do with it. They had bought ground at Kensington, and they were racking their imagination and brains to find out what to do with it. He wished that hon. Members would go to the National Gallery oftener in order to see the class of women by whom it was frequented. The visitors really appeared to him to consist of housemaids and soldiers. He had been there frequently himself, and so could bear personal testimony to the fact. The noble Lord had spoken of the accessibility of the present Gallery, but he regarded Burlington House as being also extremely central—it was one of the most acceptable places in the whole of London, and he did not believe that the public would be the slightest sufferers by the change. Considering that this was a matter in which action ought to be taken at once, and considering that the plan which the right hon. Gentleman proposed not only provided for the present pictures, but for future acquisitions, and considering that all this could be done for a comparatively small sum of money, he would most cordially support the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that one very strong recommendation of the present site of the National Gallery was that it formed a very fine space capable of enlargement, and made the building what a National Gallery in every other capital appeared, a conspicuous object. A heavy expense had been incurred in adjusting the square in front of it, and the building, though many hon. Gentlemen objected to the architecture, was, in his eye, plain, simple, and handsome; the portico, which was removed from Carlton House, being very beautiful. At the time the building was erected complaints were made that it wanted height; but if the dome and what were called the "pepper-boxes" were taken away, a very fine gallery might be constructed above the present rooms, and elevation would thus be given to the whole structure. The sum of £17,000, which was expended in altering the interior, was granted expressly on the condition that the building should permanently remain the National Gallery. The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works had said that the proposed new gallery would all be lighted from above; but it was a great mistake to have a picture gallery entirely lighted in that way. A large proportion of pictures were painted from a side light, and there ought to be a side light in portions of a National Gallery, in order that some pictures, and particularly cabinet pictures, might be viewed in the same light as they were painted in. The National Gallery was so favourably situated that an additional set of apartments erected on the top of the present would be completely placed above the thick atmosphere of London, which did not ascend above a certain height. True, there was a large chimney belonging to the Government waterworks at the back constantly belching out smoke; but that chimney was under the special charge of the right hon. Gentleman the Commissioner of Works, and, when an Act of Parliament had been passed to do away with smoke, it was disgraceful that so much smoke from that chimney was allowed to be sent forth. At Burlington

House the light would come entirely from two dark streets—Cork Street and Burlington Street. He believed that the cost of the present National Gallery, taking into account the money spent on the ornamentation of the square and for the purpose of making alterations in the gallery itself, amounted to upwards of £200,000, and he asked whether that expenditure was to be entirely lost, and the whole thing handed over to the Royal Academy. What would be the expense of the new gallery? The right hon. Gentleman confessed to £150,000, but that estimate was likely to be more than doubled in the end, and it was perfectly ludicrous to suppose that anything would be gained by beginning to construct a new National Gallery. He hoped the House would adhere to its previously-expressed opinion, and that the Government also would regard its promise, while for himself he should support the Motion of the noble Lord.

MR. COWPER said, that after the speech of the noble Lord he wished to make a few remarks in reply. In the first place, he thought the noble Lord did not agree with the hon. Member who spoke last in fervent admiration of the existing building. It was humiliating to the nation that its fine pictures should be placed in a building so unworthy of them. It was an ignoble, disjointed, mean, and petty building, and yet full of pretension. The exterior was unsatisfactory, and the internal arrangements were equally so. The rooms were too low for the proper lighting of the pictures and too small for the circulation of the visitors. It was wanting both in the dignity and the convenience of a national building. As the noble Lord knew, the gallery was not large enough to contain all the pictures that ought to be hung. If, however, it was possible to remain content with the present building, he would not propose to interfere with it; but when it was a question of building, it was proper to consider the right place and the right way of building. The suggestion of the noble Lord to run a light gallery over the barrack-yard was open to the objection that it would interfere with the light and air of the barracks, while the visitors to the gallery would be annoyed by the noises in the barrack-yard underneath them. The noble Lord's proposal would not prevent the large expenditure which had been alluded to, as although the gallery as constructed according to the noble Lord's proposal would contain all our pictures now banished to Kensington, yet a demand for enlargement would speedily arise, and then any addition would involve the expenditure of a very large sum of money. The scheme of the noble Lord would be inconvenient and unsatisfactory, and, if adopted, would deprive the country of an opportunity of obtaining the best gallery in Europe. He did not so much refer to the exterior, and they knew that in most galleries the internal arrangements had been sacrificed to the architectural demands of the exterior; yet he thought the scheme of placing a long gallery at right angles with the present building would produce a very ridiculous effect, contrasting the new and handsome elevation with the present low and mean building. There were no satisfactory picture galleries in France or Italy, and the only models for imitation were to be found at Dresden and Munich. But recent experience of galleries built for temporary purposes had taught us much, and in the Exhibition buildings at Dublin, Manchester, Paris, and at Kensington, they had seen galleries where pictures had been properly hung, and conveniently seen by multitudes of persons. For those Exhibitions the architects had thought only of placing the pictures and the free circulation of the visitors, and therefore they had been completely successful. All the advantages secured at those places could be secured in the new site; but the noble Lord's proposal was a retrograde step from which we could never recover. Before it had become clear that the existing gallery was insufficient for the national pictures, the Government did all in their power to make it as useful and convenient as possible. They covered over the central hall which, separating the National Gallery from the Royal Academy, was of no use and of no architectural beauty, and thus they obtained what was now the only good room in the building, and enabled the country to receive the Turner bequest without the risk of delay and without the expense of building. If the plan which he proposed were adopted, the new gallery would be erected at Burlington House, and then it would remain for Parliament and the Government to decide to what use the building in Trafalgar Square could be applied. Although he thought the national pictures required a building of greater dignity and better arrangement than the present National Gallery, yet he did not think that for exhibitions of modern pictures annually held these faults would be so marked. He thought, therefore, that it would be a good thing to hand the building over to the Royal Academy. He proposed that, not for the benefit of the Royal Academy, but for the benefit of the national pictures, which could be best provided for in a building expressly erected for the purpose at Burlington House. But no arrangement had been entered into with the Royal Academy. That would be a matter for further consideration. If the Royal Academy were allowed to possess that building—and it was very important that the annual exhibition of modern pictures should be in a place where they could be well seen, since crowds of people took the utmost interest in them, and there could be no doubt that exhibition promoted art—if the Royal Academy were to take possession of that building it would, of course, not be expected that they should have it without paying for it. There was one way in which they might pay for it—namely, if the opinion of those persons should prevail who greatly desired to see improvements of the facade of the National Gallery, the Royal Academy might be required to do that work. If, on the other hand, it was thought desirable that they should pay rent, the Royal Academy would be able to do so. And they should remember that the alternative proposition made by the late Government in 1857 did give gratuitously a site to the Royal Academy, and that site being about a quarter of the whole ground, which cost £140,000, what was proposed to be given to the Royal Academy would be worth £35,000 or £38,000. Whatever other arrangements should be made, he hoped the Committee would not lose the opportunity of getting a gallery which would be worthy of our pictures, and the internal arrangements of which would at least carry out this practical purpose—that the pictures should be seen. It should be remembered that there was a good deal of smoke around Trafalgar Square. Smoke was still found in the building, and was doing material damage to the pictures. Again, sufficient protection was not given from fire. If the pictures were burnt the loss would be irreparable. Modern pictures might be painted over again, but nothing could supply the place of the Old Masters. With reference to the question on the paper as to finding further accommodation for the University of London at Burlington House, he feared there was not much prospect of that without interfering with the accommodation required for other objects.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that if the noble Lord (Lord John Mannere) had remained a short time longer in office something would have been done in this matter. He could not assent to this Vote unless there should be some agreement come to between the Government and the Royal Academy. Six years ago the Royal Academy would have accepted the offer of the noble Lord to build their own gallery in Burlington Gardens, and if the Government had given them a site of the value just mentioned, that would have given a sufficient hold upon them to oblige them to come to any terms the House might have chosen to lay down. That arrangement was broken up; the Royal Commission did not appear to have advanced them at all, and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper) now came down with a scheme the only recommendation of which appeared to be that it was the very reverse of the scheme of the noble Lord. In his opinion the site of the National Gallery was the best site for the national pictures. The Royal Academy was a very popular exhibition for three months in the year, and wherever it might go the public would be sure to find it out, and visit the collection as readily as they did in its present situation. Nor did he see what claim they had to have the whole of the site handed over to them. The right hon. Gentleman attributed to the noble Lord a wish to build a gallery at right angles to the present building, reaching over the barrack square; but all the noble Lord said was, that there was every facility for obtaining increased accommodation if it was required. He, however, believed that there was sufficient accommodation in the building for the present collection, and that there would be for years to come.

LORD ELCHO said, that his vote on this subject would be solely dictated by an honest belief as to what would be for the real interest of art. His noble Friend thought it for the interest of art that the pictures should remain in Trafalgar Square, but in that he differed from him. He thought it would be for the interests of art that the pictures should be transferred to Burlington House. In 1856, when he brought forward the subject of a Royal Commission, he had a wild vision of all these fine works of art being collected together at Kensington Palace. That was a

Utopian scheme, and he no longer believed in it. The Commission of 1856 reported in favour of the retention of the pictures on the present site, but they qualified it so far that they said it should be sufficiently enlarged. He read the Report as mainly directed against the attempt to remove the pictures to Kensington Gore. The spirit of the Report was that the collection should be placed in a central situation; and when they considered how London was spreading on all sides, the difference between the centralness of Trafalgar Square and Burlington House was hardly worth mentioning. The subsequent Commission of Inquiry into the Royal Academy two years later reported last year. What was the conclusion with reference to the national pictures? That if they were prepared to make the additional accommodation at Trafalgar Square it would be well that the national collection should remain there; but, if they were to remain, they must be prepared to purchase the barracks and build others elsewhere. He believed the Chelsea barracks cost £250,000 and the site £100,000. His hon. Friend took a Utopian view, and wished to sweep away the barracks, the baths and wash-houses, and other buildings, and to erect a new National Gallery for the sake of the public. But there was not the slightest prospect of the Government proposing, or of that House sanctioning, in our day, any such scheme as that. If, indeed, they were willing to do that in the interest of the pictures, let them do it, and probably they would get as good a gallery as at Burlington House. But he did not believe they were prepared for such an expenditure. They would rather go on patching, cribbing a bit from the barracks here, and another bit there. When his noble Friend came to that part of his case, the House evidently felt that it was the weakest part, for the cheers which had previously greeted him then ceased. His noble Friend said all he proposed to do was to find space for the present collection; and when he came to speak of a provision for the future, it merely amounted to the covering over of a small portion of the barrack-yard. The alternatives which the House had really to look in the face were either a large expenditure for sweeping away the barracks and the workhouse, and then building on that site, or the adoption of the plan of the Government for transferring the collection to Burlington House. Under all the circumstances of the case he recommended the adoption of the practical and useful suggestion of the Government. The feeling among many hon. Members appeared to be, that the proposal of the Government was a job for the benefit of the Royal Academy. Now, no one would accuse him of an over-favourable disposition towards the Royal Academy, and he had always felt surprised that he should ever have had the honour of being invited to dine there, because on more than one occasion he had deemed it his duty to call attention to the defects in the administration and constitution of that body. But the House ought to dis sever the question of the accommodation for the national pictures from the question of the accommodation for the Royal Academy. Let them settle what was best for the national pictures, wholly irrespective of the Royal Academy. They would, he believed, do what was best for the national pictures if they adopted the proposal of the Government. Having done that, it would be left for the House next year to consider whether they should hand over the rest of the building to the Royal Academy, which was now in occupation of one part of it. If the Government were ever in a position to make that proposal, he hoped they would take care to exact from the Royal Academy such conditions for the interest of art as would justify the handing over of that portion of the building to it. Though the Royal Academy was nominally a private institution, it was essentially a public institution, or so far so, at least, that no private association of artists could compete with it—that it had a monopoly of art in this country. And it was the duty of the House of Commons so to regulate that monopoly in the interests of artists and of art that it would be a sound and rightly conducted national institution. It would not follow, if they transferred the national pictures to Burlington House, that therefore the building in Trafalgar Square should not be improved. One of the conditions to be imposed on the Royal Academy might be that it should spend on the present building the sum it proposed to expend elsewhere. What with the fountains, what with the statues to Havelock and Napier, with the Nelson column, and one thing or another, they had done what they could to disfigure the finest site in Europe. [An hon. MEMBER: The Lions.] Sir Edwin Landseer had been four years engaged upon these lions, and Baron Marochetti stated that Sir

Edwin Landseer daily worked harder on them than he did. ["Question!"] Let them not discourage a distinguished artist who was giving his time and skill for a mere trifle. ["Question!"] He had thought it might not be uninteresting to hon. Gentlemen to know from one who had seen Sir Edwin at work, that when completed these lions would gain for him a name as a sculptor of animals equal to that which he now possessed as a painter. In conclusion, he hoped that the Committee would not hastily reject a Vote which he was sure was one the Government had brought forward in the interest of art.

MR. AYRTON said, that if when the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Manners) made his clear and conclusive speech the House had been as full as it was now, the Government must have been induced to withdraw the Vote in deference to the general feeling. The noble Lord had shown that at the period when the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire announced to the House that the National Gallery was to remain where it was, the statement was received with unanimous satisfaction on both sides. The noble Viscount now at the head of the Government in 1860 fully accepted that announcement; and in asking for a Vote of £17,000, pledged himself that the National Gallery should remain where it was for the reception of the National pictures, and that an early arrangement should be made for the Royal Academy to quit the building. How was it that, in face of such statements, the question had remained in abeyance? It was on account of the ideas entertained by the managers of matters at Kensington, who, in one of their earliest Reports, claimed to have the National Gallery removed thither; and the influence of that illustrious body continued until the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire announced, simultaneously with his statement that the National Gallery should be devoted to the national pictures, that the Government had dissolved its partnership with the Kensington people. Why had the noble Viscount not kept his pledge? It was said there had been the Report of a Commission which had changed the current of opinion both in and out of the House. The noble Lord (Lord Elcho) did not seem accurately to recollect the transactions of his own Commission; for on the question of the site for a new National Gallery, they stated that they forbore, as being beyond their province, from giving any opinion. The views of the Commissioners, so far as they had entered into the question, were rather remarkable. Their idea was, that it was necessary to provide accommodation in the form of rooms for the Royal Academy, in order that the Government might be able to exercise what they thought a legitimate control over the Academy. They proposed that the Government should nominate certain lay Academicians, who were to have no knowledge of art, and who, in addition to the duties intrusted to them in the management of the Royal Academy itself, might be expected to render important services in Parliament and elsewhere. For example, they were to satisfy the natural curiosity of Members of either House with respect to the proceedings of the Academy, and they were to advise the Chief Commissioner and the Government upon all subjects relating to art, in order that such mistakes as had hitherto occurred might be avoided in future. Such was the purpose for which Parliament was now asked to make a present of £140,000, at least, to the Royal Academy. The evidence taken before the Commissioners threw a light upon the probable views of the lay Academicians, for he found the noble Lord (Lord Elcho), after stating that the site in Trafalgar Square was a fine one, asking whether, if they obtained possession of it, the Royal Academy would undertake to remove the unsightly things there; and, as he had not then fallen in love with the lions, which he had since seen, whether they would take away the Nelson Column among the rest. It thus appeared that for £140,000 Parliament was to buy the right to put lay members into the Royal Academy, that those distinguished gentlemen, with no professional knowledge of art, were to regulate all the proceedings of the Government and the Chief Commissioner in all matters of art; and, finally, that the Royal Academy were to be accommodated with rooms, on condition that they should remove the Nelson Column and all the rest of the monuments in Trafalgar Square, leaving the lions to the admiration of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire. He thought the House would pause before giving up a public site to a private body, especially since there was a large amount of public property behind the National Gallery, which, without the frontage, would be of no use at all. It was not true that the noble Lord the Member for Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) had proposed any particular scheme. What he had said was, that there was public property behind the National Gallery, and that the very persons paraded as authorities by the Government had themselves suggested plans which would be quite sufficient to provide for all the wants of the nation for many years, as far as the exhibition of pictures was concerned. But, besides that, the House had the pledge of the noble Viscount at the head of the Government—a pledge on the faith of which a large sum of money had been voted—that the National Gallery, if all devoted to the exhibition of pictures belonging to the nation, would itself be sufficient for many years to come. Moreover, it was to be remembered that Trafalgar Square was not a mere thoroughfare, but a point to which many great thoroughfares converged; omnibuses and cheap conveyances of every kind passed through it in hundreds, the great penny thoroughfare of the Thames came close up to it, and that in the immediate vicinity there was now a railway in communication with all parts of the kingdom. It was in all respects a locality in which a public institution like the National Gallery should be placed. What reason, he asked, was there that the nation should be driven from its own natural habitation in order that the Royal Academy, a mere visitor, might take possession of its property in perpetuity? He believed the Royal Academy was willing to accept the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks; and he was quite sure that, if allowed to erect its own building at its own cost, it would flourish more than if taken under the control of the Government, seduced into silence and acquiescence by a bribe of £140,000.

MR. FERRAND said, that much had been said in the interest of art—he wished to make a remark in the interest of the taxpayers. On Friday last the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had read a severe lecture to some hon. Members who ventured to suggest that justice should be done to certain naval officers at the expense of a few thousand pounds; and he called on the House to support him in resisting the Motion, and spoke of the suffering which a large portion of the taxpayers endured by reason of the imposts which he was obliged to levy from them. Now, however, the right hon. Gentleman, when a Vote of £150,000 was asked for, for the removal of the National Gallery from the site which a majority of hon. Members considered the best suited for it, sat in silence, and said not a word on behalf of those who would have to find the money. Why did he not lecture the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper) for proposing the present Vote? He (Mr. Ferrand) appealed to the financial reformers below the gangway, and reminded them that in a few months they must appear before the electors, and that their votes would be commented upon on the hustings; and that, if they supported the Government in this gross job, they would many of them find themselves at the bottom of the poll.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, the chief argument in favour of the Government proposal had been stated to be that of economy. Now, in 1848, Sir Charles Barry on being asked to give his opinion as to what could be done with the site in Trafalgar Square, prepared a plan which showed that the National Gallery might be so extended and improved as to afford six times the amount of accommodation now given to the national pictures and the Royal Academy combined. Sir Charles Barry had shown how by taking part of the site of the workhouse and a part of the barracks a gallery might be erected sufficient for the wants of a century to come. When a railway company could go to any quarter of London and build a large terminus, laying out in various ways the ground round about it, why should the Government alone be impotent to procure sufficient space for an important public institution? It was the Kensington Gore scheme which prevented the Report of the Committee of 1848 being acted upon. Anybody looking at the Reports of that Committee might see there was a practical course traced out which the Government had nothing to do but to follow with advantage to the country. On the ground of economy he supported the proposition of the noble Lord opposite.

MR. WALTER said, he had not the honour of being acquainted with a single member of the Royal Academy, and had not to acknowledge even the compliment which was paid to his noble Friend (Lord Elcho), so much, it seemed, to his surprise. He looked at this question as simply one of fact, which any hon. Member could decide for himself from his own observation, and without reading the Report of the Commission. The fact was that we had two great institutions side by side—the National Gallery and the Royal Academy. They were both under the same roof, and the building had become so crowded that they were elbowing each other, and one of them must be turned out. The question was, which of the two should be ejected. That was a matter, it seemed to him, which ought to be decided by the degree of popularity which one of these institutions had obtained over the other. He himself was a lover of the Old Masters, and could not, therefore, be supposed to speak with any prejudice in favour of the works of their modern rivals. He was bound, however, to say—and anyone who had looked into the case would corroborate it—that of the two institutions the Royal Academy enjoyed by far the larger share of popularity. He would venture, were it Parliamentary, to make a bet that for one person who went to see the Old Masters fifty at least went to see the exhibition of the Royal Academy. ["No!"] He had no hesitation in asserting that as a fact, and he appealed to anybody who had the means of getting at the statistics to confirm it. He did not put this forward as an evidence of good taste; in his judgment, it showed a want of taste—he mentioned it merely as a fact. It required a different kind of education from that which the public usually received to appreciate the Old Masters, and there were other reasons which accounted for the preference popularly accorded to modern paintings. People had friends among the living artists, and there was a greater demand for their works. He might use the very argument of his hon. Friend behind him, as to the advantage of a central situation like Trafalgar Square, and its great accessibility by the river and the railway, in support of his case. If it were true that the Royal Academy was more frequented than the National Gallery, then they ought to afford to the public greater facilities for visiting it. He did not regard this as a question of public expense. He had no doubt there was about the same economy in the one view as in the other; but he looked at the matter as one of public convenience; and discarding a good deal of prejudice which he must own he had once entertained, he held that, in the interest of the public, it was better that the arrangement now proposed should be carried out than that the Royal Academy should be turned away.

Mr. Ferrand

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I wish, in the first place, to explain the change of opinion to which reference has been made. Undoubtedly, in 1860—I think it was—I adopted the decision of the late Government, that the National Gallery was to remain in Trafalgar Square, and that the Royal Academy was to have assigned to it a portion of the ground in Burlington House Gardens, close to Piccadilly, where it might erect a suitable edifice for its own purposes. Subsequent considerations, however, have induced me to alter that view, and I now think that, on the whole, the arrangement which we propose would be best—namely, that the National Gallery should be built on the ground to the rear of Burlington House, and that the Royal Academy should, under certain conditions, have the use, not the possession, of the building in Trafalgar Square. Now, this is really not a party question. We ought all of us to have the same object at heart, and that is, first, to provide a proper receptacle for the collection of ancient pictures which we now possess, and next, to promote the display of modern art and the education of the artist, so that the public may know from year to year what the progress of art is in this country. With regard to the latter aim, I must say that it seems to me to have been entirely lost sight of in the discussion of this evening. And yet it lies at the root of the whole system of a National Gallery. For what purpose is a nation to have a collection of admirable pictures? They are intended not simply for the gratification of those who go to look at them, but to serve as a means of instruction in the formation of a great and distinguished school of national art. That is the main object of a National Gallery; and it should be combined with a Royal Academy which shall afford the means of instruction to those who had devoted themselves to this profession, and of exhibition to those whose pictures are deemed worthy of display. With regard to the National Gallery, we have more pictures than the present building can contain, and we want additional accommodation. The question is, how to obtain that accommodation at the least expense. The noble Lord (Lord J. Manners) proposes a scheme which would inevitably lead to great expense—it is, that we should enlarge the present building in Trafalgar Square. In order, however, to make such an enlargement as would suffice for the pictures we now possess and those we are likely to obtain, we cannot proceed on the make-shift plan of constructing a gallery set upon iron pillars at the back of the present building. In order to make the gallery answer the purpose it would be necessary to take the barrack yard, to buy the workhouse and the other buildings connected with it; and, to satisfy those who look at the matter with a critical eye, the front of the present building would also have to be altered. That would necessarily involve very great expense; and when the hon. Member for Plymouth (Mr. Ferrand) calls on the Gentlemen below the gangway to recollect that they will have to render an account to their constituencies within a limited period of time, I may use the same argument to induce them to vote for that plan which will produce the best accommodation with the least charge on the public revenue. A good gallery for the exhibition of pictures requires peculiar internal arrangements, and provision must be made for these. Within the ground at Burlington Gardens we can obtain a suitable receptacle for our pictures, ample in accommodation, and satisfactory in regard to the means of displaying them, and we can get this at a less expense than that at which we could procure the same accommodation at the other place. By one plan you will get excellent accommodation at a small cost; by the other you will be led into an enormous expenditure, the amount of which I defy any man precisely to limit; and when it has been incurred you will not have the same advantages for exhibiting your pictures. I do hope, therefore, that this House, which prides itself on its economy, and which often spends hours in discussing very minute sums in the different Estimates, will not, by acceding to the Motion of the noble Lord, lay the foundation for an immense expenditure, but will adopt the more economical and efficient scheme proposed by my right hon. Friend.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Before the Committee goes to a division I hope it will seriously consider the position in which it is placed by the speech just delivered by the noble Lord. I well remember, on an evening when the House was remarkably thin, when there were barely forty Members in it, that the noble Lord induced those forty Members to pass a Vote of £17,000 for the enlargement of the Gallery in Trafalgar Square precisely for the reason that he had made up his mind that Trafalgar Square should form the site for the permanent gallery for the receipt of the national collection. At that time the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works—I was going to call him the First Commissioner for Taste—I beg his pardon—had not discovered that these domes were only fit for a suburban villa; he had not discovered that these rooms were narrow, disjointed, petty, and dusty; but he told us that if that £17,000 was laid out on this building it would make it everything which could be wished; and, moreover, that it would adapt it singularly for a permanent National Gallery. To-night, however, the right hon. Gentleman has not only made these discoveries, but he has actually succeeded in doing that which is still more wonderful—he has converted his noble relative; and now the noble Lord having whiled that £17,000 from our pockets, comes down and says, “I have since seen reason to alter my opinion—you must lay out £150,000 on this Burlington House scheme.” Really, if I had not had an answer ready to my hand—an answer, too, from the noble Lord’s own Chancellor of the Exchequer—I should not have troubled the Committee this evening. My hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) had been twitting the Government for their large expenditure on Burlington House, and this is what the Chancellor of the Exchequer says in reply—and it is certainly very curious, that this speech has been allowed to stand without a preface. The hon. Gentleman said—

“He regretted as much as the hon. Member could do that such long periods should elapse before any conclusion could be arrived at as to the disposal of buildings of that kind, the price of which had been paid and which entailed a large annual charge for interest. He had no hesitation in saying that this and other circumstances of a like kind were entirely owing to the lamentable and deplorable state of our whole arrangement with regard to the management of our public works.”

Then he goes on to explain the cause of this very much as I should do myself, and it really seems as if the right hon. Gentleman had foreseen the speech which the First Lord of the Treasury has made to-night—

“Vacillation, uncertainty, costliness, extravagance, meanness, and all the conflicting vices that could be enumerated, were united in our present system. There was a total want of authority to direct and guide.”

Mr. Bernal Osborne

And he concludes in these words—words which I should have been afraid to utter myself, and which certainly seem to require a special preface all to themselves—

“He believed such were the evils of the system that nothing short of a revolutionary reform would ever be sufficient to rectify it.”

In the face of declarations such as these, in the face of vacillations such as I have described, not only on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, but of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, who has told us to-night that he got that £17,000 not exactly on false pretences, but from not having properly looked into the matter, is the House prepared to vote this estimate of £150,000? Recollect what has been the cost of this wretched place we are sitting in—£750,000 was the original estimate; £3,000,000 has been the cost. The House of Commons will be wanting in its duty to the country if, in spite of the speech of the noble Lord—who, however well fitted to lead us in foreign affairs, is a very bad leader on anything connected with economy—it does not refuse to enter on this expenditure; and I call on those who have any feeling for the public purse to support the Motion of the noble Lord late First Commissioner of Works.

Motion made, and Question put,

“That a sum, not exceeding £10,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1865, for the erection of the New National Gallery at Burlington House.”

(2.) £39,147, to complete the sum for the Treasury.

(4.) £53,015, to complete the sum for the Foreign Office.

Mr. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would take that occasion to ask for some explanation in respect to the despatches written by and received at the office of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He thought that some distinguishing mark should be placed upon the despatches published in the blue-book, in order to show which of them were communicated by telegram, and which had been written in the ordinary way. He must complain of the off-hand and uncereceremonious manner in which he had been answered by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs when he asked for information on the subject. That hon. Gentleman, in the absence of the noble Viscount, had replied to him in a manner more worthy of the senior partner of the firm of Quirk, Gammon and Snap, than of an official whose duty it was to furnish such information as was required by that House from the Department which he represented. The privilege of asking questions was one of the most important they possessed, and he (Mr. Darby Griffith) would never allow it to suffer injury or prejudice in his humble hands.

MR. LAYARD said, that he could only repeat the explanations he had given upon that subject on former occasions. A large portion of the Government correspondence was at present conducted through the electric telegraph. The despatches were sent in cipher, and the answers to them were communicated in the same form. The Government afterwards published the substance of them, although in different language. The objection to marking despatches sent in cipher with an indication that it had been so sent was that by that means materials would be furnished by which ingenious persons so disposed might obtain a key to the cipher used.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that he was not satisfied with the explanation. He looked upon this as a mere piece of official obstinacy and red-tapism.

(5.) 23,421, to complete the sum for the Colonial Office.

(6.) £17,306, to complete the sum for the Privy Council Office.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH asked for some explanation of an item of £10,600 charged for Contingent Expenses.

MR. PEEL stated that this sum was required to defray the expenditure of the Privy Council Office under the Public Health Act. £3,000 was annually placed at the disposal of the Privy Council to pay medical and other officers who were from time to time deputed to conduct inquiries and experiments; £2,000 was for the national vaccine establishment; £2,000 for vaccination inspection, and the remaining £3,600 was a matter of account arising from the medical department of the Privy Council having been unaware of the rule that payments should only be made out of the Votes for the current year.

SIR JERVOISE JERVOISE, in reference to the charge for expenses connected with the inspection of sheep to prevent the spread of disease, desired to call attention to the fifth Report of the medical officer, ordered to be printed on the 14th of April. He believed it was the desire of the medical officer that the Report should be of great benefit to the country, and he had no doubt the effect of the appointment would be to correct some of the fallacies of the faculty; but, on the other hand, he thought the contents of the Report were enough to raise a panic in the country. Every fifth animal, and by consequence every fifth mutton chop, was stated to be diseased, while there was not only death in the pot but in the pail. The total loss by preventible diseases in cattle was estimated at £6,000,000 yearly. He wished to know who was to be held responsible for such statements, inasmuch as the medical officer who had despatched eminent veterinary surgeons on commissions of inquiry, not only through this country but abroad, disconnected himself in a note at the end of his Report from the opinions put forward by them. The Report stated that much of the epidemic disease was attributable to foreign origin; but if they referred to the Customs Report they would find that the medical officers of that Department stated that in the year when the small-pox broke out amongst the sheep in Wiltshire that not a single sheep entered into London suffering from that disease. On the Continent 2½ per cent covered the losses of the Cattle Insurance Offices, but in this country the Cattle Insurance Offices had to be wound up in consequence of the cattle dying so fast. He was anxious to know how the Inspector and his assistants were paid.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, the Secretary to the Treasury had already explained the source from which those gentlemen were paid. He did not exactly understand what it was the hon. Gentleman complained of in the Report. He appeared to admit the great ability of the Report generally, but he took exception to Professor Gamgee's Report on cattle diseases in general, who was engaged under the direction of the Inspector to make that Report. There was great doubt as to the origin and extent of the diseases of cattle, and a Select Committee was investigating the subject, and the Inspector had gone into it in such a manner as the great interests of the country demanded. The hon. Gentleman seemed to object to the Vote on account of the discrepancy between the Reports; but, considering the difference of opinion that prevailed on the subject, he did not see how they could require two medical officers to agree before they were paid.

LORD ELCHO said, that before the Chairman reported Progress, he wished to express a hope with regard to the Vote for the National Gallery. The Committee having rejected the Vote of £150,000 for a new National Gallery in one of its economical fits ["No!"]—well, then, in one of its uneconomical fits ["Oh!"]—he wished to know what course the Government intended to take. The feeling of the Committee appeared to be in favour of retaining the National Gallery in its present site, but any person who had attended to the discussion must have come to the conclusion that the House of Commons desired to have a building in every way worthy of the nation. If not, there was no meaning in the Vote the Committee had come to. Now, he found by a letter to the Treasury, written by Sir Benjamin Hall some years ago, that the estimate of Mr. Hunt, the Surveyor of Public Buildings, for enlarging and improving the National Gallery—an estimate demanded by the Treasury a few years ago—was £500,000; and he wished to know whether, before the Session closed, the Government would be prepared to ask the House for a Vote towards the erection of the new National Gallery, which the Committee wished to occupy the site of the present building. ["No!"] If this was not the wish of the Committee, it had only stultified itself by its Vote that night. He would not press for an answer to his question at that moment, but he would express a hope that the Government would take the matter into consideration.

MR. SCLATER-BOTH said, that the noble Lord had assumed a great deal in the interpretation he had put upon the Vote. The House of Commons had simply rejected the scheme of the Government, and had expressed no opinion with regard to a building worthy of the nation. They had expressed no wish that a new National Gallery should be built in Trafalgar Square, but the feeling rather was that a very moderate extension of the present building would be sufficient. What the Committee wanted was to get rid of the Royal Academy. That body had plenty of money, and could afford to build itself a gallery.

MR. HIBBERT wished to know whether the Government would, in consequence of the Vote come to that night, take any steps to make the whole of the National Gallery available for the purposes of the national pictures?

RAILWAYS CONSTRUCTION FACILITIES (Re-committed) BILL [BILL 111].

COMMITTEE.

MR. HASSARD said, this Bill was applicable only to railway companies, and he could not see any reason why it should not be equally applicable to gas and water companies, many of which would be established in small places if they could get an Act of incorporation or an Act of Parliament without going to an enormous expense. In some cases the capital required would not exceed £1,500 or £2,000, while the expense of obtaining an Act would be about £500.

MR. MILNER GIBSON observed, that the Committee did not clearly see their way to laying down any general conditions applicable to all works, and had, therefore, refrained from making any recommendation on the subject.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD pointed out that, under the 3rd clause, powers were given to companies to make railways where there was no opposition; and under the 9th clause limit was imposed to the opposition. This latter clause he objected to, for there was no power of opposition, in case of consent of all the landowners on the line, by any party other than a railway or canal company, although damage might be done to parties whose land was not scheduled. He would not, however, object to the Bill going into Committee.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that landowners under this Bill were in a better position than they would be under a Private Bill. All persons whose lands were touched by the proposed works must not only have given their consent, but the agreement between the purchaser and landowner must be produced before the Board of Trade before the certificate could undergo consideration. If the House would allow the Bill to go into Committee it would find that all the cases referred to were properly provided for.

Bill considered in Committee.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Thursday.

WEIGHING OF GRAIN (PORT OF LONDON) BILL—[BILL 119.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CRAWFORD moved the second reading of the Bill. The City of London possessed by prescription and by charter from James I. the right of measuring all grain brought within the port of London. It was proposed by this Bill that this privilege should be commuted for a charge upon the weight of the grain, the result of which would be that Mansion House charges amounting to £2,000 a year would be relinquished. The grain according to the proposal made would be weighed for 25 per cent less than the sum now charged upon the measurement. The Corporation would relinquish a sum of £5,000 per annum. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) had given notice that inasmuch as the Bill seeks to impose a Tax, in part for the private use and benefit of the Corporation and for no public purpose, on all grain imported into the port of London, the Bill ought not to be proceeded with until the Standing Orders relating to Private Bills had been complied with. This was entirely erroneous. The Bill had the assent of the trade, the assent of the chairman of the Corn Exchange, and of the chairman of a public meeting held for taking the matter into consideration. It was not for the private use of the Corporation of London; the Corporation had no private interests, but applied its revenues for the public good. The Bill was not solicited by the Corporation after the manner of Private Bills, but was a necessary supplement to the Inland Revenue Bill of the year. The whole of the trade of London was affected by its provisions, and it had the same rights and affected the same interests as the many Acts relating to London which had been brought in as Public Bills.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR JOHN SHELLEY moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. AYRTON protested against entering upon the Bill at two o'clock in the morning. Hon. Members were not to sit there to aid the Corporation in levying taxes to enable them to give dinners. He would not prolong the discussion, but would call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that there were not forty Members present.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—
(Sir John Shelley.)

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

SECOND READING.

LORD WODEHOUSE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that its object was to remedy certain defects of detail in a measure passed in the year 1862 for the purpose of insuring a more accurate assessment to local rates. That measure had in general worked satisfactorily, but it appeared that alterations were required in some of its provisions. It did not give the Assessment Committees the power of appearing in appeals against their own decisions, and magistrates were thus compelled to decide upon these appeals without hearing the arguments upon both sides.

The present Bill would remedy that defect by providing that the Assessment Committees should have an opportunity of defending, with the consent of the Board of Guardians, decisions at which they had previously arrived. It would also provide that justices should not be disqualified from sitting in quarter sessions on any appeal, by reason of their being rated in some other parish of the union than that by which the appeal was brought. These were the principal provisions of the measure, the details of which could be best considered in Committee.

(Lord Wedehouse.)

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, that he did not object to some provision being made for supporting assessments on appeal, but no court in England had the power of appearing in defence of its own decisions as was now proposed, and he thought, therefore, that some other means should be adopted of enabling the magistrates to hear both sides in these cases.

Motion agreed to : Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

BILL—(No. 66.)

Order of the Day for the House to go into Committee read.—(The Lord President.)

LORD BROUGHAM said, he did not object to going into Committee; on the contrary, he highly approved of the Bill, and of one provision especially, which he found the Government intended to give up—the supervision of ticket-of-leave men between their liberation and the expiration of their sentence. This supervision was absolutely necessary for the safety of the community, and for the good of the convicts themselves. The ticket-of-leave was granted as a reward of good conduct, and a stimulus to further reform; and as their real struggle only commenced when they returned to the scene of temptation, it was in vain to suppose them fit for mixing in society on their release. The system of supervision under Sir Walter Crofton, to whom the country owed so much, had proved most successful in Ireland. Of this he could speak confidently; for at the Congress of Social Science three years ago in Dublin, Sir Walter Crofton's operations had been fully examined by his (Lord Brougham's) colleagues, and found to be in all respects admirable and perfectly successful. 160 convicts were superintended by no more than two policemen, and with complete success. Among those who examined this was his learned friend and great philanthropist, the Recorder of Birmingham, Mr. Hill, head of a family to whom the country, and especially the working class, were under such obligations—one of the family, Sir Rowland, having yesterday been the subject of a Royal message. Mr. Hill, from many years' experience, decidedly considered the return of convicts to the community without supervision and warning to their employers to be of undoubted inexpediency and of questionable honesty. He would read a passage from a letter he had received from that experienced magistrate, who, after stating his opinion of supervision, adds—

“I should, however, pause before pronouncing such opinions, if I believed supervision to be detrimental to the ex-convict who had determined to return to paths of honesty and continue in them. But I am well convinced to the contrary—namely, that supervision has to the honest man many advantages with few or no drawbacks; and as to the persecution of well-intended persons by the police, which has been alleged, I have made this the object of inquiry for years, and believe the charge groundless; and that the rule, with no exception, is precisely the reverse.”

In fact, the convict has the advantage, besides his being kept to his duties, of receiving the support of his superintendent by the testimony to his character, which will weigh strongly with any employers. On the whole, therefore, he (Lord Brougham) felt most anxiously that the Irish system which had so completely succeeded, should be adopted in this country—all the difference, if any, between the character of the people in the two countries, being rather an argument in favour of the extension, as showing the supervision to be more difficult there than here. He should, therefore, earnestly entreat the House to reject the Amendment of which notice had been given, to omit the fourth or supervision clause.

LORD LYTTLETON said, he approved both of what the Government had done and what they had refused to do, with regard to sending convicts to Australia. With the undoubted fact that the Australian colonies generally objected to receive our convicts, he thought we were bound to respect their wishes; but, at the same time, it was unreasonable and unjust for the South Australian colonies to object to convicts being sent to Western Australia, where the colonists were very desirous of receiving them. He hoped the Government would adhere to the course they had adopted, and would not allow memorials from the more powerful Australian colonies to override their judgment.

House in Committee:

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Length of Sentences of Penal Servitude).

EARL GREY moved an Amendment that criminals, after two previous convictions, should be subject to a minimum imprisonment of seven years. He thought it perfectly absurd that where a criminal had been convicted some fifteen times he should only be sentenced to three years' imprisonment.

Amendment moved at the end of clause to add the following words:—

"And if Two previous Convictions of Felony, including summary Convictions under the Criminal Justice Act, shall be proved against a Prisoner found guilty of an Offence now punishable by Penal Servitude, he shall be liable to Penal Servitude for Seven Years, and this shall be the least Sentence that can be passed upon him."

EARL GRANVILLE thought the Amendment was undesirable, and that it would be better to leave the punishment in the cases referred to to be apportioned by the Judges, as was the case at present.

EARL GREY said, that was true; but they had exercised that discretion so leniently that it had become necessary that Parliament should interfere and prescribe a minimum of punishment. He had seen cases where criminals had been convicted fifteen times, and then a sentence of only three years' penal servitude was passed. That was a perfect mockery.

LORD CRANWORTH supported the Amendment, believing that to a man thrice convicted of felony it would be a mercy to sentence him to a long period of imprisonment, under circumstances best calculated to induce a reformed course of life. He suggested that the Amendment should be postponed till the Report, in order that the phraseology might be assimilated to the law as it now stood with reference to a second conviction.

Amendment agreed to: Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Punishment of Offences in Convict Prisons) agreed to.

Clause 4 (Forfeiture of Licence).

LORD HOUGHTON moved an Amendment to omit certain words, the effect of which omission would be to do away with the proposed system of registration of criminals by the police. He thought the clause generally was very loosely drawn, and contained phrases hardly of ordinary legal import—the word "locality" he thought was one for the first time proposed to be introduced into an Act of Parliament. The ground of his asking their Lordships to reject these words was, because he thought the principle a bad one in itself, and especially bad in its application to the present Bill. He thought it bad, because it had always been the happy privilege of this country to use the police force for the purposes of subserving the law, of preserving the peace of society, and of detecting crime. They had never yet invested the police of this country with the powers which it was proposed to give them by this Bill. To make it a misdemeanor for a discharged criminal not to report himself to the police was a regulation far better adapted to the police system of other countries than of our own. But this feeling must give way if the peace of society required such a deviation from our usual habits. But, he asked, would the object which they had in view, namely, the return of the criminal to an honest life, be facilitated by such a regulation as this? If there was anything they desired to secure more than another, it was to remove the man as far as possible from the restraints of prison life, if he showed himself worthy to be removed from them. The object was to send him into society as free as possible from the evil he had done, and that in no fantastic or sentimental sense, but simply that he might learn the maxim that honesty is the best policy. It had been said that this system worked well in Ireland. But would it be possible to do the system of Sir Walter Crofton any greater injury than by making a partial and inappropriate application of it to England? He would endeavour to show by one single figure what was the influence of police registration upon discharged prisoners in the neighbourhood of London. The Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society had for several years aided discharged prisoners to emigrate. In the year 1861 they aided 769 such persons. But when the system of registration was introduced, a falling off took place in this number. In 1862 they succeeded in assisting only 689, in 1863 only 451, and in half of the present year only 165 persons. So that their Lordships would see that the effect of this police supervision was that from 150 to 200 discharged prisoners were now at large, who, but for this supervision, would have been assisted to emigrate by the society. He earnestly wished the words to which he objected to be excluded from the clause. He looked upon the measure as an experiment, which deserved to be fairly tried. He only asked that it should be fairly tried, by assisting the criminal to re-submit himself to the action of the laws, instead of by embarrassing him.

Moved, to leave out from ("therein") to ("or") in line 38.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON hoped the House would not consent to the Amendment. He was quite unable to understand what his noble Friend proposed to substitute. Were they to give the criminal a free and unconditional remission, or a remission accompanied by supervision, or a remission under a mere nominal supervision? A real supervision was intelligible, but his noble Friend took the supervision in part, and rejected a part. He wanted to have all the benefits of supervision without its inconveniences. If the Amendment passed, all that the public would have to depend upon, as far as the security of life and property was concerned, would be the changes recently effected in the discipline of prisons upon the sole authority of the Secretary of State, which changes had been made hastily, and might be recalled to-morrow; and when that took place things would exactly remain where they had been before. That would, he thought, be the most unfortunate result to which they could come after the numberless discussions they had had on this subject. The objections of his noble Friend to the clause resolved themselves into the single allegation that the police would be disposed to interfere with ticket-of-leave holders in their attempts to get employment. His noble Friend argued as if they were about to infringe upon the liberty of the subject; but he must distinctly protest against the doctrine that these convicts had a right to liberty. They had forfeited it by their crimes against the laws, and when they were released it was only by an act of grace or favour, which it was for the State to accompany with such restrictions as it thought fit to impose. The statement about the police preventing these persons from getting honest employment rested, it should be borne in mind, entirely on the story which some half dozen or dozen ticket-of-leave holders had told on their re-commitment for another crime. But he did not deny that there might not be some isolated cases of that kind. The police were a mixed body, like any other, and doubtless comprised some men who would occasionally abuse their power; but he maintained that in 99 cases out of 100 the abuse, when it actually took place, occurred, not from a system of supervision, but rather from the want of such a system. A policeman would suspect a man to be a ticket-of-leave holder, who was relapsing into crime, and he accordingly dogged his steps. It was impossible to distinguish an habitual offender from an occasional offender without a system of registration; and how were they to have a system of registration without the agency of the police? Turn the question how they would, they must always come back to the necessity of a regular machinery for a proper police supervision. It was far better to have an open and actual control and supervision than a secret one; and the way to get rid of the evils of an irregular and objectionable espionage was to establish a regular system of responsible police supervision. One of the objects which ought to be kept in view was that a distinction should be drawn between habitual and casual criminals, but how could that possibly be effected except by some system of registration. They must not, in the midst of all their abstract reasoning on this question, forget the plain fact that the system existing in Ireland, and which undoubtedly had worked successfully, was based on a strict police supervision; and it should, moreover, be remembered that in Ireland there had not been one instance of complaint against the police for abusing their powers in this matter. So long as the man was in prison he was free from temptation, but the moment he came out he was thrown back on himself, and the strength of his old habits was likely to influence him. The Discharged Prisoners' Aid Society had proved itself very useful in receiving prisoners on their discharge from prison, and many of them who had been benefited by it, had been convicted five, six, or eight times.

LORD CRANWORTH said, that he feared that their Lordships might be influenced in their views by a too liberal construction of the words of the clause. Many noble Lords in reading the clause in its present state thought they might be supporting the system of supervision by the police. He had no sympathy with those who advanced the argument, that to require a convict to place himself under supervision would interfere with the rights and liberties of the subject. The matter properly to be considered was, what system would answer best for the public. It was proposed that the convict should once every month report himself at the police station near his residence; but what security was there in this for his good conduct? And the very condition would prove an obstacle against his getting employment, but it would be no advantage to society. He could not leave his employer and report himself to the police without coming under the notice not only of his employer, but of his fellow-workmen, and there was not an honest man but would object to be associated with convicts. The condition that he must report himself in London—the nest of rogues—would, perhaps, be complied with by his coming before Sir Richard Mayne; but this would be no guarantee. Under any circumstances, if a released convict violated any of the conditions of his ticket-of-leave, he would be sure to be pulled up by the police, whether he reported himself monthly at a station or not, and the provision in the clause under discussion, while it did not pretend to do any good, might, in reality, do a great deal of harm. In Dublin, or the metropolitan district of Ireland, to which so much allusion had been made, the police had never been employed to supervise released prisoners; and when the Commissioners recommended, not without hesitation, that it might be expedient to try the Irish system in England, they did not mean that there should be what had been absurdly called police supervision, which would give no security at all; but that the work ought to be done through the agency of an office connected with the convict establishment, and employing proper officials for the purpose. This was the plan really adopted in Ireland. It was of the very essence of useful supervision that it should be unconnected with the police.

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD agreed that the clause as it stood would afford no additional security whatever to the public; and it was contrary to the experience of those most familiar with the question. The mere fact of a man reporting himself to the police once a month was no guarantee as to what he was doing during the rest of the time. Indeed, such was the cunning of habitual offenders, that he had no doubt when one was going to commit a crime he would take care to report himself beforehand, by way of keeping up appearances. On the other hand, he was satisfied that the system proposed would be very injurious to convicts who were anxious to obtain honest employment, because it would tend to attach to them a bad character in the eyes both of employers and fellow-workmen. Reference had been made to the Irish system, but he believed that under it there was a large number of re-convictions—as large a proportion as of those who had been in the English convict prisons. In any case, it would be quite inoperative in the large towns of this country. No attempt had been made to enforce it in Dublin, and Sir Walter Crofton had owned that, even if attempted there, it would not be efficient. At the same time, he was most anxious to see a system of supervision conducted either by the convict department or through the agency of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies.

LORD LYVEDEN said, the clause had been inserted by the House of Commons, and he thought it one of the best portions of the Bill. A man who had broken the laws of his country was not entitled to the ordinary freedom of the subject, and he believed that the monthly Report would prove a constant check upon the ticket-of-leave men. He thought the masters were not unwilling to take them into their service; when they were detected by their fellow servants they were sent adrift. There was no doubt that there was a great difficulty about the matter.

EARL GREY said, that the majority of prisoners being discharged in this country, it was important to consider what was the best mode of subjecting them to such supervision as was necessary to insure the enforcing of the conditions of the licence. The noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) seemed to think that the Bill would leave things as they were, but that was a mistake. As the law stood, if a ticket-of-leave man committed a second offence, and was sentenced to six months' imprisonment, the term ran on simultaneously with his old sentence; but by this Bill he would be required to work the new sentence out when the old one had expired. At present there was no power of taking up a man suspected of being a ticket-of-leave man; and there were no means of formal investigation as to whether the conditions of the ticket-of-leave had been broken. By this Bill the breaking of the conditions of the ticket-of-leave became a substantive offence; and the charge would come before the magistrates and be formally adjudicated upon. It was true that there was an objection to requiring a man to appear once a month before the police; for if this regulation were enforced it would be impossible that his fellow workmen should not know of it; and when the fact became known it was fatal to his hopes of continuing his employment. On this ground the system had to be given up in Ireland. In laying down a number of regulations he thought that Parliament was stepping out of its proper place, and that it was not right to tie up the discretion of the Government in this way. The Government should be held strictly responsible; but, on the other hand, discretion should be left to them as to the measures they would adopt to attain the end. He should be disposed to strike out all the conditions mentioned in Schedule A of the Bill; for, if this were not done, it would be impossible for the Government to vary or improve them in any instance. It should be observed, in Dublin the supervision over convicts was not exercised by the police, but by a gentleman specially appointed for that work. In the rest of Ireland the system existed, but the fact that the supervision was not carried out in Dublin, showed that it was not considered practicable in large towns. He believed that the supervision of convicts in Western Australia was extremely good; but he had been informed by Colonel Henderson, who had the charge of penal discipline in that colony, that the rule requiring the convicts to call upon the police once a month, worked so badly that it had to be abandoned. He should support the Amendment, although he thought that it might have gone further.

LOUIS PORTMAN supported the Amendment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he did not thoroughly agree with either of his noble Friends. If a licence-holder were required to report himself once a month, it would be the same as if he were sent out of prison with a brand on the forehead: but, at the same time, it was impossible to deny that some authority should have the power of noting where each one of these criminals was, and that they should be placed under some influence that should keep them under the impression that they were the objects of watchful superintendence. His wish was rather to modify the conditions of the licence, which were very vague and uncertain; and he knew not who was to be the judge whether they were broken or not. One was that the man should not lead an idle or a dissolute life—another was that he should not habitually associate with notoriously bad characters. What magistrate was to be intrusted with the power of deciding upon such offences? He proposed to strike out the words "once in each month," and insert the words "if required so to do by the conditions of the licence." The position of the licence-holder would then be this—that having once reported himself to the police, he would not be subject to report himself again unless required so to do, at such time and place, in such manner, and to such persons as the chief officer of police should from time to time point out. In this way the supervision might be modified according to circumstances, and might be so managed as to prevent the disclosure of the man's condition to his associates and fellow-workmen, and might be carried into effect so as not to interfere with the recovery of his character and social position. As to the Amendment, he suggested the withdrawal of that part of it which seemed to strike out of the Bill the words "or shall have changed his residence without having previously notified the same to the police."

EARL GREY thought that the Amendment now proposed was hardly necessary, if they adopted the suggestion to leave the conditions of the licence to be settled by the Government.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that if he understood the suggestion of the noble and learned Earl it would be necessary that there should be different conditions to each separate licence; and that whether a convict should report himself or not should be left to the Secretary of State in each case. The clause was one which it was difficult to deal with without notice, and therefore he suggested that it should be accepted in Committee, and that the noble and learned Lord's Amendment should be printed and considered upon the Report.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he did not understand his noble and learned Friend to favour the principle of the clause, which was the obligation of these licence-holders to report themselves once a month to the police.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR agreed that it would be better to reserve the consideration of his Amendment. As to the principle of the clause, he had explained that, in his opinion, this obligation to report once a month was equivalent to branding a man with a stigma.

After a few words from The Earl of HARROWBY,

LORD HOUGHTON said, he was willing to modify his Amendment in such a way as that the necessity for the ticket-of-leave man to report himself every month should be done away with; but leaving him still under the obligation of informing the police of any change in his place of residence.

On Question, That the words proposed to be left out stand Part of the Clause? their Lordships divided:—Contents, 49; Not-Contents 41: Majority 8.

ADMIRALTY LANDS AND WORKS BILL—(No. 88.)—COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 14 (Exception from Incorporation of Provisions as to Sale of Superfluous Lands).

THE EARL OF POWIS moved to omit certain words which gave to the Admiralty power to sell surplus lands to others than the original owners. The power of selling surplus lands was of recent date, and he thought the Admiralty ought not to possess a power which might be exercised to the injury of individuals. If the Admiralty happened to buy land for the purpose of erecting defences or making docks, and afterwards found that they had some which they did not want, it was not right that it should be sold in the market, and thus deprive the original owner of the right of pre-emption.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET thought the noble Earl had misunderstood the effect of the Bill, which contained no compulsory powers. By the terms of the Land Clauses Act land not required was to be offered to the original owners, if it were situate in the country, but if it were situate in a town, or was fit for building purposes, then it was to be sold generally. The Admiralty did not generally require to purchase land in the country, but bought it in the neighbourhood of towns. Thus, they had recently bought a street of houses in Plymouth, and if they were to resell the land to the former owners these persons would immediately rebuild a class of houses which it had been the desire of the Admiralty to get rid of for the benefit of the public service.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE was understood to have supported the Amendment.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR defended the clause. It would not be wise to impose these restrictions on the Admiralty. The land was taken by agreement, not compulsorily, under the Lands Clauses Act.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, that the Amendment would have the effect of imposing greater restrictions upon the Admiralty than were applied by the War Department.

THE EARL OF POWIS said, the land under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act was taken by agreement, not compulsorily. By the proposed clause the land would be taken compulsorily.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR denied that that was the effect of the Bill.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that the power sought to be taken by the Admiralty was certainly of a compulsory character. It appeared to him that the Admiralty ought to act under the same restrictions as were imposed by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. The noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) admitted that the Admiralty desired to have the power of taking not only the land that was actually necessary for the purposes under the Bill, but also of acquiring possession of buildings and land in the immediate neighbourhood, with a view to a sale of the latter, as the noble Duke appeared to intimate, to persons who would make a better use of them than the owners.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET observed, that the object they had in view was to secure decency and order in the neighbourhood of those lands. He would, however, undertake to have the clause so framed that would carry out the view of the noble Earl.

FACILITIES FOR DIVINE SERVICE IN COLLEGIATE SCHOOLS BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to provide additional Facilities for the Performance of Divine Service for Collegiate Schools and Colleges in Communion with the United Church of England and Ireland—Was presented by The Bishop of OXFORD; and read 1st. (No. 117.)

EDUCATION (INSPECTORS' REPORTS.)

Sir WILLIAM MILES reported from the General Committee of Elections: That, in pursuance of the Instruction of the House, they had nominated the following Five Members to constitute the Committee on Education (Inspectors' Reports):—John George Dodson, esquire; Sir Philip De Malpas Grey Egerton, baronet; Lord Hotham; The honourable Charles Howard; Edward Howes, esquire. And that they had also named The Lord Advocate and Lord Robert Cecil to serve on the Committee to examine Witnesses, but without the power of voting.

VOTES OF CREDIT FOR CHINA. QUESTION.

Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is intended to surrender to the Exchequer the £93,163 remaining in the Paymaster General's hands out of the Votes of Credit for China?

Mr. PEEL, in reply, said, the details of the expenditure had not as yet been made up. There were certain outstanding claims which would have to be met, and it was necessary for the Government to keep a sum in hand to dispose of them. When they were liquidated the balance would be paid into the Treasury.

NAVY—ROYAL NAVAL RESERVE.

QUESTION.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he has any objection to lay upon the table of the House a Return of the number of men absent from the United Kingdom belonging to the Royal Naval Reserve, specifying how many are gone Foreign, and of those how many were gone to the Federal and Confederate States of America.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, in reply, that he had no objection to lay on the table a Return of the Royal Naval Reserve, specifying how many of the men had gone Foreign. With regard to those men who might have joined the Federal or Confederate States services, the Admiralty were only aware that a few had done so, who, the moment the fact was ascertained, were discharged from the force. He should be happy to furnish the hon. Gentleman with a Return of the numbers of those men.

DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. LINDSAY said, he rose to move an Address for

"Copy of any Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of France, Spain, and Portugal, from 1850 to 1863 inclusive, relating to the abrogation of the Discriminating Duties still levied upon British Vessels and their cargoes trading with those Countries."

In 1850, when the repeal of the navigation laws came into operation, he was aware that there were many persons who entertained serious doubts of the wisdom of that important change. Many were of opinion that the repeal of those laws would seriously injure the merchant shipping of this country; and upon those grounds it was strenuously opposed, not only by numerous Members of that House, but by a large proportion of the shipowners of the country. He was desirous now of troubling the House with a statement of a few facts, with a view of showing how mistaken those persons had been in their apprehensions. In 1849, the year before the repeal of the navigation laws, the tonnage of the shipping of Great Britain amounted to 3,500,000 tons. In 1862, being thirteen years afterwards, our tonnage had increased to 4,950,000 tons. In 1849 we owned of steam shipping 167,000 tons. He estimated that we owned last year—for no Return had as yet been made—800,000 tons. In 1849 the aggregate of the entries inwards and outwards with cargoes amounted to 9,700,000 tons of British shipping. In 1863 the amount was no less than 15,000,000 tons. But, great as was the increase with regard to British shipping, and in our trade with foreign nations, that increase fell into insignificance compared with the enormous increase which had taken place in the exports of British manufactures and British produce; and the House must bear in mind that free trade in shipping had much to do with this enormous increase of our exports. In 1849 the declared value of our exports amounted to £59,000,000 sterling. Last year the value of our exports had increased to £146,000,000. Now, it would be apparent to every man, when he looked into this question, that the shipowners must be very largely benefited by this increase of our exports, because it proved that they obtained thereby a much larger field for the employment of their vessels. It was with that view that the Legislature in 1849 wisely resolved to do away with the navigation laws, and to allow ships of all nations to enter and to leave our ports upon the same terms as our own vessels, with the exception of small local dues which were still exacted in various outports in the shape of municipal and other private charges. The people generally of this country, as well as our shipowners, were large gainers by this change. When we resolved to repeal the navigation laws we entered into communication with all other nations on the subject. We told them of the policy we proposed to adopt, and asked them whether they were prepared to follow our example in this respect. All other nations did agree to adopt that policy, with four or five important exceptions—namely, France, Spain, Portugal, Holland, and the United States, each of whom declined to reciprocate our policy. France still maintained that it was for the interest of her shipping and her people that she should maintain a protective system. The other nations to which he had referred expressed themselves in a similar way. He would pass over the United States. Mighty events were now going on in that unhappy country, which would result in great changes, political and social, in the new world. Before long, no doubt, the navigation of America—the coasting trade of that mighty country, extending from New York to California—would be thrown open to the ships of all nations. When the separation between the Northern and Southern States took place, which must be the case sooner or later, the policy and interest of the South would assuredly be to adopt free trade; and, above all, free trade in ships. He had spoken of Holland as not having reciprocated our policy, because, although the Government of Holland had opened their ports to the ships of England upon the same terms as we had opened our ports to the ships of Holland, it so happened that the trade between Holland and the Dutch possessions in the East Indies, the only trade which would be of any value to our shipping, was under the exclusive power of the Dutch East India Company, so that the trade with the Dutch possessions in the East Indies was still confined to Dutch ships, and British ships were not allowed to enter those ports. Now, he was by no means disposed to think that even the shipowners of Holland gained by this restrictive policy, although the Dutch East India Company, in endeavouring to encourage the trade, offered £10 a ton freight from Batavia and Java to Holland. In consequence of those high terms a large number of Dutch ships had been built for that trade; indeed the number became much greater than the trade could well employ. The result of such a state of things was that the majority of those ships were kept waiting now 10, 12, and sometimes even 18 months before they could get employment; and though the Dutch merchants paid £10 or £12 a ton freight for the sugars they required from the East India possessions, the shipowners, after all, gained little advantage thereby, inasmuch as while they were kept waiting for a cargo at £10 a ton they could often make two voyages, and would be better compensated at £6 a ton by continual employment, whilst the people of Holland would be enabled to obtain their sugar at so much less. He therefore contended that so long as the Dutch East India Company maintained this restrictive policy the people of Holland would be losers by that policy and the shipowners also. In reference to Portugal and Spain, they had always maintained a restrictive and protective policy. He had often had occasion to visit Portugal, and he had often been struck by the facilities which the Tagus afforded for the commerce of all nations. Their cumbrous commercial regulations, however, counteracted all those advantages which they would otherwise obtain. Spain, which was becoming rapidly developed by means of railways, would probably reap the most splendid advantages if she would only abolish her navigation laws and open her ports to the world. Spain imported from this country only £3,500,000 of British produce and manufactures annually. Now we sent last year to Gibraltar goods to the value of £1,500,000. No one would imagine for a moment that these goods were consumed in Gibraltar—we knew that they were imported indirectly into Spain. Consequently, in spite of all her restrictions, the produce and manufactures of England found their way into Spain, and the revenue of Spain lost all those duties which were levied for the protection of the produce of Spain only. But in regard to France, he must say he was surprised that that great and enlightened country should still maintain her restrictive policy. He had heard complaints from Frenchmen that France did not derive those benefits which she anticipated from the commercial treaty with this country. His answer to these complaints was, that France never would obtain those advantages unless she swept away her navigation laws. We were large buyers of wine and other French produce; and the French were willing to be paid for their produce by the wools of Australia, the sugar of England, the silk of China and India, and by other articles in our colonies and possessions. But when we desired to pay her in those articles, the navigation laws of France stepped in and said that she could not take the silks of China or the produce of India in our ships, because they would be subject to a high differential duty. He had read with great surprise and regret a speech recently delivered by M. Thiers on this subject. Now, he was surprised that a statesman with such great experience of the world should at the present day propound doctrines so fallacious in regard to the navigation laws of his country. M. Thiers complained that French shipping was not advancing at the rate the people of France had a right to expect, and ascribed that circumstance to the fact of its not being sufficiently protected; and then in order to increase it that statesman said that French ships should not trade between two foreign ports—he wished to limit the field of employment for French ships as a means, forsooth, of increasing their number. He desired to confine all the carrying trade of France to French shipping. Now, with the exception of the direct trade, the carrying trade of France was already confined to French ships. But what was the result to France of her maintenance of this protective policy? In 1849 she owned 680,000 tons of shipping. In 1862, thirteen years after the repeal of our navigation laws, her shipping had only increased to 980,000 tons, or an addition of 300,000 tons; whereas in Great Britain, by following that policy which M. Thiers condemned, British shipping had increased within that same period by 1,450,000 tons. But that was not all. Let the House mark how the people of France suffered by this protective system. He asked hon. Members just to look on Mercator's Chart. We had, as the House was aware, lines of steamers sailing every week from Southampton to various foreign ports. The Peninsular and Oriental Company's ships were constantly returning home laden with silk and other produce, which the people of France eagerly desired to have. These ships were compelled to pass by Marseilles. The navigation laws of France forbade them entering the French ports, and they were compelled to proceed with their cargoes to Gibraltar. These ships then crossed the Bay of Biscay, and landed their cargoes at Southampton, from whence they were conveyed by railway to the bonded warehouses in London. From London many of those goods were carried in English bottoms to Havre or Bordeaux at a vastly increased price. He would ask every thoughtful man whether these navigation laws did not entail a heavy loss upon any people they were intended to serve? But hon. Gentlemen might say that this roundabout trade was only carried on to a small extent, and that the people of France were not sufferers to any serious amount. But what were the facts? Last year France imported 4,700,000lbs. of silk from this country, the whole of which had been brought from India and China. And yet the people and the manufacturers of Lyons, by their unwise, he might say absurd, navigation laws, were forced to bring that silk, which they had had likely enough in exchange for articles which we had had from them, into Southampton, have it bonded there, and then carried into the heart of France, there to be manufactured. Last year

France imported 11,400,000lbs. of coffee, every ounce of which was first imported into this country; but if she had allowed it to be imported in ships of all nations, French shipping would no doubt have been employed in carrying a very large portion of it. On the contrary, the shipowners of France had gained nothing by those restrictive laws, and the French people had had to pay a greatly enhanced price for the articles they required from other countries, and thus the consumer had been a great loser as well as the shipowner. Take the case of sugar. Last year France imported from this country 8,000,000lbs. of sugar at greatly enhanced prices, and without any benefit to the shipowners of that country. Wool did not apply so much, because it was duty free; but last year France imported from this country, of colonial and foreign wool, no less than 31,000,000lbs.; and whether they looked to the inward or to the outward entries they would see how the trade of France was crippled by the operation of its navigation laws, and how the shipowners of that country, as well as the people, suffered from her restrictive policy. Last year 6,900,000 tons of shipping of all nations entered and cleared the ports of France, and that was the measure of her trade with other nations. France had a population of 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 more than this country, yet we required last year 23,000,000 tons of shipping to carry on our trade with other nations, showing how we had gained by our free trade policy, and more especially by our sweeping away our restrictive policy connected with our navigation laws. He was aware that foreign nations were not very much disposed to listen to the advice of others, but at the same time he thought they were open to consider what was best for their own interests, and he thought that if these facts were brought by the Foreign Office more prominently under the notice of foreign nations, they might have a beneficial effect in showing them that, whilst it was not merely just for them to grant to us what we had granted to them, it would be for their interest and that of their peoples to do so. There was, however, something cumbrous about our machinery for communicating with foreign Governments upon questions of trade, and he was glad to find that a Committee had been appointed with regard to it, and that the result would likely be the adoption of a plan whereby the Board of Trade could be put at once into immediate communication with foreign Governments. He had no doubt the Correspondence he had moved for would show that many communications had passed between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of those countries, and that France, Spain, and Portugal were rather shy in following our example; but when negotiations by letters failed he thought our Ministers at those places might have done a little more by showing the advantages England had gained by her change of policy, and what they might reasonably expect to gain by following our example. He was glad to find that the Government of France had ordered an inquiry into the subject by a Commission consisting of some of the most eminent French statesmen; and perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade might be able to inform the House what had been done in connection with it, and what prospect there was of the French Government making an alteration in their navigation laws. He, however, took that opportunity of stating that Lord Cowley had received him with great courtesy when in France in regard to the question, and had afforded him every facility; but it was not to be expected that he could be acquainted with all the details of so technical a subject. It would, however, be well to instruct our young diplomatists in questions of this kind, because such questions were often the cause of great trouble between nations. He thought it was the duty of that House and Her Majesty's Government to use every exertion to have the restrictions to which he referred removed.

SIR JOSEPH PAXTON seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an Address for Copy of any Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of France, Spain, and Portugal, from 1840 to 1863 inclusive, relating to the abrogation of the Discriminating Duties still levied upon British vessels and their cargoes trading with those countries."—(Mr. Lindsay.)

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, there was no objection to the Motion if his hon. Friend would insert after Copies "or Extracts." The documents would be given as fully as possible to make them useful, but there was much that did not bear upon the Motion. He quite agreed with the general sentiment which his hon. Friend had expressed—namely, that freedom of navigation must be a great benefit to all countries, and especially to those who were desirous of extending their foreign trade. It was not certain that trade and ships increased in the same ratio; and if freedom was not given to foreign ships for carrying the exports of a country, in all probability a check was put on the extension of the very trade it was intended to promote. In England our mercantile marine did not keep pace in tonnage with our trade; and we could not carry on our commerce exclusively in British ships; and he had no doubt the same principle applied to all other nations, and especially to France. His hon. Friend did not appear to him to make sufficient allowance for the difficulties Her Majesty's Government had to encounter in consequence of the prejudices of protected interests abroad. Foreign Governments were fettered and trammelled in their policy by class interests, and nothing but time and the experience of the effects of a free trade policy in this and other countries were likely to remove those prejudices, and enable foreign Governments although themselves enlightened to act as they thought best for the interests of the nation in this important subject. Her Majesty's Government, he could assure the hon. Gentleman and the House, had lost no opportunity of impressing on foreign Governments the necessity of revising their navigation laws; and when our own navigation laws were repealed, a circular was immediately addressed to Her Majesty's Ambassadors, Ministers, and Consuls in the various countries, directing them to invite all foreign Governments to adopt a reciprocal policy. They all responded with the exception of France, Spain, and Portugal. His hon. Friend on a former occasion carried an Address to the Crown that a treaty for effecting reciprocity with France should be negotiated. He was not sure whether his hon. Friend framed it with a view to a treaty; but Her Majesty's Government were invited to negotiate with the French Government an arrangement which would relieve British ships from the disabilities under which they laboured in going into French ports. We communicated with our Ambassador, who also communicated with the French Government, and made known to them that such an Address had been agreed to by the House of Commons, and memorials which were presented to Her Majesty's Government from various bodies of shipowners to the same effect were also communicated to them. Some short time after, in 1862, an inquiry was instituted by the French Government into the operation of their navigation laws. It was continued over some time; witnesses from different countries were invited to give their evidence, and amongst others his hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland. He had read his hon. Friend's evidence, and he advised those who took an interest in the subject to do the same, because they would find that his hon. Friend had put the matter in the clearest manner before the gentlemen who conducted the inquiry, and he could not conceive that any representation could be made by this country to France more likely to have the effect of bringing conviction to the minds of those persons who were interested in the subject in France than his evidence in reference to the effect of the French navigation laws upon the commercial interests of that country. Her Majesty's Government had not yet heard the result of that inquiry; but he presumed the evidence taken was being digested, and he hoped the result would be some relaxation of those restrictions under which navigation existed at present in France. Very little had been done by Spain towards a reciprocity. Very little encouragement had been given by the Spanish Government to the representations that had been made upon the subject. Although the Correspondence might not appear to be so extensive as his hon. Friend might think the importance of the subject required, he must bear in mind that many communications, both verbal and by private letter, had been made to the various Governments on this question that would not appear in the published despatches and Correspondence. British ships were formerly subject to a double charge of a differential character in Spanish ports—first, with regard to the ship, and then upon the cargo—but after much correspondence and negotiation the former was removed, and the cargo only was subjected to a duty of 20 per cent. A correspondence had also taken place with Portugal on the subject. All he could say was, that it was not from any indifference or want of endeavours on the part of Her Majesty's Government that more had not been done in Portugal, Spain, and France. As he did not object to the Motion, it was not necessary for him to detain the House with any further observations.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that no doubt this discussion would reach the foreign Governments named, and he hoped it would have some weight with them. An allusion had been made to the Committee on a somewhat kindred subject now sitting upstairs; he hoped his hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade would take care that the Correspondence would be published in time to go before that Committee, in order that the Committee might be able to make use of any part of it bearing on the subject before the Committee. He was quite satisfied with the reply of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade; but he was sorry the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was not in his place; for the Correspondence between this country and foreign nations relative to trade and commerce, was conducted by the Foreign Office and not by the Board of Trade. He hoped the Correspondence would include the inclosures, showing the instructions or advice the Board of Trade had given to the Foreign Office during the continuance of the Correspondence. The facts given, he thought, would show very clearly the immense interest it would be to foreign countries to adopt the change, and he could not but believe that if our Ministers abroad had had as much knowledge upon the subject as the hon. Member for Sunderland, no time would have been lost in effecting the required change.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

Address for

"Copy or Extracts of any Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of France, Spain, and Portugal, from 1850 to 1863 inclusive, relating to the abrogation of the Discriminating Duties still levied upon British Vessels and their cargoes trading with those Countries."

AGRICULTURAL STATISTICS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. CAIRD, in rising to move a Resolution—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the collection and early publication of the Agricultural Statistics of Great Britain would be advantageous to the public interest,"

said, that it would not be necessary to detain the House at any length, since the subject had received ample discussion on various occasions during the present Parliament. He had been much impressed with the extent to which this country was now dependent on foreign sources for its supply of food. The change had been very extraordinary in the last few years. The importations of foreign wheat and flour for the ten years previous to 1838 were considerably less than the present average yearly import; the imports for those ten years having been 6,200,000 qrs., while the average imports of the last five years were 9,000,000 qrs. If he took the five years previous to the abolition of the Corn Laws, he found that while at that time we were dependent on foreign countries for food to the extent of six weeks' consumption, we were now dependent upon them, according to the average of the last five years, for six months' consumption. Now, a matter of so much magnitude was well worthy the attention of that House and of the country. He did not say that the increased supply of corn was entirely to be attributed to matters not connected with internal agriculture, though it had been very much caused by it; but whilst he thought the immense increased supply should give to the people of the country a much greater abundance of food than it really did, at the same time he believed it had been caused by an alteration in the mode of agriculture in this country. Two years ago he referred to the change which he then believed was growing and had been growing for some years in consequence of natural causes that must be apparent to the House. When they took into consideration the diminished price of corn and the increased price of every other article of farm and dairy produce, and the increasing cost of labour, they would see that it naturally caused a gradually diminished growth of corn and an increased growth of those articles which were more remunerative to the farmer. It was difficult to form an estimate of what might be the consequence of that change, which was gradually overspreading the country. If each farmer took away one-tenth of his land from corn, and let it out in grass, we should require from 4,000,000 to 5,000,000 qrs. of corn more to be imported than before, and this very process might be going on without our having the slightest knowledge of the change. But if we had a return of the acreage under each crop we should know the extent of the change, and how it was gradually being brought about. Now, the first interest we had to consider in a matter of this kind was that of the public. When we found that almost one-half of the bread consumed in this country was derived from foreign sources, we could not overestimate the extent of the interests which were involved. But other countries as well as ourselves had appeared in the market for foreign corn. France, in 1861, competed with us in every country where wheat was produced to the extent of from 5,000,000 to 6,000,000 qrs. It would be of the greatest advantage to us, then, to know at the earliest possible period what change was going on in order that we might enter the market on at least equal terms with other competing countries. He had always argued that the advantage to our own farmers of such a knowledge would be as great as to any other class. The farmer was to a great extent not only a seller but a purchaser of foreign corn—they were in fact corn dealers. If, as had been often argued by hon. Gentlemen opposite, this were simply and solely a corn dealer's question, the farmers were as interested as any others in having the earliest information, for then they would be in a position to put that information to advantage. The monetary and commercial interests of the country must necessarily be largely interested in these statistics, for the fluctuations which took place in the supply of an article of such magnitude were very great. The value of the imported corn during the last five years had been one-sixth of the value of the total imports of every foreign article of produce. During the last four years the fluctuations which had taken place in the cost of foreign corn had been extraordinary. In 1860-1 our imports of corn cost upwards of £40,000,000. In 1863 and that part which was now remaining of 1864 up to next harvest—which, of course, was partly a matter of estimate—it would be found, he believed, that we should not pay more than £20,000,000. A difference amounting to something like £20,000,000 sterling must seriously affect the whole monetary interests of the country, and if they looked to the commercial and shipping interests it would be seen that the transport of such a vast weight of corn was a matter of immense importance. In one year we should require 3,000,000 of tonnage, in another 1,500,000. The returns, therefore, must be of immense importance to the shipping interest. With regard to the advantages to be derived from returns of this kind he would appeal to the benefit which the country had derived from the agricultural returns collected with such success in Ireland. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had more than once borne testimony to their value in revealing facts of the greatest importance which could not be obtained from any other source. Whilst, however, he acknowledged the importance of the Irish returns he must say he considered them most incomplete until those of Great Britain were published. He did not desire to bind the House to any particular mode of obtaining these returns. It had been proposed that they should be collected by the police as in Ireland; but on the part of the Government and the House generally that was not thought a desirable means. He then suggested that they should be obtained through the Registrar General's Department. That office, from its diffused machinery and the accuracy with which its returns were always made, would be found, he believed, to be most successful, and the Registrar General himself was of opinion that he could obtain the returns, if ordered to do so, and if the money were voted by that House. He thought £15,000 would be a very small sum for such an object, considering its vast importance. But the Secretary for the Home Department was of opinion that as no compulsion could be used, the returns were not likely to be so trustworthy as to justify Parliament in making such a payment. He (Mr. Caird) believed if the system were once in operation most satisfactory statistics might be obtained from the office of the Registrar General. But he had turned his attention to another mode of obtaining them—a mode which had been tried by the Highland Society for two successive years in two different counties in Scotland with perfect success. It was that the returns should be taken according to the maps of the Ordnance Survey and under the direction of that Survey. But to prevent unnecessary expense, and because the maps were not complete for England, and were not likely to be for some years yet, it would be requisite to take type or sample districts throughout the country, from which accurate returns should be obtained every year. The 6-inch Survey in Scotland was now complete, and, therefore, his plan might be adopted this year in that country, in which he would propose to select five sample districts. He would select ten districts in England, one in the south, one each in the south-west, midland, and south-east, in the west, midland, and east, and in the north, north-west, and north-east. Each of those districts might contain 100,000 acres, and so far they should insure absolute accuracy. The returns might be obtained from the whole of England in the course of the next year.

He had proposed fifteen sample districts for the whole of Great Britain, those districts containing 1,500,000 acres, which would represent about one-tenth of the whole of the cultivated surface of Great Britain. It was a convenient quantity, but was not material to his object. All that was material was that the same sample districts should be taken each year in succession, for by doing so they would be able to find out the changes which were taking place in the cultivation, and if there were a fifth or a tenth of increase over the 1,500,000 acres, that would be an indication that a like increase had taken place in the cultivated acreage of the whole country. The plan had two advantages—the first being that it would be very little costly. From the cost of the Survey made by Sir Henry James, he was able to give a probable estimate of how much it would be. The whole cost would not exceed £3,000 a year, and such a small sum was hardly worth mentioning in comparison with the advantages to be derived from the possession of correct statistics. The second advantage of the plan was, that it would entirely do away with the complaint that had been urged on former occasions as to the inquisitorial character of the inquiry, because the officer, taking the Ordnance map of 100,000 acres, and filling up that map as cultivated, need not know the name of a single farm or farmer. The return so obtained of the surface of the country might be procured early and published towards the end of July, and the country would then be in possession of what it never had before—a satisfactory basis, on which every one interested in the purchase and sale of corn could calculate for himself what would be the probable result of the harvest about to be reaped. He would further propose that towards September, when some criterion might be arrived at as to the probable yield of the harvest, the same officers as had made the inquiry in the previous part of the year should again inquire as to what would be the probable produce of the crop when thrashed. That might be done by a very ingenious mode adopted by Sir Henry James and the officers of his department, the result of which had been very successful, and which might be carried out with great advantage throughout the country. Having developed the plan he suggested he would now place his Motion before the House, not asking the House to bind itself to that plan or any other plan, but only desiring that, as the question was of so much importance to the public generally, and as the returns could be procured for so very moderate an amount, the House would agree to the principle expressed in the Resolution which he now begged to move.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the collection and early publication of the Agricultural Statistics of Great Britain would be advantageous to the public interest."—(Mr. Caird.)

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, that if their agricultural statistics were to cost no more than £3,000, and were to be as advantageous as the hon. Gentleman had described, he could perfectly well understand that the House might feel disposed to agree to this Resolution; but if these returns were to be fallacious and inaccurate, then he could not understand what possible use such returns could be to the country. He would take the hon. Gentleman's last plan—he proposed to take certain counties from certain parts of England; but inasmuch as it was well known that even in adjoining counties there was frequently very great difference in the soil, one being poor and the other rich, these selected districts could not possibly be said to represent the whole agricultural districts of England. They knew how crops varied in different, though adjoining, counties; therefore, on that ground alone, it would be most unsatisfactory to select certain parts. This was not, however, the main point. The hon. Gentleman said this was not an inquisitorial plan, and yet he proposed that the most inquisitorial returns should be collected in September—that an officer should go round to each grower, and ascertain the amount of corn threshed.

MR. CAIRD said, that the officers were to obtain an estimate of the average yield of the corn threshed.

COLONEL BARTTELOT: If it was to be an estimate what was the use of it?

MR. CAIRD: It could be nothing else.

COLONEL BARTTELOT: Then it was of no use whatever. His hon. Friend said the statistics would be to the advantage of the public; but he entirely overlooked the feelings of the people on whose ground they had to go to get these returns. The farmers were entirely adverse to statistical returns of this nature. They might be wrong, and the returns might not do them the harm they feared they would; they, however, were of opinion these statistics would do them no good; and, therefore, the country ought not to be put to the expense of them. In conclusion, he hoped the House would not agree to a Resolution so undefined as this, because the House was pledging itself to a something, and what that something was they did not yet know; and, moreover, they were pledging themselves to carry out a project that could not be satisfactory to the country.

MR. PACKE said, he entirely agreed with the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken. He had paid much attention to this subject, and had presented many petitions from various counties with reference to it, but he had never yet heard it shown that it would be any benefit to those who provided the returns now asked for. On that ground, and on that ground alone, he should be prepared to oppose the Motion. But when they considered the great injury which had been inflicted on the agriculture of this country—when they recollected the £6,000,000 taken from the agriculturists for the malt tax and that other £6,000,000 by the diseases of cattle—when they remembered the extreme low price of corn that had prevailed for some time past—it was far too much to call on them and compel them to say what was the result of the cultivation of their land. The hon. Gentleman first proposed to get the return through the Registrar's Office, but that would cost too much; he then proposed it should be got through the Ordnance Survey, and at the end of July the account should be taken of the cropping, and in September of the threshing. Now, the return obtained as proposed could not but be unreliable; for every one knew that whilst in some places land would scarcely produce five bushels, in others it would produce five quarters. No one could tell until he had threshed what the yield would be, and therefore £3,000 a year spent as proposed would be simply thrown away. Before they agreed to a system of this kind, they ought to have the consent of the farmers of the country, who certainly now objected to it, and naturally—for how would the shopkeepers of London or elsewhere like to have their places of business inspected and their takings inquired into? It was perfectly monstrous that such a principle should be applied to the farmers of this country. No benefit whatever could accrue from it to the corn-grower, and it was simply for the benefit of the corn-dealer.

MR. PAGET said, with reference to the objection that the proposed returns would be unreliable, because the farmers could know nothing of the produce of their harvests until threshing time, he could state; that having been for forty years engaged in calculating what the probable yield of the harvest would be, he was certain that a very close guess might be made at it by this proposal. The objection to the taking of acreage of corn had considerably subsided; and he believed that the tenant-farmers had no objection to the acreage of their growing crops being known. He did not himself know a single tenant-farmer who objected to his acreage being known. As a matter of fact, every landlord and every steward must know, and it could not signify to the tenant-farmer that the general public should know it. The gallant Colonel opposite said, that taking returns for these sample districts would not give a fair idea of what was being done all over the country; but, with the geological map in hand, it would not be at all difficult to mark out a sample district which would give the information desired. Of course weather which suited the lias strata would not be so good for the sandstone; but by taking a fair sample of the lias districts, it would not be difficult to ascertain what was going on in the same kind of lands all through the country. The practical form in which the hon. Gentleman had embodied his proposition removed many of the difficulties which had formerly stood in the way. The old objection on the ground of expense had been got rid of. The sum of £3,000 would be very little to pay for the valuable information which might be obtained. His (Mr. Paget's) impression was, that one result of the collection of this information would be, that it would tend to reduce the inequalities of price throughout all the country, and would thus confer a great benefit on the small farmers particularly, whose interest it was to be able to take their produce to market regularly and get a fair average price for it. Certainly, nothing would tend more to make prices steady throughout the country.

LORD HOTHAM said, that his silence might not be misconstrued, he desired to state that his opinion on this subject remained unchanged. He believed that without some more forcible measures than he thought Parliament would be willing to sanction, it would not be possible to obtain returns of sufficient accuracy to be of the value the hon. Gentleman seemed to expect; and unless the returns so collected and issued by the Government were correct, the result would be totally different from that which was desired. He thought there was a good deal in what had fallen from his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Barttelot) as to the impracticability of making any such selections—any such “types” was the expression used—of the whole country as would give a fair representation of the produce of a harvest. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Caird) had abandoned his proposed collection of the returns by the police and registrars, and he now proposed to make the collection through the instrumentality of the Ordnance Survey—in point of fact, by private soldiers of the Royal Engineers. He (Lord Hotham) decidedly objected to the employment of any of Her Majesty's troops in the collection of such returns, and he believed that it would not give any satisfaction to the country to see Her Majesty's army so employed. He should very much like to hear what the Secretary of State would say to that suggestion. When the hon. Member said his present proposal would be divested of all the inquisitorial character which attended his former plans, and that it would only be necessary for the Ordnance Surveyor to go with the map in his hand to procure the returns, he would ask him where these soldiers were to go? Were they to take their stand on the public highway? It was very little information they would obtain in that manner. But if the proceeding was to be divested of its inquisitorial character he would ask by what right were they to go on the fields and inquire what were the crops under one head and what under another? For the purpose of procuring for the country the Ordnance Survey the law empowered the surveyors to go on the land. Was it intended to pass a law compelling the farmer to admit those men on his farm and to answer their inquiries? And if this was to be done, what became of the hon. Member's statement that the inquiry would be divested of all inquisitorial character? The hon. Member proposed that the first inquiry should be made in July as to what would be the probable crop, and another inquiry was to be made in September, when the farmers had commenced threshing. But he was surprised that the hon. Member, coming from Scotland, should propose that in the month of September those Inspectors should make such inquiry. He (Lord Hotham) never had the advantage of being in the hon. Member's country but once; but he remembered seeing the oats as green as grass in the month of October. In the county to which he (Lord Hotham) had the honour to belong, the harvest frequently lasted till the end of October. Within the last few years he had seen wheat cut in December. What, then, could the Inspectors learn in September? Another difficulty in the way of collecting these statistics arose from the unsettled state of the weather about harvest time. It had happened within the last three or four years that there had been two harvests which knocked all calculations and estimates on the head. In one of those years the harvest was immensely larger than was expected; in the other it was infinitely smaller. If, then, the returns were not to be accurate, they would do more harm than good. There was a general disposition to place reliance on documents emanating from the Government. If the Government would publish the returns stating at the head of them that they would not be answerable for their correctness, that would be one thing; but if they were to be issued in the ordinary form of Government Returns, the public would believe that the Government knew more on the subject than, in reality, they did. For how many years was his late right hon. and lamented Friend, Sir Robert Peel, charged with having said he would guarantee a price of 56s. a quarter for wheat; whereas, all he did say was that he hoped or expected—he certainly did not go beyond this—that 56s. would be about the price below which wheat would not fall. If these returns were not accurate people would still fancy they were; they would make their arrangements accordingly, and be woefully disappointed. People engaged in commerce would not be taken in by incorrect returns—they would obtain information for themselves; but he doubted whether this would be the case with the cultivators of land. Nothing was less desirable than to encourage speculation on the part of the farmers. Mercantile men must speculate; but he never knew a good practical farmer who would not tell him that the man who threshed his corn when ready, and sold it when it was threshed, would in the long run do more good than he who fancied he knew more than his neighbour, and kept his corn in hope of the price becoming higher. He did not care whether the collection of the statistics was to cost £3,000 or £15,000; but till he could see a plan for collecting them, calculated to effect the object which the hon. Gentleman had in view, and not subject to the objections which the present and all former plans were liable to, he could only say that, without presuming to tell others that they were wrong, he must give his opposition to Motions of this nature.

Mr. DENT said, he had never heard the accuracy of the statistical returns of agriculture collected in Ireland, or by the Highland Society in Scotland, impugned; and he could not understand why the proposed returns should be less correct. The noble Lord who had just sat down (Lord Hotham) deprecated speculation on the part of the farmer. Why was it so wrong for the farmer to speculate? Why, the main ground of the folly of their doing so was that they were entirely ignorant of what was likely to be the average of crops throughout the country. For himself, he would like to see agricultural statistics carried still further. He would like to see a return, not only of the corn crops, but of stock. With regard to this point, there existed a lamentable want of information. He cheerfully gave his support to the Motion.

Mr. HUBBARD thought the House ought to see clearly the grounds on which the Motion was opposed. The first was, that the expense of collecting the statistics was too great; the second was, that farmers objected to intrusion on their land; the third, that the returns would be delusive. If the latter objection were true, of course it was fatal. As to the first objection, whether the expense was £5,000, £15,000, or £50,000, the immense importance of these statistics could not be measured by any expense. In one season England had spent £20,000,000 in corn alone; and in 1847 as large a sum as £100,000 might have been saved by priority of information on a single day's transaction, when we had to compete with other nations in the markets of Europe and America. The House should, therefore, dismiss the matter of expense from their minds. Then so far as the feelings of the farmers were concerned, he thought that a great deal of misapprehension prevailed on that point. With regard to the small farmers, if they imagined these returns would injure them they were under an entire misapprehension. No parties were more interested in getting sound information on this subject than the farmers themselves. And why? Because they were sellers of the commodity. The buyers had agents north and south, surveying the length and breadth of the land; but there was no one to inform the farmer, to whose advantage it must undoubtedly be to be on a par with the buyer in obtaining information on the subject, and thus being enabled to judge whether there was not a coming scarcity which would justify him in asking a higher price for his corn than was offered by the buyer. It was not the importer or the corn dealer alone, but it was the community at large, including the farmer himself, who was interested in the compilation of these statistics. If we could not get returns of reliable authenticity, of course there was an end to the matter; but he took it for granted that in any scheme the House or the Government might adopt means would be taken to ensure accuracy. As to the prejudice of the farmers and their reluctance to see on their farms an inspecting intruder, the feeling would vanish when they reflected on the subject, and saw that they were more likely to be benefited than injured by the publication of these statistics.

MR. THOMPSON said, he thought it desirable that agricultural statistics should be collected, but the acceptance of the Resolution of his hon. Friend would not bind the House to any specific plan. If the House agreed to this Resolution, and a Bill founded upon it were introduced, he begged to suggest a few alterations in the scheme indicated by his hon. Friend. Instead of having districts he was of opinion that the returns should be collected all over the country, and, for the sake of removing prejudices, he thought it would be well to confine them at first to the acreage—the area of the respective crops. These might be collected at a trifling expense, and without alarming the jealousy of the farmers. The number of acres being ascertained, we should be in possession of the largest factor in the multiplication, the one in which there was most room for error, and which no individual occupier could test or verify. The variation between a small and a large crop could be easily ascertained. Suppose, for instance, that ten bushels an acre were the difference between a minimum and a maximum yield, the farmer would know whether the crop was a good, a bad, or a medium one; and if he had any doubt on the subject, he could remove it by threshing out the produce of a given portion of an acre, and thus ascertain within a bushel or two the actual produce. This process would supply the other factors of the multiplication, and the farmer would thus possess a tolerably accurate estimate of the produce of the kingdom. Objections had been made to the proposed employment of the Ordnance Surveyors in collecting these statistics; and he would suggest that it would be preferable to employ the clerks to the Poor Law Unions, who, being in constant intercourse with the overseers of parishes, would be able to compile the returns required without much labour, and would be satisfied with a very slight addition to their salaries. He threw out these suggestions as they occurred to him; but of this he was certain, that it would not be a matter of great difficulty to frame a plan for collecting these statistics.

LODGE NAAS said, that as Ireland had been referred to he wished to make a few observations. Now, with regard to the collection of the statistics of the acreage and stock very little difficulty had been found in Ireland in obtaining full and accurate information; but when it had been attempted to discover the quantity of produce which had been raised in each year, he did not think that their experience had been so satisfactory. He knew very well how it had been attempted to obtain information with regard to the quantity of produce. It was done in this way. Forms were sent down from the head office in Dublin, and were directed to the magistrates, to police-officers, and in some cases to the large farmers, who filled them up according to their own opinion; the returns were sent in, and the calculation was made from them. It was quite impossible that these returns could in any way be accurate, for he knew of his own experience that many persons in a district to whom these forms had been addressed had differed most materially in opinion; and it would be found that the very best estimates, even with regard to the quantity of produce coming from the same parish, would differ as much as 50 per cent. Therefore the House would be under an erroneous impression if they were led to believe that, as regarded the returns of produce under the system of agricultural statistics in Ireland, they had been in any way satisfactory. He believed it was perfectly impossible to obtain anything like an accurate account of the produce of the country. The only way that an approximation could be made was by collecting the statistics of the quantity that was actually brought into the market. With regard to the machinery by which the agricultural statistics, as far as regarded the acreage and stock, were obtained, he believed they could be got in no other way than by employing enumerators, as was done in Ireland, to go about each farm and ascertain for themselves what was the amount of acreage under each description of crop. He perfectly agreed with his noble Friend the Member for the East Riding (Lord Hotham) that returns of this kind, unless perfectly accurate, were of no value whatever. His experience was that unless they were able to create machinery in this country which should perform the duties which the police discharged in Ireland with respect to agricultural statistics, they would be unable to collect these facts in such a way as to make them of any value whatever. He did not know whether that was possible or not. He was afraid the expense would be greater in England than it was in Ireland, because they had not a large body of men ready made to their hands for the performance of the duty. But at the same time he had not the least doubt that if such a machinery could not be applied it would be worse than useless to attempt the collection of agricultural statistics at all. Much had been said with regard to the objections made by farmers to give the returns of the stock they possessed, and of the acreage under various kinds of crop upon their farms. He was perfectly aware that these objections existed to a great extent in Ireland at first, and that the farmers were unwilling to give the information. But these objections had been wholly removed. He was sure the Registrar General, Mr. Donnelly, would be able to inform any hon. Gentleman that there was hardly an instance of any farmer objecting to supply the constabulary with all the information that was desired. As to the farmers not taking any interest in the matter, he knew that they took a great interest. These returns were published not only in the returns made to Parliament, but in every provincial paper in Ireland, and were read by the farmers with great and increasing interest. They were not in the least afraid of any inquisitorial inspection of their affairs. The number of stock and the quantity of acres were given, but no names were published; and it was impossible for any person to find out the private affairs of the farmer. He believed that the collection of agricultural statistics in England could be guarded against many of the objections which had been made in the course of this debate, and he therefore hoped that the House would agree to the Resolution of the hon. Member for Stirling.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that he could not regard this as a mere abstract Resolution. If it were passed, his hon. Friend (Mr. Caird) would, he imagined, understand it as an encouragement, if not an approval of his plan.

MR. CAIRD said, that he did not ask for the adoption of his plan.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that surely the House had got past the stage of abstract Resolutions upon this subject. Bills for the collection of agricultural statistics had been more than once introduced. In 1846 he himself brought in a Bill for that purpose; and another Bill was subsequently introduced, and read a second time. There was no difference of opinion as to the importance of obtaining accurate statistical returns of the acreage under cultivation for particular crops, produce, and stock, not only to the agricultural interest, but to the mercantile interests of the country. The whole difficulty consisted in this—how to do it. His hon. Friend had submitted a new plan. He proposed to take certain typical districts in England and Wales, and he assumed that these typical districts were a fair sample of the whole country. He thought he could infer, therefore, from the statistics of the typical districts what was the acreage under cultivation, and what was the produce of the whole kingdom, if not with absolute accuracy at any rate sufficiently near for practical purposes. Now, unfortunately, this plan of his hon. Friend proceeded upon one important assumption—that they knew the extent of the cultivated land in Great Britain, and knew something of the character of the cultivation. They must know something of the whole in order to be able to select their sample or type; and unless they knew the character of the whole how could they say that their 1,500,000 acres were to be taken as a type or fixed part of the whole? He confessed he had very great doubts upon the point. Now they did know that in Ireland when the Ordnance Survey and constabulary were made use of to ascertain the cultivation of particular crops, it was found that the results of their inquiries were very different from the previous estimates which had been published by eminent writers upon the subject. The hon. Member (Mr. Caird) started with the assumption that there were 15,000,000 acres under cultivation, of which 100,000 acres was the 150th part.

MR. CAIRD said, that it was of no importance that there should be a definite proportion between the typical portion and the whole. It would remain the same type year after year, and an intelligible result would be obtained by comparing the results of one year with those of another.

MR. MILNER GIBSON admitted that that would be so as between the typical districts ; but how could they jump to the conclusion that that would be a fair comparison for the whole country ? [Mr. CAIRD : It must be, of course.] We had no knowledge at present, beyond a mere estimate, either of the acreage under cultivation in the whole kingdom, nor of the quality of the soil in various parts of the country ; therefore, he thought that it was going a great way to assume that the proportion between the typical districts in two successive years would hold good for the whole country. In Ireland we had estimates of the extent of land under cultivation similar to that which his hon. Friend had proposed for England ; but an examination of the whole of Ireland showed that those estimates were entirely erroneous. Probably the estimate of 15,000,000 acres under cultivation for England was wrong. In Ireland the estimate of the land under barley was greater by one-fourth than the largest quantity actually sown, and too much land by about one-fourth was supposed to have been cultivated with potatoes. The fact was that the plan of his hon. Friend had not been long enough before the House. He would not go the length of condemning it ; on the contrary, he guarded himself from the assertion that it might not prove hereafter to have great merits ; but before it was adopted in whole or in part it was absolutely necessary to see that the calculations rested upon accurate data. Now, in Scotland, he found that in the typical counties the increase from 1855 to 1856 in the acreage under wheat was at the rate of 34 per cent ; whereas over the whole of Scotland the increase was at the rate of nearly 37 per cent. In Ireland in the same years the increase in the typical counties was 14 per cent, while over the whole country it was nearly 19 per cent. Between 1856 and 1857 the increase in the acreage under wheat was 3½ per cent in the typical districts, while over the whole of Ireland it was little less than 6 per cent, or nearly double the amount. Taking the difference between the years 1859 and 1860 in the Irish typical districts, it was 2½ per cent, whereas over the whole of Ireland it was only ½ per cent ; so that, if the typical districts were taken in that year as an indication of what was going forward in the country, the increase would have been represented at five times its actual amount. This showed how difficult it was to select typical districts, and that if returns were published under Government sanction professing to be accurate, great caution must be shown in approaching the subject. As regarded the employment of the Engineer Staff of the Ordnance Department in the collection of these statistics, he could conceive that as that survey was completed they might, by degrees, if they pleased, obtain year by year, as the survey permitted accurate knowledge of the acreage under cultivation. They might probably ascertain the crop, but it would be difficult to ascertain the produce. But he thought it would be desirable to wait until that undertaking was first completed, otherwise his hon. Friend would certainly run the risk of upsetting the plans which had been laid down for the gradual survey of the United Kingdom. The survey of Scotland and that of the six northern counties of England was already complete ; and no doubt this map would afford valuable assistance in the collection of the desired information. But he held in his hand a letter from Sir Henry James, who, though favourable to his hon. Friend's plan, pointed out some difficulties which must arise in carrying it into execution at the present time. That gallant officer wrote as follows :—

“ Before any further steps are taken, the proposed system should be submitted to the judgment of competent persons. If it should be approved and Government adopt it, then we should require two years from the present time to complete the plans of the typical districts in England ; but this would compel us to abandon the surveys of the counties now in progress, and would give rise to discontent in those counties ; and if precedence is given to the agricultural districts, then we shall also have complaints from the mineral and manufacturing districts.”

And such obviously would be the case. His hon. Friend, therefore, must not expect that without a great deal more consideration than the House had yet given to the proposal it could receive even an indirect sanction. He was quite prepared to admit that the collection of agricultural statistics was most desirable, and that the interests of this country, both agricultural and mercantile, would be greatly benefited by them. At the same time he did not see the slightest necessity for any Resolution whatever on the point. He himself had proposed Resolutions, but then he had always some definite plan in view; and unless the House were prepared to carry out a definite plan they ought not to sanction this Resolution. There was no indisposition on the part of the Government to consider any plan which might be put forward; they were quite alive to the importance of the subject, but if his hon. Friend pressed his Motion to a division he should be compelled to move the Previous Question.

MR. BASS thought there must be some misapprehension on the part of the right hon. Gentleman and Members opposite as to the proposition of his hon. Friend. What he proposed was to take 1,500,000 acres in different parts of the country every year as a type of what the average agriculture of the whole country would be—so that in a series of years the variation in these types would substantially show the variation in the cultivation of the different crops in the country. When he heard the President of the Board of Trade acknowledge that it would be most desirable to have these statistics collected, he was in hopes that he was about to propose that they should be taken not over one-fifteenth of the kingdom, but over the country at large. The right hon. Gentleman quoted figures to show that a discrepancy of 5 per cent existed between the returns as given by the typical districts and those extending over the whole of the country. What did that difference amount to? One million in 20,000,000. But what was the extent to which the country was at present in the dark for want of these statistics? Writers of eminence had declared that the general average produce of Great Britain and Ireland was only 6,500,000 qrs. of wheat. The very highest authority in the kingdom, Mr. McCulloch, on the contrary, placed the quantity of wheat at upwards of 13,000,000 qrs. Surely we ought not to be so far in the dark—to the extent of the difference between 6,500,000 qrs. and 13,000,000 qrs. The late Sir George Lewis, a few years ago, invited general co-operation in ascertaining the number of persons that could be fed in this country, and surely it must be of equal importance to know what they were to be fed with, and what proportion of their food was derived from our own country. He had on a former occasion ventured to speak of comparative degrees of ignorance among farmers, but the noble Lord opposite (Lord Hotham) had administered to him such a rebuke that it was still tingling in his ears. He would not, therefore, suppose that there were degrees of ignorance, and would only assert that there were degrees of intelligence among them. But hon. Members of that House who were among the best farmers in it supported a system of agricultural statistics. What harm, he should like to know, would it do the farmers? [An hon. MEMBER: What good would it do him?] He thought it no hardship that an exciseman came to his house and inquired how many barrels of beer he brewed. After the declaration of the President of the Board of Trade that these statistics were most valuable and important, he thought the right hon. Gentleman could not feel that he was performing all the duties of his high position unless he brought in a Bill to provide for agricultural statistics.

MR. HRYGATE said, that whilst he heartily supported the truism contained in the proposition they were now called upon to support, he expressly refrained from giving his assent to the plan sketched out by the hon. Member. On the contrary, he believed that the sample system proposed would be a very inadequate and unsatisfactory way of obtaining for the country statistics of the progress of one of the greatest resources of our material wealth. He held in his hand two short documents which fully corroborated what had been said by the noble Lord the Member for Cockermonth (Lord Naas) as to the way in which practically they managed these things in Ireland. The two chief objections to agricultural statistics were stated to be, in the first place, the inquisitorial nature of the inquiry; and secondly, the fact that these statistics could not be made compulsory, and that, unless they were made compulsory, they would be useless. The evidence derived from Ireland showed that both the propositions were untrue. It appeared from the statement of the Registrar General of Ireland that these statistics never disclosed the names of the tenant-farmers. The acreage under different crops and the live stock alone were given. The tenant-farmers of Ireland, therefore, did not find this mode inquisitorial, and had no objection to it. The same Gentleman stated, that although these Returns were not compulsory they were far from useless, and that in their collection they had the increasing co-operation of landed proprietors, of the clergy, and the tenant-farmers. Here was evidence that the collection was not objected to. On the contrary, Mr. Denelly, in a late Report, expressly says—

“When the figures are revised, I do not apprehend that any important changes will be required in them, as the increasing experience of the enumerators, and the continued generous co-operation of the landed proprietors, the clergy of all denominations, the tenant farmers, and the public press, all tend from year to year to greater accuracy in these statistics.”

He confessed he had always felt that this question had suffered as much from its friends as its foes, and that the advantage of these returns had been greatly overrated. They would not indicate the right time either to buy or sell. When it was proposed to pass from the region of fact to that of estimates, it was a mistake. He regarded, therefore, all calculations as to the prospective yield of crops which were still in the field as visionary and delusive. All they wanted to know was an accurate account of the various descriptions of ground under different crops every year, and the quantity of live stock, so that they might trace the increase or decrease of the agricultural wealth of the country. That was a species of information which no civilized nation, and especially a mercantile nation like the English, ought to be without. It was a reproach to us, that whilst nearly every European nation and even America possessed that information and highly valued it, we were still deficient in that respect. It was a reproach to us, and the sooner the reproach was wiped away, the better would it be for our credit and reputation.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he believed there was scarcely any difference of opinion upon the principle involved in the proposition of his hon. Friend. The Government were fully convinced of the advantages of agricultural statistics in the United Kingdom, and agreed that they ought to be collected and published at the earliest period. But the noble Lord (Lord Naas) had shown that these statistics would be of very little value if they did not extend over the whole country. His hon. Friend (Mr. Caird) had suggested various plans for obtaining them, but if he understood him aright he did not wish to make these returns compulsory. His hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Mr. Bass) was, however, quite of another opinion. He said he was compelled to make returns of the beer he brewed, and he did not know why the farmer should not make returns also. It would, therefore, be necessary, according to his hon. Friend, to call for them from the whole of the kingdom, and to make them compulsory upon the farmers. He had communicated with the Registrar General, and a plan, according to the suggestion of his hon. Friend, for obtaining these statistics had been drawn up. It turned out, however, that it would cost £15,000 a year, and that it would, after all, be merely a collection of voluntary returns. The Government did not think, under these circumstances, that they should be justified in asking Parliament to grant such a sum for voluntary statistics. They objected to the present Resolution because it did not advance one step towards the practical attainment of the object in view. If he had misunderstood his hon. Friend, and if he thought the returns should be compulsory and should include the United Kingdom, then he ought to bring in a Bill, and the House would know the means by which he proposed to effect his object. The Ordnance Map would no doubt give facilities for obtaining these statistics, but it was as yet incomplete, and the plan, therefore, of making use of that map for the purpose was one which the House could not at present adopt.

MR. CAIRD, in reply, said, there was a gradual progress of opinion among the farmers in favour of agricultural statistics, and he believed they would work more cordially with a voluntary system than under an Act of Parliament. Many modes of obtaining agricultural statistics had been proposed, and he should himself very much prefer a complete system. He thought an expenditure of £15,000 a mere bagatelle compared with the advantages it would bring. But what he was anxious to do was to get the Government to rouse up from its supineness, and compel them to act by a Resolution of that House. If he desired any recommendation for his mode of action he would refer to the authority of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Milner Gibson) on a similar occasion twenty years ago; and if a subject had been under discussion for twenty years, assuredly it was high time to act. In 1845 the right hon. Gentleman having brought forward the subject of agricultural statistics, was asked by a friendly Government to withdraw his Resolution; but he replied that of all the perplexing situations in which a man could be placed that was one of the most perplexing, because he did not like to take a course hostile to a Government which seemed favourable to his views, but at the same time, if an hon. Member did not carry his Motion to a division, but allowed it to pass away easily in another manner, he was open to censure. He (Mr. Caird) therefore begged to say that he should press his Resolution to a division.

UNIFORMITY ACT.—LEAVE.

(In the Committee.)

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE rose to move that this House will resolve itself into a Committee to consider certain portions of the Act of Uniformity. As he understood that his Resolution was not likely to meet with opposition in the present stage, he would not detain the House by many remarks. He wished to remind the House of the origin of this Bill. It had not originated in any hostility to the Universities, or the Church as connected with the Universities, but with a certain number of gentlemen practically interested in the education of the University of Cambridge, who finding defects in the existing system, proposed what they considered a simple and unobjectionable remedy. The proposal was simply this—that whereas all Fellows of Colleges were required at present by the Act of Uniformity to make a declaration of their conformity to the Liturgy of the Church of England, that requirement should be repealed, and it should be left to the Colleges themselves to make such provision in that respect as might to them seem best in the interest of the Colleges and the University. The requirements of the Act of Uniformity were but of comparatively little importance until about ten years ago, when the University Acts were passed, because at Cambridge no degree could be taken without a declaration that the person taking it belonged to the Church of England, while at Oxford no one could be admitted as a student unless he signed the Thirty-nine Articles. Having taken this test, it was comparatively immaterial to take a simpler and milder one. But by the University Acts of 1854 and 1856 degrees might be taken in Oxford and Cambridge without any religious tests whatever, and the consequence was that persons entered the Colleges and received education there who were unable to take this test required by the Act of Uniformity. It was true that with respect to most Colleges—three or four at Cambridge and one at Oxford excepted—the alteration he proposed would make no difference in the existing state of things, because, with the exceptions he had just mentioned, one of the conditions of fellowship was that the Fellow should be a member of the Church of England; but the reason why he asked the House to consent to the Bill was, because it was a proposal really to give freedom to the Colleges and to avoid Parliamentary interference. The existence of that clause in the Act of Uniformity was an interference with the freedom of those great educational establishments. It was unjustifiable in its origin, as well as in its retention. He did not ask the House to interfere with the free action of the Colleges in this matter, or to force them to choose Fellows to whom they objected on religious or other grounds. All that he asked was that the Colleges might be left to do their best for their respective bodies, and for the interests of the Church and Universities, without interference on the part of Parliament. He did not think that such a request could be justly designated, as it had been on a previous occasion, as an attack on the Church and the Universities. He would fix such a period for the second reading of the Bill as would give those who were opposed to the measure a full opportunity of stating their opinions. The right hon. Gentleman moved that the House resolve into a Committee to consider certain portions of the Act of Uniformity.

MR. SELWYN thought that, as a similar Bill was brought in last Session, it would only be consistent with courtesy and with usual practice to offer no opposition now to the introduction of the measure; but the objections to such a Bill which had been expressed by many hon. Members, and by himself among the number, were not in any degree lessened, and he thought what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman that evening would tend, if anything, to increase them. It must be apparent that the Bill would not give religious liberty to the Colleges, but would introduce religious discord.

Resolved,

That the Chairman be directed to move the House, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to repeal so much of the Act of Uniformity as relates to Fellows and Tutors in any College, Hall, or House of Learning.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. LOCKE rose to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. The Directors of the Docks were attempting by a sidewind to interfere with privileges which had always existed in the port of London, by the introduction of certain words into one clause, and by the framing of another clause, which appeared in the schedule. They were endeavouring to infringe upon a law which had always prevailed, that the merchants of London should have free ingress and egress to the docks by means of lighters. It was an attempt to create a monopoly, and its effect would be to injure much waterside property. A similar attempt had been made in 1855 by dock directors to gain an advantage over wharfingers; but the attempt was then made directly, while now it was made indirectly. That course was then opposed most strongly by the late Mr. Hume, by the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), and also by the right hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell), who was at that time President of the Board of Trade, and the proposal was rejected by no less than ten to one. The clauses to which he objected were Clause 129, and one which appeared in the schedule. The dock Directors had no right to claim privileges which no one else possessed. He understood that representations had been made to the Board of Trade, and that it was suggested by that Department that alterations should be made in the Bill; but he trusted, at all events, that the House would not allow it to pass in its present shape.

MR. CAVE submitted that the hon. Member for Southwark had made a speech which ought to have been made by counsel in Committee, and he thought no cause had been shown for refusing a second reading to a Bill which had passed a Committee of the House of Lords, without any evidence being offered against the preamble; and one clause only of which was opposed by a certain portion of a certain interest. If there were any just cause of complaint, opportunity would be given to state it before a Committee of that House. The hon. Member talked of monopoly, but when these Docks were amalgamated they would only afford accommodation for one-fifth of the shipping of the port of London. The clause which was brought in in 1855 was for the purpose of putting a certain tax upon lighters. That, however, was objected to on the ground that such a tax was against the principle of the Dock Acts, and now the hon. Member asked them to throw out the Bill on account of a totally different clause, brought in for a totally different purpose. No doubt the docks might be considered a part of the port of London for certain purposes—but they were very different from the other part of the port of London, inasmuch as there were very peculiar restrictions put upon them. Their walls must be built a certain height, and other precautionary measures were required to secure the safety of the goods brought into them. In the Committee of which he and the Member for Southwark were Members, evidence had been given of complaints to the Government of depredations committed in the port of London, and it was stated the wharfingers and dockowners had not exercised that surveillance which they ought to have done for the preservation of the property confided to them. Well, that was precisely what they were trying to do by the present Bill. The hon. Member's clients had on a former occasion set themselves against improvements in the trade of the port of London. The President of the Board of Trade, in the year before last, when the Shipping Act was being passed, scarcely dared to go out, so haunted was the lobby of the House by wharfingers and others anxious to state their particular grievances to him. He felt sure that the House would assent to the second reading, with a view to sending the Bill before a Select Committee; and he would not have troubled them with these remarks on a question which was not properly before them, but the hon. Member had given such an air of probability to his story, that Members who had no special knowledge of the subject might possibly think that there was really something in it.

MR. LAYARD said, the House was always very watchful of any Bill that was calculated to create a monopoly. Now, he ventured to say that no private Bill could have a greater tendency to create a monopoly than the Bill before the House. The Dock Companies were attempting to impose certain difficulties upon the river craft which might have the effect of excluding this craft from the amalgamated docks altogether. Ultimately the whole river side might be included in one great dock. There were so many restrictions imposed in the way of permits and other conditions that they virtually amounted to such difficulties as tended to exclude altogether the craft not immediately belonging to the docks. This question was raised in 1855, and he held in his hand a petition presented on the subject which proved that the same identical points were involved in it as they were now discussing. Unless the promoters of the Bill consented to withdraw the obnoxious clauses, he hoped the House would reject the Bill.

SIR MORTON PETO asked the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade whether in 1863 the deputation which then waited upon him upon this subject did not offer to leave the whole question to the decision of the Board of Trade? He submitted that there was no sufficient ground for opposition to the measure. The restrictions complained of were mere matters of police regulation, intended to secure the safety of the goods brought into the docks.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, it was quite true that deputations from the Dock Companies and wharfingers had waited last year upon the Board of Trade, and he had heard both sides of the question. The wharfingers did not make any objection to the amalgamation itself, or to what might be termed the general principle of the Bill. It appeared to him that it would be for the advantage of the trade of London that those three Dock Companies to which the Bill related should be enabled to work together; and that was the purpose for which this Bill had been introduced. Was the House, he asked, prepared to put a veto on the proposition of those Companies, that they should be empowered to make such arrangements as they thought necessary under the circumstances? The wharfingers and lightermen represented that they had always considered themselves entitled to free access to and egress from the docks without being subject to any tax or inconvenient conditions. But the Dock Companies said that they had no wish to interfere in that question—that they were quite willing to carry out any change which could be made, consistently with the great object they had in view—namely, the security of the property in their custody. The lightermen were required by the Dock Companies to produce a pass of a certain character, with the view of affording an opportunity for checking depredations. He thought that that was a reasonable claim on the part of the Dock Companies. It appeared to him that the House ought to assent to the second reading, with a view to sending the Bill to a Select Committee. He thought it would not be just or right to throw out the Bill without sending it before a Select Committee to decide on the points of detail.

MR. J. A. SMITH said, that this was a question vitally affecting the whole of the trading interests of London and not merely the wharfingers; and the question was, whether restrictions should be placed upon the lighters obtaining goods from ships discharging their cargoes. A Committee-room was not the proper place for discussing this subject. The wharfingers had expressed their desire to afford every assistance, and to acquiesce in any arrangements approved or sanctioned by the Board of Trade.

MR. LAYARD asked the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto) if the amalgamated companies would leave the question to the Board of Trade.

SIR MORTON PETO said, the Directors of the Docks were perfectly willing to leave the arrangement of these clauses to the Board of Trade, and an offer to that effect had been made by the Company to which he belonged.

MR. HUBBARD said, it was of the utmost importance to the trade of London that the Dock Companies should have the power of carrying out their work as efficiently and economically as possible; and a production of a proper document by the lightermen to the gatekeepers was a protection necessary to the merchant, the shipowner, and the Crown. Without it there would be no discipline or control. The Companies never had and never could have a monopoly of the lighterage.

MR. LOCKE said, that as he understood this matter was to be referred to the President of the Board of Trade, he was willing to withdraw his Amendment.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS BILL—[BILL 44.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. LAWSON said, that in moving the second reading of the Bill, he desired to make a few observations on a subject which he was aware was not popular in that House, and the discussion of which might not be altogether convenient to some hon. Members. He thought, however, he should be able to show good reasons for the course he was about to take. It would be in the recollection of the House that last Session a promise was made, not in the House but out of doors, by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, that he would introduce a Bill for an alteration and reformation of the licensing system. At the beginning of the last Session he asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he intended to bring in the Bill; and the answer was evasive. In the middle of the Session, however, the right hon. Gentleman stated distinctly that he had abandoned his intention of bringing forward any measure during that Session. On the strength of this he (Mr. Lawson) ventured towards the conclusion of the Session to move a Resolution, not committing the House to any specific mode of action, but simply stating that the existing system was unsatisfactory, and required amendment. He thought this Resolution would have met with larger support than he found that it did receive—it was not brought forward with any intention hostile to Her Majesty's Government—but the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the absence—owing to indisposition—of the Home Secretary, said he should not support the Resolution, because it would be useless for the Government to bring in any measure on the votes of hon. Gentlemen, or an abstract Resolution; who, when the practical proposition came before them, would all take different views; and that the proper course for him to pursue was to bring forward his own views as to the reform of the licensing system, and to discuss them freely and fully on the floor of the House. This was his apology for introducing the measure. But he thought he had another reason which would excuse his conduct, if any one should think that he was pursuing an improper course; and that was, that whatever might be the feeling of the House with regard to the Bill — and he did not say such feeling was hostile — there was undoubtedly out of doors, among a large portion of the community, a strong desire that the measure should pass. That such was the case was manifest from the number of petitions presented to the House in favour of the Bill. Their number was 18,018; of the signatures, 327,000 odd, independently of those just presented that morning. He did not wish to lay too much stress upon this. He was aware that the House looked upon petitions of this kind with distrust; and he was willing to allow a considerable discount. He admitted that the petitions might have been signed in many instances by persons ignorant of the subject, numbers of persons not qualified to give an opinion; some of the signatures might have been obtained through false pretences. He made allowance for all this; but when there were 327,000 names appended to petitions there must be a large number of persons thoroughly in earnest, and who thoroughly understood the subject on which they were petitioning the House — and the prayer of these persons was entitled to weight. There were not many of them who took part in the elections of hon. Members to their seats in that House — for the most part they belonged to the poorer classes of the community. But this was, again, an additional reason why the House should pay some attention to their prayer. One other reason he would venture to adduce. If this agitation was objected to — this growing agitation which was day by day becoming large — it was desirable that the subject should be discussed, and that hon. Members should have an opportunity of showing that the question was founded on folly or fanaticism. Another reason which justified him in bringing forward the Bill was, that although it undoubtedly met with many opponents there was not a single hon. Member who did not concur in the object with which it was introduced. The only question was whether they could so alter the law as to establish in this country an essentially sober population. It was said that the question was not a political one, but was rather one for the platform or the school than for the House of Commons. That was not true. If drunkenness were merely a private vice he should be the last person to come to the House of Commons with a Bill for putting it down; but it was eminently a political question, and the ground that a great public evil existed alone induced him to bring forward the Bill. An article had appeared in the organ of the licensed victuallers, published nearly two years ago, when the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) brought forward a Bill for extending the provisions of the Tippling Act from spirits to beer, which was read a second time and then withdrawn. In that article the Government were denounced for having supported the measure, and the licensed victuallers were called upon to use their influence against them at the next general election. The writer said—

“Here will come in for useful purposes that division list which we published three weeks ago. In the event of a general election it will be the duty of every licensed victualler when applied to for his vote to extract a pledge from the candidate with regard to legislation on licensed victuallers' matters. This pledge will be readily given when required by such a body at such a time.”

This article went on to say that this being the policy of the Government the licensed victuallers would, as they had done on previous occasions, show that as a body they were, politically speaking, the most powerful in the country. The extract then went on to state that there was conclusive evidence that Messrs. Cobden and Bright intended during the recess then approaching to agitate the country with the view of getting rid of the present Government, and that when Lord Palmerston in consequence was forced to appeal to the country, then would have come the opportunity of the licensed victuallers of England, in whose hands it would be whether he should be able to retain office or not. He hoped that nobody would accuse him after that of making the question a political one. It was frequently asserted that it was quite impossible to make the people sober by Act of Parliament; but if so, why had the Legislature passed 400 Acts of Parliament at different times with regard to the drink traffic? They had been passed solely for the purpose of preventing drunkenness. Many hon. Members said they were for free trade in the matter; but was there a single Member who would make himself responsible for introducing a measure to make the traffic in drink perfectly free throughout the country? If they would, they must bear in mind that the argument which they used went to censure the policy of every House of Commons which existed since the Revolution. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a letter which he held in his hand—and he was glad to have the statement in writing, because the right hon. Gentleman sometimes made speeches of which he gave explanations which made them more difficult to be understood—did not talk after that fashion, but admitted that fiscal interests ought not to be allowed to interfere with legislation for regulating the traffic in drink in a social and moral point of view; adding that the matter was one for the consideration of the Secretary for the Home Department—on the ground, probably, that that right hon. Gentleman was the only Member of the Cabinet who had anything to do with morality. But if, he would ask, it was not lawful to legislate with a view to the public morality in the present case, why should the sale of immoral pictures and the setting up of gambling-houses be prohibited. Parliament, in legislating against the latter, did not propose that nobody should gamble any more than he meant to propose that nobody should drink; and it was worthy of remark while upon that point that the Rev. Mr. Clay, the late chaplain of the Preston House of Correction, said he had never conversed with a single prisoner who attributed his misfortunes to gaming; but that he had conversed with upwards of 15,000 prisoners who declared that the enticements of the ale and beer houses had been their ruin. Another high authority, Lord Macaulay, also declared, in addressing the House upon the 'Ten Hours' Bill, that where the public health and morality was concerned it was the duty of the State to interfere with regard to the conduct of individuals. Even the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer took great credit for the legislation of the Government upon this question. Only the other night, on the proposition of the right hon. Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside), the Government declared that the proper way of dealing with the question was to charge the articles a high duty, and to make them as dear as possible without letting in the smuggler. In principle that was precisely the same as the proposition which he (Mr. Lawson) now made. And Mr. John Stuart Mill, a great authority on such matters, declared that to tax stimulants for the purpose of making them difficult to obtain was a measure differing only in degree from their entire prohibition. He presumed that the Government considered that the present laws regulating the drink traffic were perfect, or they would not decline to introduce a general measure. Already this Session they had brought forward a Bill to shut up public-houses for three hours in the night when nobody visited them, and another Bill in reference to the Irish beerhouses. Were they of opinion that that was all they were equal to at present? A great many other measures had been introduced upon this question. The hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) had introduced a Bill to improve beerhouses. Another proposal was what was called the Liverpool plan; but that was rejected. The hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Soames) attempted to prevent the sale of liquors one day in the week; but his Bill was rejected with even greater displeasure than that of the hon. Member for Leominster. In the course of the debate one hon. Gentleman had even thought it statesmanlike and gentlemanly to say that they ought to spit on the Bill—a Bill intended for the amelioration of his fellow-countrymen! The right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary had tried to persuade the House that drunkenness had decreased, and he quoted Returns from the metropolis and Liverpool. But while he spoke of 1863, the right hon. Gentleman quoted Returns of 1862. He believed that that speech was the cause why the Bill of the hon. Member for Hull had been thrown out by so large a majority. Now, in the metropolis there were, in 1858, 26,800 committals for drunkenness; in 1859, 18,700; in 1860, 18,700; in 1861, 17,059; in 1862 (the year the right hon. Gentleman quoted), 18,312; and in 1863 (a slight decrease), 17,651. In Liverpool, in 1860, there were 10,969 committals for drunkenness; in 1861 (the model year), 9,832; in 1862, 12,179; and in 1863, 13,043. He did not think that the right hon. Gentleman would again quote the cases of Liverpool and the metropolis. In 1861, over the whole of England the committals for drunkenness were 82,196; in 1862, 94,988; in 1863, 94,745—a decrease of 243. With respect to Ireland, they had heard it stated the other night that there had been an increase in drunkenness there. In the face of such figures how could the hon. and gallant Member, who had given notice of an Amendment (Captain Jervis), repeat his assertion of last year, that drunkenness had so decreased as to be hardly known. The petitioners whom he represented did not complain of the magistrates who granted the licences, nor of the householders whose certificates were required before a licence could be granted, nor of the houses, nor of the publican or beerhouse keeper—not of the system. He would quote evidence of Members of that House to prove that most respectable men were engaged in this trade of a victualler. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Grenfell) had said—

“I do not believe that since the world began there was ever a more respectable, or more responsible, or better conducted class of men than the licensed victuallers.”

Another Gentleman, the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Hanbury), who confessed that 140 public-houses belonged to his firm, said before the Committee that the licensed victuallers of the present day was altogether a different character from the victualler of twenty years ago—that they were a respectable wealthy class, and had more than any other class improved within the last twenty years. Two years ago the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Bass) said—

But after his eulogium the hon. Member said that the less the licensed victuallers came before the House of Commons the better. The hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. P. W. Martin) considered them an honest honourable body, pursuing a lawful and useful trade. The grievance of those whose case he advocated, was that places for the sale of intoxicating liquors were opened, and that the exceptional privilege of keeping these places was granted to persons with the most complete disregard of the wants and wishes of the inhabitants of the districts in which they were set up. They thought that as they were professed to be for the good of the public, they ought to have a voice in the matter. It was no visionary grievance. Those who had got up the agitation had been styled enthusiasts, fools, fanatics, and Sunday school teachers, but he would show that educated men considered the traffic a nuisance. The Quarterly Review considered public-houses in no other light than as sinks of iniquity, and that no principle of political economy could justify their continuance. The Edinburgh Review of July, 1854, said that the liquor traffic—particularly the retail traffic—was a public nuisance, morally and physically injurious. The Times of the 18th of December, 1853, said—

And The Daily Telegraph spoke of the entire trade as a “covenant with sin and death.” He hoped, therefore, that it would not be said that the cry against it was only got up by enthusiasts. Did anybody ever hear of an enthusiast writing in The Times? The trade in intoxicating drinks had also been condemned by various Committees of that House; and one which sat in 1834 went so far as to recommend that when public opinion was sufficiently awakened, there should be a prohibition both of the importation and distillation of spirits, and that a law should be passed at once, for “the progressive diminution and ultimate suppression of the existing facilities and means of intemperance, as the root of almost every other vice.” The Judges were almost unanimous as to the evil results of intemperance. Barons Garney and Alderson, and Justices Erskine, Coleridge, Patteson, and Wightman, had all expressed their opinions that the large majority of crimes originated at the public-house, and that if it were not for drink, there would be no criminals to try. He did not think that any hon. Gentleman would assert that the present state of things was satisfactory. He remembered a few years ago that the late Mr. Ker Seymour, whose name he could not mention without expressing regret at the loss of one who was a credit and an honour to the House, in replying to him, said, “We may not be good logicians, but we are excellent politicians.” He said that in reference to the licensing system, and the reply was received with much cheering. Now, if that remark meant anything, it was that they proceeded against common sense and reason; but in the end the results were good. Now, what were the results? According to the last Census there were 26,000 prisoners in gaols; 125,000 people in workhouses; 24,000 in lunatic asylums; 11,000 houseless; 23,000 in charitable institutions; and 899,000 receiving relief; and that was in England and Wales only. Now the evidence showed beyond doubt that a great proportion of those persons had been brought to that state by drunkenness. How in the face of such facts could they say they were good politicians? He had stated the evil—he would now propose the remedy. He did not wish to interfere with the magistrates' power of deciding as to the number of licences that should be granted. He did not want to interfere with the Excise in any way except that it should be subject to the expression of public opinion of the districts. But what he proposed was, that if two-thirds of the ratepayers in a parish—he proposed two-thirds, but hon. Members might alter the proportion of the majority in any way they pleased—said they did not want those places, neither the magistrates nor the Excise should have the power to grant licences in that particular district. Some hon. Members might object to this as "the thin edge of the wedge," as a step towards the total prohibition of the liquor trade throughout the country. He could not understand the argument, "Don't let us do right, lest evil should follow." The question they ought to ask themselves was, would it be an improvement upon the present system? The measure would only come into operation where public opinion was in its favour. At present the majority in a parish might tax the minority for the support of religion. If the principle of the majority binding the minority was good for religion, it could not be bad for a matter of police. The system which he proposed had been recommended by the Commission on the Forbes Mackenzie Act in Scotland; and where, from accidental circumstances, houses for the sale of drink had been excluded from a parish, the results had been most beneficial. The Committee for the Suppression of Intoxication reported to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland in the year 1849 that intemperance increased in proportion to the number of licences that were granted, and that where there were no licences there was no intoxication. In thirteen parishes in the south of Scotland, with an aggregate population of about 8,000, in which there were no drinking shops, order and peace prevailed, and the poor rates were on the lowest scale; in eight other parishes, of about equal population, in which there were twenty drinking shops, there was an unusually large amount of pauperism and crime. In the parish of Hamberstone in England strong drink had never been sold, and there was not a pauper in the parish; and at Hutton Mile and at Saltair, which was built by Mr. Titus Salt, similarly beneficial effects had followed the exclusion of the liquor traffic. Landlords were perpetually using the power which they possessed to prohibit the establishment of drinking houses on their estates. Last year the hon. Member for Devonshire (Sir Lawrence Palk) said that there was not a proprietor of land who did not stipulate that no beer-shops or public-houses should be erected upon their estates without their consent. "Therefore, let them not legislate on false pretences in that House, but act there as they did in private in endeavouring to check drunkenness." Those were noble words, and he hoped that he would to-day endorse them by his vote. Last year the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) wrote a letter, in which he suggested that the Sunday Closing Bill might be made permissive. Would not the same principle apply to their closing on Mondays? The hon. Member for Maidstone (Mr. Buxton) had also suggested that if five-sixths of the ratepayers demanded the exclusion of houses for the sale of fermented liquors, their prayer should be granted; and the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) said the other night, that if the majority of the working people were in favour of the Sunday Closing Bill, he would vote for it. His Bill could not come into force except at the wish of the majority of the ratepayers. He was obliged to say ratepayers, because he did not know how else to construct a register; but if the hon. and learned Gentleman could shew him how to include all the inhabitants, he should be ready to do so. He asked him whether, now that he brought forward a Bill which could not come into force except by the will of the people he was going to oppose him? If he did, the working people would not fail to give him that name which he so liberally bestowed upon any one who happened to differ from him, and for the rest of his political career he would be called a "canting hypocrite." ["Order, order!" Mr. ROEBUCK: Never regard it.] He was much obliged to the House for having listened to him with so much attention, and he would only ask that, before they threw out the Bill, they would carefully consider whether the power which he proposed to give to the people was one which they could exercise to the injury of the State, or whether, on the contrary, it was not the case that they could only exercise it to promote their own happiness, and to encourage that spirit of morality and love of order which were the only true foundation of the greatness of this country.

CAPTAIN JERVIS rose to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. The hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Lawson) had stated that if the measure were supported by those Gentlemen who specially represented the working classes, it might possibly pass into law. Now, no Member of the House represented the working classes more directly than he (Captain Jervis) did. There was only one person among his constituents who was not a working man, and three-fourths of them were men who worked with their hands as well as their heads. He had, therefore, a peculiar right to speak in the name of the working classes, and on their behalf he felt bound to oppose the present measure. He had also to observe that he had, much against his will, spent five months in the Maine Liquor Law States of America, and that his experience there convinced him of the utter futility of such an enactment. It was, besides, opposed to our whole constitutional system that any number of people who chose to drink nothing but water should compel other men, however limited in number, to follow their example. And how could that Bill be carried into effect with our parochial divisions? He saw in the State of Vermont—one of the States in which the sale of liquor was prohibited—persons who could not obtain drink in one district cross over a bridge into another district, where they obtained as much as they could pay for; and in the same way they would find that, under the present Bill, the same process would be carried on with still greater facility, for the distinction would be between parishes only instead of States.

Mr. Lawson

How did the law operate in America? In the Maine Liquor Law States the law was systematically evaded. After a dish of oysters and molasses people found placed before them some milk and water. But the inhabitants drank nothing at dinner. After a few days' experience of that practice, he asked a gentleman how he provided himself with drink? and the gentleman introduced him to a friend who, for a present of so many dollars made him a present of so many bottles of sherry, which were forwarded to his hotel. The fact was, that there was more drinking than ever in those States, only it took place clandestinely instead of openly, and in the cellar instead of at the bar or the table; the men got drunk down below, and there they were kept because the landlord knew that he would be punished if they were seen; and that system was productive of at least as large an amount of immorality as the system which it superseded. What were the reasons which had induced those States to adopt such a law? The people in them were hard-working and thrifty, but not at all hospitable. One might live a long time in Massachusetts or Vermont without being asked out to dinner; and when they did ask you the law afforded them a good excuse for saying that they had nothing but water to put before you. But after the stranger had established friendly relations with the family, when he came in they would say, "Are you thirsty?" Looking at a jug of dirty cold water, he would say, "No." Then they would tell him, "If you go to that cupboard perhaps you may find something more to your taste." The "cupboard" was a nice pantry, where there was brandy and other kinds of spirits. He had, however, to go there by himself, and to return as if he had been passing his time in no kind of self-indulgence. When families drank anything stronger than water they had to close the shutters and exclude the light of day, lest they might be detected, and compelled to pay a heavy fine. Was that a system which it was desirable to introduce into England? Were 28,000,000 of people in this country to do penance for the sake of the prejudice of a few thousand? In speaking of the increase of drunkenness the hon. Member had said nothing about the increase of population, which would help to account for the number of convictions for drunkenness; and he seemed also to have forgotten that the same persons were often convicted of the same offence. He felt himself fully justified in saying—and every one knew it to be the fact—that of late years drunkenness had been decreasing in this country, not from penal enactments, but in consequence of the spread of education among the people, and the teachings of the clergy and ministers of all denominations, and the example of the higher classes. He was himself brought into frequent communication with the working classes, and he had been surprised often not to find one of them intoxicated from one end of the week to the other. Many panaceas had been devised for the total eradication of drunkenness. The right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department had made one attempt in that direction. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Maidstone (Mr. Buxton) had also made known his views upon that subject in a pamphlet, in which he attributed all the evils on earth to drinking after ten o'clock at night. The hon. Gentleman said that if the working man bought his beer and took it home, probably there would be no drunkenness; but that if he drank it at a public-house he would be sure to stay to smoke his pipe, drink more than he ought, and go home and beat his wife. He seemed to suppose a man never beat his wife before ten p.m.; but the police reports showed that men beat their wives at all hours of the day, and in Pickwick Mr. Weller, senior, is made to say, "You know what the counsel said, Sammy, as defended the man for beating his wife with the poker—that, arter all, it was an amiable weakness." He thought that some very absurd reasons had been adduced in support of this Bill. He must protest against the time of the House being taken up with a Bill like the present for the sake of gratifying a number of benevolent old ladies and gentlemen who took an active part in the agitation of this question. It was all very well to present petitions numerously signed in favour of this measure; but if those documents were examined, and if the signatures of children and the signatures of persons obtained at the rate of 6s. a 1,000 were substracted, they would not be found to be worth much; and with reference to the petition presented by the hon. Member for Birmingham, he would venture to say that if the 18,000 signatures appended to it were put to the test the number of real petitions would be found to be much nearer 1,800.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Captain Jervis.)

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I think my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Lawson) has at least no reason to complain of the manner in which the House has listened to the statement which he has made on behalf of his clients throughout the country. The House has listened to his speech in a manner which proves that this is a question which is getting more hold of the mind of the country than it had some time ago, and that it cannot be treated as the vision of a few wild enthusiasts. Everybody will agree that the evil which the hon. Member has to some extent explained is a very grievous one in almost every part of the country; and more—I believe every Member will say that if any measures could be taken that did not violate any of the recognized principles on which this House acts, to help those who are making great exertions to change the people of this country from their past and, I fear, their present condition into a happier state, such measures ought to be sanctioned. Now, as to the remedy, which is the real question before us. I believe there are only two modes of remedy; the first of which is the improvement and instruction of the people—and the second, the special legislation of this House. Now, I am one of those who look rather to the improvement and education of the people, for a permanent remedy—and I think that it is quite conclusive that that must be the sheet anchor, as it were, of this question. There are hon. Members of this House older than I am, but I am old enough to remember when among those classes with which we are more familiar than with the working people, drunkenness was ten or twenty times more common than it is at present. I have been in this House twenty years, and during that time I have often partaken of the hospitality of various Members of the House, and I must confess that during the whole of those twenty years I have no recollection of having seen one single person at any gentleman's table who has been in the condition which would be at all fairly described by saying that he was drunk. And I may say more—that I do not recollect more than two or three occasions during that time in which I have observed, by the thickness of utterance, rapidity of talking, or perhaps a somewhat recklessness of conversation, that any gentleman had taken so much as to impair his judgment. That is not the state of things which prevailed in this country fifty or sixty years ago. We know, therefore, as respects this class of persons, who can always obtain as much of these pernicious articles as they desire to have, because price to them is no object, that temperance has made great way, and if it were possible now to make all classes in this country as temperate as those of whom I have just spoken, we should be amongst the very soberest nations of the earth. Well, it may be said after all this, that there is something to be done by special legislation—and I am not disposed to contradict that; and if any Member were to contradict it, it would be going in the face of experience, and certainly in the face of the opinion which has been universally held by this House. All our legislation on this question has been special. My hon. Friend says he thinks no one would dare to propose to make the sale of intoxicating drinks free—as free for example as the sale of bread, potatoes, or any of the articles of ordinary consumption. If we required no taxes I do not know how we should treat this question; but, requiring taxes as we do, it has been thought in this country, and I suspect in most other countries too—certainly in many—that there is nothing upon which taxes can be levied with greater advantage (if I may use the term “advantage” in connection with the levying of any taxes) as upon articles of an intoxicating quality. But having levied these taxes, and finding the consumption is large, the Government finds it also necessary to provide certain superintendence by the police; because, unfortunately, wherever the sale of these articles is considerable, there is found to be a state of things which is not favourable to obedience to the law, and which magistrates, policemen, and the law are called in to avert and prevent. We have this special legislation now, and my hon. Friend says not less than 400 Acts of Parliament dealing with this question have been before the House—not all of them with a view of preventing the consumption of intoxicating liquors, but it shows what a constant and incessant attention Parliament has been obliged to pay to this subject. Now we come to the system as we find it, and ask ourselves, Can anything more be done? Under the present system, if a man wishes to sell beer only, he gets six of his neighbours to sign a recommendation that he is a suitable and respectable man. I believe also the rent of his house has something to do with it, as indicating that he is a man not absolutely without means and character. But if he wishes to sell wine and spirits he must ask the magistrates for a licence, and the licence is renewable from year to year. I think it may be generally said that this system is not satisfactory to people throughout the country. There are many magistrates who condemn the system of which they are a part; and in many towns it is said—and I think upon inquiry we should find it to be true—that the magistrates give licences too freely; and men who live in quiet streets of a town are angry with the magistrates for giving licences to houses which were not needed. We also find that there is a great diversity of action, for in some villages, towns, and districts, public-houses are much more frequent than in others; and at the same time there is a complaint that in giving licences for the sale of beer the recommendation of six benevolent neighbours is given more through kindness to the applicant than kindness to the great bulk of the neighbourhood. In some cases the number of beerhouses has been unnecessarily and mischievously increased. And now what does my hon. Friend propose? He proposes something that is entirely distinct, and to some extent, in point of fact, a revolutionary measure, with regard to this system. He proposes that two-thirds of the ratepayers of any district, parish, or town shall have the power to decide the whole of this question; and I think when the hon. Gentleman stated that proposal, an hon. Gentleman on the other side of the House, and an hon. Gentleman sitting near me, made gestures as if they thought the ratepayers were not represented by the working classes. But the working classes are ratepayers in a larger number than any other class, for they are generally married and have families, and live in houses that pay taxes; and therefore if you take the opinion of the ratepayers of this country on any question, you take in as clear a manner as possible the opinion of the people of the country. Well, my hon. Friend proposes that two-thirds shall decide;—but decide what? Why, by this Bill, they are to decide first of all whether any new licences shall be granted in the district to which the vote applies—that is, whether this Act shall be in force in the district—and they are to decide further whether any of the persons now licensed shall have those licences renewed at the expiration of the present year. [“No, no!” “Hear, hear!”] That is what I understand by the Bill. I believe all licences are merely granted for selling drink from year to year. I think it was one of the statements of the licensed victuallers that the magistrates had the absolute control over them, and that there was no appeal from their decision, and every year they could refuse to renew any licences if they thought fit. It will thus be seen that my hon. Friend proposes a Bill which affects some scores of thousands of persons and with regard to some millions of property, and the measure which he proposes is entirely different, I think, from anything which has ever been proposed or sanctioned by the House with regard to any other description of property or any other interest. Therefore, however sanguine I may be as to what I must call the violent success of his measure, and however desirous I may be to carry out his object, I do not think it likely that the House of Commons would consent to such a proposition as that. What is meant by the representative system is not that you should have the vote of thousands of persons taken upon a particular question of legislation—but that you should have men selected from those thousands having the confidence of the majority of the thousands, and they should meet and should discuss questions for legislation, and should decide what measures should be enacted; and therefore in this particular question I should object altogether to disposing of the interest of a great many men, and also a great many families, and a great amount of property—I should object altogether to allow such a matter to be decided by the vote of two-thirds of the ratepayers of any parish or town. By this Bill they would have the power to shut up at once, or rather at the end of the current year, as far as the sale of these articles is concerned, every hotel, inn, public-house, and beer-shop throughout the country. I say throughout the country, but of course I allude to such subdivisions of the country as the Bill may indicate. There would of course be a difference, for some parishes would shut them up and some would not; but that is not very much an argument against the Bill. But there might be, and I think there would be, in all probability, violent, sudden, capricious, and unjust action under this Bill, which would have a very unfortunate effect upon the interests of those immediately concerned; and I think it might also create throughout the country violent discussions on the question, and I am afraid might even produce a great and pernicious re-action against the very honest and good objects which my hon. Friend desires to carry out. For that reason, as a Member of this House, representing a very large constituency, and having my sympathies entirely with those who are endeavouring to promote temperance amongst the people, and after much consideration on this subject, I have never yet seen my way at all to give a vote which would tend to pass a measure such as that now proposed to the House. But then if there be persons who think that the sale of these articles is in itself absolutely evil and immoral—and I did not understand my hon. Friend to hold that opinion, or to have stated it to the House—but if there be persons of that opinion, they, of course, will not be influenced by any arguments of mine. I do not hold that opinion—and I think the friends of temperance throughout this country make a great mistake when they argue their cause on that ground. There is abundant ground on which to argue this question on which no man can assail or controvert them, and it is unfortunate for a great and good cause that any of its enthusiastic but illogical advocates should select arguments which cannot fairly be sustained. Now, the question comes, if this Bill were disposed of, is there nothing which the House could do to meet the growing opinion in many parts of the country that public-houses and beer-shops are often established with pernicious influence upon the district, and in far greater numbers than the fair wants of the people demand? I bring no charge against the magistrates. So far as I have seen, with some few exceptions of which we have heard, they perform their duty, and a disagreeable duty it is, as well as any body of men to whom you could intrust it. With regard to the householders, they are very likely to give recommendations with more regard to the persons themselves than to the wants of the public. Judging from the evidence brought before the Committees of this House, it must be admitted that public opinion does not entirely agree with the mode which is at present in existence for the granting of licences, whether they be public-houses, or beer-houses; and looking at the course which the Government has taken—I do not mean this Government in particular, but the course Parliament has taken in past times—I do not see any reason why the public opinion of every city, town, and district should not have something to say with regard to this matter. Now some time ago, when I was down at Birmingham, a large number of persons connected with this question had an interview with me and my hon. Colleague. We had a long discussion on the question, and I explained to them what I now wish to explain to the House—that although objecting to the Bill on the grounds which I have stated, yet it does appear to me that the House might proceed a step further than it has already done, and intrust to the ordinary local governing bodies of the cities, towns, and boroughs throughout the kingdom the decision of this question, with regard to the establishment of public-houses and beer-shops, and the granting of licences within the limits of their jurisdiction. You cannot put this power into the hands of the Secretary of State or the Lord Chancellor, as you do the magistrates' question; and you cannot remove it from twenty magistrates and put it into the hands of some half-dozen men in the same neighbourhood. You can make no change from where you are, unless you intrust to the municipal council, or some committee of the municipal council, in the various boroughs, the power of determining the number of licences as regards wine and spirits or beer. If you were to intrust the Council, instead of the full vote of the ratepayers, as proposed by the Bill, I think you would avoid everything like a sudden and violent interference with property, and you would avoid the capricious action which might take place if two-thirds of the ratepayers were to judge this question, and you would give to the whole body of the ratepayers through their representative in their municipal councils, the determination of a question which every day is becoming more and more an important question with the great masses of the people of this country. I know no proposal which could be made from the point where we now stand to the point of the Bill of my hon. Friend except the one which I have suggested. Generally, the municipal councils in this country perform their duties with admirable success, and there is no Bill passed in this century which has been so successful as the one which this House passed to reform the corporations. If they had further this power I think it would add to their influence and dignity; and, in all probability, the opinions of the people would be fairly carried out in reference to this question. But there is another question. Hon. Gentlemen opposite would say that this could not be done in the rural districts, where there are no corporations, and therefore my suggestion could not apply. But I think if it were attempted in the towns, and it was found more advantageous and successful than the present system, something could be found before long to extend the new system to the agricultural districts as well: but if that should be found impracticable, it is no reason for debarring the towns from the benefit. I should not have brought such a question as this before the House, and I am not so sanguine of the result of those changes as what I may call the temperance party in this House. I have not that faith in any act of the Legislature on this subject which my hon. Friend has. I believe in the effects of the instruction of the people, and of the improvement which is gradually taking place amongst them. I think that drunkenness is not on the increase but rather is declining; and I hope, whether the law be altered or not, we shall find our working classes becoming more and more sober than in past times. But as I have on many occasions been before the public as favouring the efforts of the advocates of temperance in this country, I have felt bound in some degree to state the reasons why I cannot give my vote in favour of this Bill, and to suggest, in my opinion, what this House might do by way of giving to the people through their municipal councils control over this question. By doing this you might promote temperance among the people, and at the same time avoid doing a great and manifest injustice to thousands of persons now engaged in this trade, whose property would be rendered uncertain if not altogether destroyed, which would be the result if the Bill of the hon. Gentleman should receive the sanction of the House.

MR. ROEBUCK: Sir, I wish to state my opinions of the hon. Gentleman's Bill very shortly. I have now been many years in Parliament, and during the whole course of my experience I never heard submitted to the consideration of the House a more mischievous measure. I do not mince the matter at all. I will state why I believe it to be so. In the first place, the House is called upon to abdicate its functions. In the next place, the proposal of the hon. Member would sow dissension in every parish of the kingdom, and from the time when it came into full operation England would be no place for a peaceable man to live in. The third reason I have for considering the Bill what I have described it is, that it is eminently a measure levelled against the poor. It is, therefore, an eminently unjust and cruel Bill. Now, when I have gone through those separate propositions, I think that the House will be of opinion that I have established my points, and have done enough to show the character of the Bill. But before I proceed to discuss those points, let me make an observation or two to the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Lawson) himself. In introducing the Bill he was always approaching but never actually coming to the question; but he read all sorts of extracts upon a matter upon which every one was of one mind, that drunkenness was a bad thing which every one desired to put an end to, if it was possible that it could be done. I may here be permitted to say of a large number who support the measure, that I believe them to be very well-intentioned persons. I have great faith in their intentions, but none in their intellect—and, begging pardon of the hon. Gentleman, the advocacy of this measure seems to me to be an idle means of talking before the public, and that it cannot have been seriously proposed. We have been told of persons trying to make "political capital" out of certain subjects, and I cannot understand a Gentleman proposing a measure which he knows he cannot pass, but to gratify a certain class of persons and thereby make political capital out of it. Without any further remarks upon what the hon. Gentleman has said, or the taste which he has exhibited, I will at once address myself to the three propositions I have laid down. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) has most correctly stated the real object of the representative system to be, that in all cases requiring legislation we must do for the people what the people require, and not call upon them to do for themselves that which they delegate to us. In this consists the great difference between the English constitution and those of the ancient republics. In those the whole body of the citizens was called into the market-place and asked to legislate on a particular point; the modern system takes the question out of the hands of the people and places it in those of their representatives. But the hon. Gentleman is departing from that path which policy and experience have taught us to be the true one, and he is going back to the olden times, and throwing into the hands of the people that which it was the object of the representative system to take out of them. Therefore, if we now do what the hon. Gentleman asks we shall be abdicating our functions, and thereby do a cowardly and foolish act. We shall show ourselves afraid of opposing that vast array of petitions which the hon. Gentleman has raised before us, and we shall ask the people to do for themselves what we, their representatives, have not the courage to do or the courage to refuse. The hon. Gentleman proposes to give to ratepayers of every parish and to every municipality the power of suppressing the trade in intoxicating liquors within its limits. Now what will be the effect of the measure, if passed? We have it stated that in America, where the Maine Liquor Law prevails, the people walk over a bridge into another state, where they can get what they want. Then the inhabitants of one of the prohibiting parishes who wanted strong drinks would only walk into the next parish where there was no prohibition. But let the hon. Gentleman define his intentions a little more strictly. Supposing the ratepayers of Westminster should decide to put an end to the sale of intoxicating drinks within their district, would it extend to the refreshment rooms of the Houses of Parliament. It ought to do so. And not only that, we, having abdicated our functions, must succumb to the City of Westminster, and say that they are much better able to judge of the question than we are; and as they have decided that intoxicating liquors shall not be sold within their district, they must not come within the walls of this House. Can anything be more foolish than that? Supposing, for example, we were to say that all dangerous articles should be put under a ban, and none sold—such as poisons for instance. Would any man say poisons should not be sold? No; but a wise man would say, they must be sold under proper precautions. And that is what we say now; poisons, we say, shall not be sold without due precautions are taken to let the public know that they are buying them. The same with regard to fire. Every man is allowed to make a fire in his own chimney, but not in his neighbour's rick-yard. There are proper precautions taken against the sale of dangerous commodities, or the doing of a dangerous act; and the Government has taken the same precautions with regard to the sale of intoxicating liquors. No man can sell beer except he has obtained a certificate on the recommendation of six of his neighbours; and no man can sell wine without a licence from a magistrate; and these were wise and proper precautions. I do not go so far as the hon. Member for Birmingham, in supposing that these precautions are not sufficiently taken, and his proposal is pretty nearly as mischievous, though not quite so, as that of the hon. Gentleman. I now come to my three propositions. I say first that this is eminently a rich man's Bill. The poor man cannot lay in a stock of wine or of beer. He cannot send to the next town or parish, but he must have it nearer his own door. The poor man has no means by which he can buy that which he desires to drink month by month, but he must do it day by day; and as you are enabling the rich man to do that which you are depriving the poor man of the power of doing, I say it is a cruel Bill. Let it go out to the world—and I am not afraid of any imputation the hon. Gentleman can cast on me—that I say, in spite of all that has been said, that this is eminently a cruel Bill, and that it is not a Bill for the benefit of the poor. There is a class of mind so intolerant, so impatient of dissent, that in its time it has given rise to the Inquisition, burnt Servetus at the stake, and it has made the hon. Gentleman bring in this Bill. Before I sit down let me say one word with reference to the proposal that has been made by the hon. Member for Birmingham. The greater part of the speech which the hon. Gentleman has just delivered I very much admire, for I can hardly imagine wiser words expressed in a better manner; but when he began to build up instead of pull down, then I think he showed his weakness. The hon. Gentleman said, "Cannot we take a step in advance, and give to the municipal bodies the power of deciding whether or not intoxicating liquors shall be sold within their bounds?" The hon. Gentleman seems to dissent, but that is as I understand him.

MR. BRIGHT: What I said was that I thought it would be a great injustice that any popular vote should have the power of cutting off all the property in existing public-houses; and that rather than that should be done I would prefer giving the power to the municipality.

MR. ROEBUCK: That is as I understood the hon. Member. But what will be the consequence; and I ask the hon. Gentleman to listen to me whilst I endeavour to reason as quietly and as I calmly can upon that proposition. The municipal body is an elective body, and such a proceeding would put into their hands a certain power which would very much interest large classes by whom they are elected; and, as the licensing would be annual, you would have constant debates and disputes going on with reference to a matter which very much interests a large body of the inhabitants. Under the present system the power is lodged in the hands of gentlemen who are nominated by the Crown. They are magistrates for life unless something be done to the contrary; and by the very fact of holding office for life, while at the same time they are subject to the moral influence of people round them, are very much more likely to perform their duties in a manner free from that capricious action of which the hon. Member for Birmingham complains. Therefore, as between the municipal bodies and the magistrates, I am for continuing the power in the hands of the magistrates as at present. There is one argument which deserves, and which I know will receive the attention of hon. Gentlemen opposite; but I cannot sit down without one word of warning, especially addressed to hon. Members such as the hon. Member for Carlisle. The public, as we have seen, are very likely to be misled—they are very likely to follow a cry, and they are likely to entertain a crochet; and I have always found that men who entertained a crochet are amongst the most intolerant of mankind. They will not hear of dissent—men who differ from them are not allowed simply to obey the dictates of their own reason, and come before them as men exercising their own reason, but they must be called, as they have been called, because they oppose this measure—drunkards; they are called immoral. I do not say by the hon. Member for Carlisle, for I cannot imagine he would be so far forgetful of good taste, though he might call me "a canting hypocrite."

MR. LAWSON: I did not as from myself use any such expression.

MR. ROEBUCK: Neither do I make any personal application—I merely say what another has said, and that the House will perceive makes all the difference. Such persons call their opponents “drunkards,” but that epithet does not apply to the hon. Gentleman. Some men call them “liars”—that expression does not apply to the hon. Gentleman. I entreat those hon. Gentlemen to learn to bear opposition, and not to think all who differ from them rogues, drunkards, and liars.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, he should oppose the Bill, believing it would be productive of worse evils than those that now existed. In the year 1736 an Act was passed to limit the sale of spirits, and it had been found to work very injuriously. There had been no fewer than 12,000 convictions under the Act, and it finally became—to use the words of a noble Lord in another place with respect to it—so odious and contemptible, that policy as well as humanity induced the Commissioners of Excise to mitigate the penalties imposed on those who had been convicted. If the present Bill passed, the probability was that it would create greater mischief than those against which it was levelled. If the decision in regard to the permission to open public-houses was left to the ratepayers in rural parishes, it would produce class legislation of the worst possible kind, because the great majority of cottages were not rated to the poor rates. The persons who would decide the question would be those who had the means of supplying themselves with wine and beer in quantities, and who had no occasion to resort to the public-house. He looked upon the Bill as being a piece of legislation of the worst possible kind. In civilized society, and in the complicated state of our social relations, an immense amount of capital could not be destroyed without the infliction of great and unnecessary hardship. He could not therefore vote for the second reading of the Bill.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he should not have troubled the House on this occasion if it were not for the fact that for many years he had been in the habit of presenting petitions in favour of Bills of this nature and then of voting against them. He thought it was due to those who had intrusted him with petitions to state why he could not possibly agree with the prayers which they contained. The practice of the English law was to pass enactments against crime itself or against overt acts, but not against acts which by construction or inference might be supposed to lead to crime. If a different principle were admitted there would soon be an end to the personal liberty of the subject. He thought that the idea of intrusting to majorities all over the country the regulation of matters of this nature would be productive of a great amount of annoyance and irritation. He thought, too, the promoters of this Bill showed a great distrust of their own principles—because if the regeneration of the country was to depend upon sobriety, why was a measure like this made permissive, instead of compulsory? The irritation produced would also be increased tenfold by the notion that those by whom such a law was passed were not one whit better than themselves, if, indeed, they were half as good. Hon. Members were all anxious to put down drunkenness as much as it was possible, but they must trust to the influence of education and example, and not to the introduction of an offensive measure of this nature. He did not think that the action of municipal councils would afford a satisfactory solution of the question. It must be remembered that at present the granting of licences did not depend altogether upon the action of the magistrates, as the beerhouse licences were granted by the Excise. The magistrates, therefore, could not be held responsible for the drunkenness and immorality arising from licensed houses, the granting of which were entirely beyond their control. He was ready to give his best attention to any measure for the better regulation of public-houses, but a law that carried into effect the impulses and chance feeling of a majority in any district would strike a fatal blow at the proper action of Parliament. Nothing could be more capricious than the working of such a measure. The property in one parish would be depreciated, while that of the next parish might be increased 200 per cent by the legislation of its neighbours. The older a man became the less confidence he felt in Acts of Parliament. Every additional Act of Parliament was in truth an additional evil, unless a strong case were made out in its favour. For these reasons he should vote against the Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that as every hon. Member who had addressed the House after the hon. Member for Carlisle had spoken against the Bill, he should occupy the attention of the House only a few minutes in stating the objections he entertained to the measure. His hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle had, he thought, done well in following the advice of the Chancellor of the Exchequer last Session in introducing a Bill instead of a mere abstract Resolution. He would admit also that the speech of the hon. Gentleman was characterized by great moderation and fairness; nor, having regard to the number of petitions for the Bill, had his hon. Friend exaggerated the strength of public feeling in its favour. Every one would sympathize with the hon. Gentleman and those who acted with him in the desire to put a check upon drunkenness, which was the source of a vast number of crimes. He must, however, differ from his hon. Friend as to the alleged increase of drunkenness. He (Sir George Grey) had on a former occasion stated, and he now repeated his belief, that drunkenness was not on the increase in this country, but that in consequence of the improved habits and education of the people and the moral influences at work among them, drunkenness was on the decline. The hon. Gentleman alleged that he (Sir George Grey) had selected the returns he had quoted on this subject last year, and that they did not give a correct view of the case; he had, however, simply referred to the latest return then on the table of the House. He was glad to find that subsequent inquiries confirmed the opinion that he then expressed on the subject. An increase of convictions was not necessarily a proof of an increase of the offence itself. The police were now spread over the whole country, and they exerted great vigilance; a new class of offences had also been created by the recent Acts of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in reference to wine licences and refreshment houses. Therefore, in looking at the number of convictions, they must take into account the nature of the offences as well as the number of convictions. The hon. Gentleman ought also to bear in mind the large increase of population that was going on year by year. He entertained a decided opinion that the remedy proposed by his hon. Friend would be impracticable in large towns; but if it could be brought into operation it would create an intolerable tyranny on the part of the majority over the minority. His hon. Friend said that, as they had frequently passed laws for regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, they were in principle favourable to the entire prohibition of the sale. That proposition he (Sir George Grey) entirely denied — there was an essential difference between regulation and prohibition, which he thought his hon. Friend had lost sight of. The hon. Member said that Parliament prohibited the sale of immoral books, and why not also of intoxicating liquors? But, because every one admitted that the sale of immoral books ought to be prevented, his hon. Friend, to be consistent, ought to propose a measure to prohibit the sale of books altogether, and allow the majority of the ratepayers to say that no shops for the sale of books should be opened. His hon. Friend had, he thought, fallen into an error in quoting the Report of the Committee of that House of 1834 on drunkenness. The Committee did not recommend, when public opinion should be sufficiently awakened, the prohibition of distillation or sale of intoxicating liquors, but merely gave this as the opinion of some of the witnesses they had examined. His hon. Friend proposed by his Bill that any number of ratepayers might set the machinery of his Bill in operation. They might, by application to the mayor of any borough, require that a canvass should be instituted to see whether the Bill should come into operation in the borough or not. This was, he thought, a most mischievous provision. In the large cities and towns there were thousands of ratepayers, and a canvass of that kind would be most prejudicial to the peace and good feeling now existing. If a majority could be obtained for putting the machinery of the Act in motion, it could not, if adopted, be disturbed for three years. The consequence would be that, after the Act was brought into operation, no person could for three years at least sell any intoxicating liquor within the limits of the borough or parish in question with the exception of those the term of whose licences had not expired. But, after the 10th of October, the time for the renewal of licences, every public-house or beershop would be absolutely closed for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and it would not be lawful for any one to sell or buy a glass of wine, beer, cyder, or spirits in the whole of the borough. If this Bill were adopted in large places the effect would be, he repeated, an intolerable tyranny. He did not hesitate to declare that it would be quite impossible to carry such an Act into effect by any penalties that would be imposed. Supposing, however, that it could be carried into law, what hardships would it not create? It would inflict, as the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield had said, cruel hardships on the poor, while it would hardly touch the rich. The rich and the middle classes would keep their cellars well stored; but the poor man had no cellars, and no beer to put into them, and he would therefore be debarred from the enjoyment of that which he (Sir George Grey) considered a perfectly innocent beverage, and which was in many cases a necessary of life. His hon. Friend failed to distinguish between the use and abuse of intoxicating liquors, and because drunkenness was a great evil, he thought the only means of preventing it was by an absolute prohibition of the sale of the common beverage of the people. Believing that Parliament was not prepared to adopt the proposal of the hon. Gentleman, he trusted that he would not press it against the manifest sense of the House. At the same time Parliament would not be wise in discouraging all legitimate means of preventing and checking drunkenness. He had on a former occasion expressed an opinion that the law was not enforced as it ought to be by those in whom its administration was vested. Great complaints were made that no effective supervision was exercised over beerhouses, and he was therefore anxious to explain the provisions of the law. By the 1 Will. IV. c. 4, if a keeper of a beershop were convicted for the third time of permitting drunkenness and disorderly conduct in his house he might be disqualified from selling beer during the space of two years. It might be said that this was not a severe punishment, because the beershop keeper would put a son or a friend in possession to carry on the business for him. The law, however, not only visited him with a personal disqualification, but declared that the house might be closed for the sale of beer. By a Return of 1861-2, it appeared that in the metropolitan districts in 1861 there were no less than forty-four beerhouse keepers convicted of a third offence; in the first five months of 1862 there were fifteen; and there was not one case in which the licence was withdrawn and the house closed. It was not generally known, he believed, that this power existed, and there was nothing more rare than closing a beerhouse for two years. If it were closed, however, the loss to the owner of the property was considerable, and he thought it would be well if the power were more frequently exercised. It would be quite impossible to carry the Bill of the hon. Gentleman into effect, and if it were practicable, the consequences would be most injurious. He, therefore, hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press his measure.

MR. BUXTON said, he desired to say a few words with regard to the passages that had been quoted by the hon. Member for Carlisle from an article written by him (Mr. Buxton) many years ago, and of which, he confessed, he now felt somewhat ashamed. It might be thought strange that any man in his position should have written at all upon a question as to how drunkenness might be diminished. On the contrary, no one could have stronger motives for examining what could be done to make that traffic harmless than those who were personally connected with it. In writing that paper he had endeavoured to consider the subject as impartially as if he had not been interested in the matter himself; but certainly if he could have foreseen that the authorship of it would have been discovered, he should have written with somewhat more regard to what artists would call "keeping." At that time, however, the Maine Law seemed to be a brilliant success in doing away with pauperism and crime, and he could not, therefore, exclude the consideration whether it could be adopted in any modified form in this country. Since that time experience had shown—what common sense might have suggested—that such violent compulsion, though it might gain its end for a time, would at last prove a failure; and he was persuaded that if this Bill became law it would produce unbounded irritation and inconvenience. The hon. Gentleman's friends had not treated him (Mr. Buxton) quite fairly about that review. They had asked him to allow it to be republished; but on looking it over he had found it was so hasty and crude that he had absolutely declined. In spite of that the passages he most regretted had been republished without the context which modified them. He would not enter into the general question beyond assuring his hon. Friend of the respect he felt for him and for all who were striving to lessen that tremendous evil of drunkenness. At the same time he was persuaded that the way to cope with it was to use all possible means of elevating the character of the working class. An attempt of this kind would, he felt sure, prove futile as regarded drunkards, and unjust to those who were sober.

MR. HUMBERSTON said, that as six ratepayers were at present entitled to recommend a beerhouse-keeper for a licence, in spite of the opposition of the owner of perhaps three-fourths of the property in the parish, why should not the signatures of six other ratepayers against the licence be equally efficacious to prevent the house from being opened? In these travelling days it must be remembered the inhabitants of a town would not only legislate for themselves, but also for those travellers who might visit their town.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to explain why, while sympathizing with the object, he could not vote for the second reading of the Bill of his hon. Friend. He agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Sheffield, that this House would be departing from its functions as a legislative assembly if it were to allow a majority to prevent the use of a thing which, though often beneficial, was in some cases liable to abuse. He could not, however, adopt the argument that this was a Bill directed against the poor rather than the rich, because in the district from which he came he knew that the poorer classes were more in favour of the Bill than any other class. The House ought, therefore, to take that feeling into account and consider from what it had arisen. Here was a Bill which appeared on the face of it a class Bill, and yet they found large bodies of the working men strongly in its favour. There must be some great wrong at work to produce such a result. The fact was, the working classes were almost in despair of that House or that Government tackling the question; and it was because it had been so often brought under the consideration of the Government, and acknowledged by the Government and the House to demand immediate attention, and yet nothing had been done, that the working men were not disinclined to support such an extreme measure. He had hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would have admitted that it was the duty of the Government to deal with the question as soon as possible. He felt quite sure that within a very short time, if not next year, one of the first measures of the next Parliament must be a Bill to deal with the government of drinking-houses, and he therefore wished to offer a suggestion. He could not agree to the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham that they should delegate to the town councils any more than to the ratepayers the power to stop the use of a thing because of its abuse. But he was not prepared to admit that they should entirely negative the principle which was behind this measure—namely, that the ratepayers should have some voice with regard to the limitation of the number of drinking-houses. The permissive principle was in reality now in operation, and he was surprised that his hon. Friend had not used it as an argument. The permissive power was lodged in the hands of the magistrates. In granting licences the magistrates usually came to a decision after hearing a debate between the attorney who represented the property which wished to open the public-houses, and the representatives of the party which did not wish it. But, even upon the low ground of property, it might be proved to demonstration that the value of property was injured by an excessive number of public-houses in a district, and it was absurd to take into account the property invested in such houses and to overlook the property not so invested. The suggestion, then, which he had to make was that the Government should take it into consideration, whether it would not be practicable to admit the ratepayers in the immediate neighbourhood to some voice which would affect the decision of the magistrates in granting licences, care being taken that they should not be enabled to stop all facilities for the sale of liquors. He thought it would be found necessary to adopt some such plan as that in any measure that might be brought forward.

MR. HENLEY said, he had no intention of saying anything on this question, but that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had taken upon himself to state the principles upon which magistrates were in the habit of acting in the granting of licences. Now he protested against any such statement as that the magistrates decided by reference to property. He (Mr. Henley) had never heard of such a principle as the hon. Gentleman had stated entering even as an element into the question of the granting or refusing of licences. The magistrates never looked to anything but the necessity for granting the licences. Many persons were of opinion that greater restraints were needed in the taking out of beerhouse licences. That subject was a difficult one, not immediately connected with the Bill, but yet a fit matter for legislation. But as for the Bill, he opposed it because he believed it to be unjust, and if passed into law it would be wholly inoperative. It was unjust because the House had no right to legislate in that way for the poor man and not for the upper classes. Would they venture to legislate that a man should not drink beer or wine if two-thirds of the ratepayers did not like it. And if the Bill were brought into operation, did not hon. Gentlemen believe that people, instead of being moderate and not refusing God's gifts of all good things, would many of them go out of the parish and drink twice as much as they otherwise would? It was human nature to do so. No man was more desirous to see temperance increasing among the people, but if it were to increase they must trust to other means. Those who had lived as long as he had must know that temperance among all classes had increased; drunkenness was now almost unknown among the higher classes, and they must trust to the good sense of the humbler classes, to the spread of education and the example of others, and not to legislation, to produce the effect aimed at by this Bill. They might rest assured that they would never make anybody temperate by legislation. For these reasons he felt bound to vote against the second reading.

MR. PEASE said, that after the debates that had taken place upon that subject, and the petitions which had been presented in favour of a change in the law, he had hoped that the Government would have been prepared to introduce some measure which would show that they were ready to co-operate in the efforts of the friends of temperance. He entirely differed from the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield that this was a poor man's question. For his part, he believed that thousands and tens of thousands of the poorer classes were anxious for the passing of a measure which would contribute to diminish drunkenness, and the many evils of which it was productive.

MR. SCULLY said, he wished it to be understood that the measure was to extend to Ireland, and that Irish Members had therefore an interest in the decision at which the House might arrive upon that occasion. He had been pressed very strongly by leading members of his own Church to support Bills of this description. It had been found that private efforts for the discouragement of intemperance had succeeded very well; but he differed from right rev. Prelates who thought that legislation of this kind would be successful. In the archdiocese of Cashel, with which he was connected, no liquor was sold in any public-house on the Sunday. That had been brought about by the exertions of the Catholic Archbishop, and had received the support of all classes in the community. But if that "Sunday law," as it was called, was attempted to be enforced by Act of Parliament, he had no doubt it would be broken through at once. It was generally understood that in the Great Southern and Western Railway Company of Ireland the chairman, Mr. Haughton, had taken office on condition that no sort of spirits should be sold on the line on any day of the week. But the consequence was, as he had been informed by stationmasters, that there was greater drunkenness than ever on the line, because the people brought liquor with them into the carriages. He had gone out to the refreshment tables a little while ago, and he saw several hon. Gentlemen there. ["Divide, divide!"] Hon. Gentlemen need not interrupt, for he was not going to mention names. He saw some Gentlemen taking sherry, and he asked which way they were going to vote. Some said they would vote for the Bill. He asked how they could take such refreshment and yet vote for the Bill, but they replied, "Oh! it will not be carried." It was on some such principle as that, he supposed, that the hon. Member for Maidstone (Mr. Buxton) had published his pamphlet. As he did not think they could make people temperate by Act of Parliament, he should oppose the Bill.

MR. LAWSON, in reply, said, that he rose chiefly for the purpose of apologizing to the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Roebuck) for having used too strong an expression in the course of his speech. He was very sorry for having used it. It rose from a momentary feeling of indignation at the language which had fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman himself the other night in the course of a debate relating to a similar measure. With regard to the hon. Member for Maidstone (Mr. Buxton), he had quoted from a book published a few weeks ago by that hon. Gentleman, in which he stated that he thought it desirable upon the whole that the articles should be republished. He would only further state that he could not imagine how it would be a grievance to the poor to give them a voice in deciding whether licences should be granted for the opening of public-houses. He was quite resolved to divide the House upon the Motion.

VALUATION OF LANDS AND HERITAGES (SCOTLAND) ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. DUNLOP said, that in proposing the second reading of this Bill, he felt it necessary to preface his observations by a brief explanation of the aim and purport of this Bill, as he understood that it was intended to raise some objection to it. It had been said that it was an exceptional measure, and that it had been brought forward in the interest of the Railway Companies. He did not mean to assert that the railway interest would not be benefited by it, because he believed that that interest suffered more from the injustice of the present system than any other; but he begged to disclaim any intention of supporting the Bill either for railway purposes or for those of any other class exclusively. His sole object in bringing forward the Bill was to remedy a particular grievance, in which certainly the railway interest participated, but which extends to nearly every class of the owners of land and property, except those who simply possess land without houses. The House would no doubt be cognizant of the fact that in Scotland there was a general yearly valuation of property, which originated in an Act passed in the year 1854. Under that Act there was a valuation of the gross rental, or the gross value of land, and the reduction of that into the net value for the purpose of rates was left to the local authorities, by whom the particular assessments are levied. He believed that that mode of fixing the gross value had given general satisfaction. It was done by the county officers appointed by the Commissioners of Supply, who were the landed proprietors of the county, and an appeal lay to the Commissioners of Supply and from them by means of a short legal process to the Court of Session. All parties were agreed that the fixing of the gross valuation was so far very valuable and useful, and that it thoroughly answered the purpose for which it was introduced—namely, the establishment of a basis on which the rating for the poor could be fixed. But in turning that into rateable value, or ascertaining from the gross value the rateable value for the purpose of assessing to the poor rate, it had to go through another and very different process. Each Parochial Board itself fixed the deductions which were to be made, and those deductions were made for each parish separately without any uniformity of rule. The consequence was, that property running through two or three different parishes might in one case receive a deduction of 15 per cent, in another of 20 per cent, and in a third of 25 per cent. One of the principal objects of this Bill was to provide an uniform machinery for fixing the rateable value, similar to that which had already been provided for fixing the gross value. At present the only mode by which that could be done conclusively was by an appeal to the Court of Session, which was attended with great expense, with considerable trouble and delay, and was altogether most unsatisfactory. What he proposed was, that the rateable value should be settled, in the first instance, by the same officer who was now required to furnish the gross value. Considerable objection was entertained to that proposition; but it was a question of detail which might hereafter be discussed, and which did not give a sufficient ground for the rejection of the Bill. There was likewise an element in the measure which had created a great amount of opposition—namely, that the whole of the local rates of Scotland were not at present levied on the rateable or net value. For example, the poor rate was, and therefore it was necessary now that the rateable value should be ascertained; but there were other rates of different kinds which are raised by the Commissioners of Supply, and since a general valuation had been provided, it had become the practice to lay on the assessments according to the gross value instead of the rateable value. Then, again, a difficulty had arisen in reference to Private Bill Committees in this House, who had assumed that the general valuation, instead of being intended to form a basis for fixing the rateable value, was itself intended to be the rateable value; and, accordingly, in all new assessments for roads which had been proposed the rates had been arranged on that footing. The Private Bill Committees had reported generally to the House that great injustice was inflicted by the course thus adopted, and they had recommended that there should be an alteration in the valuation roll, so as to admit the deductions which ought necessarily to be made. It was to follow out the recommendation of those Committees that he had introduced the present Bill. There could be no doubt at all that to lay on a rate, and, above all, a new rate, upon the gross value instead of the rateable value, was most unjust and intolerable. If all property were of the same kind—if all property in the same county or parish were exactly of the same kind—there would be no objection to the present system of assessment; but where you had land with houses, and land without houses, and railway or canal property, some of which required only a deduction of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, while other parts might require deductions varying from 5 to 20 or 30 per cent, the laying on of the same uniform rate upon the gross value of the whole property was obviously unjust. In the Poor Law Act this was expressly guarded against; deductions being made for the cost of repairs and insurance and for other expenses. There were thus two objects contained in the present Bill. The first was to provide that the deductions which must be made from the poor rate should be ascertained, not by each parish as an act of arbitrary will, but that these should be ascertained by the public officer appointed to make the general valuation, subject to an appeal or review of his conduct similar to that which was granted in the case of the general valuation. The second object was to provide that other rates besides the poor rate, and especially new ones imposed for the first time, should be laid according to the rateable value, and not according to the gross value. It was said that this would create a great deal of confusion and difficulty. That might be so for the first year or two, and great attention would be required; but it would not be the case afterwards. Gentlemen in this country were well aware that this was done in the case of the unions without any considerable amount of trouble, and with very great uniformity. At the same time these were all matters of detail, which could easily be dealt with in Committee, and he should have no objection to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. He had no wish to ask the House for anything that might not be considered reasonable and fair; but he certainly thought that some more satisfactory proceeding might be adopted with regard to the valuation of property for rateable purposes than that which now existed. All he asked was that property in Scotland generally should be placed on the same footing as property in England and Ireland, and as property in Scotland itself was already placed in reference to the poor rate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

Lord GEORGE CAVENDISH said, that having been chairman of the Committee before whom several of the Scotch Road Bills came for consideration, and also a member of the Committee before whom some Bills of a similar character came last year, he was anxious to say a few words with regard to the special Report which had been made by the Committee this year. The main difficulty in dealing with Bills of this description had arisen when they came to the consideration of the burdens imposed upon the country. We invariably found that under the operation of the Scotch Valuation Act very unequal rates were imposed upon different descriptions of property, and the same deductions were not made as would have been made in the case of similar property in England. For instance, with regard to railway property hon. Members must be aware that very considerable expenses are incurred in maintaining the value of that property; yet, under the Valuation Act, no deduction was made for the expense of maintaining the line of railway and of repairing the permanent way. The persons who had opposed these Road Bills on the part of the railways and other heritages had very much pressed the Committee to allow them some deduction by introducing clauses to that effect into such Bills. The Committee was unanimously of opinion that it was not within their province to adopt the suggestion thus made to them; and they drew up a special Report, and, in order to give the House time to consider the question, they deferred the operation of the Peeblesshire Roads Bill for two years, thinking that in the meantime some Bill might be introduced in order to remedy what certainly appears to be a considerable injustice.

MR. MACKIE said, he had hoped that the hon. Member for Greenock (Mr. Dunlop) would have conceived himself bound by the unmistakable opinions of the Scotch Members, and would have withdrawn this Bill. The Bill had been placed in the hands of the Scotch Members on the very day when they left town to attend their county meetings, and the consequence was that the county meetings knew nothing about it. It was not too much to hope that a Bill introduced under such circumstances should be withdrawn, at any rate until next Session. With regard to the Bill itself, the statement of the hon. Member for Greenock was so clear, that he had nothing to add or take from it. The Bill would change the whole system of local rating and assessments in Scotland. At present, they pay upon the gross value in all cases, except with regard to those rates which were imposed under the Poor Law Acts, and even with regard to the Poor Law Act there were many parishes in which the rating was still upon the gross valuation, such rating having been in vogue before the passing of the Poor Law Act in 1845, and having been continued since that period with the approbation of the Board of Supervision in Edinburgh. If the hon. Member was so anxious to obtain uniformity, how much easier it would have been for him to get at that uniformity by changing the rating under the Poor Law Act. At present, as he had just stated, some parishes were assessed to the poor rate upon the gross valuation. Let the hon. Member, therefore, introduce a Bill to go back to this system, and require the other parishes to be rated upon the gross valuation. In that way he will get at uniformity at once. What he (Mr. Mackie) wanted to know was, who were the parties aggrieved—who were the parties complaining? It was usual when a Bill of this kind was introduced—a Bill dealing with every acre of land throughout the length and breadth of Scotland—to show that it was demanded by the public. There were thirty counties in Scotland, but who were the parties complaining in this case? At present, the general ratepayer was perfectly satisfied with the present system of assessment. He found that in that system of assessment there was uniformity. He found a standard of valuation in reference to which he could calculate his quota upon any assessment that might be proposed. But if the Bill passed in its present shape, how would that be in future? The effect, in his opinion, would be that a man would not be able to ascertain what his due quota to the contributions required for local rateable purposes was to be, or what that of his neighbours was. Surely, before a Bill of this magnitude was passed, upsetting the whole system which has prevailed for so many years in Scotland, a very strong case of grievance ought to be made out; and he contended that his hon. Friend had entirely failed in making out a case of grievance. In fact, he did not know what the meaning of the Bill was until that morning, when he found on his table the following circular, to which he would draw the attention of the hon. and gallant Member for Ayrshire:—

"SIR,—The honour of your attendance is earnestly requested on the occasion of the second reading of this Bill to-morrow. It is a measure of the greatest importance to all Railway and Canal Companies, and it is believed to be framed also with due regard to the interests of the general ratepayers.—I am, &c.,

"JAMES FERGUSON."

He thought this document was one of very questionable propriety; but he certainly learnt from its contents that the Railway Companies were really persons promoting this Bill. Now, in the Valuation Act of Scotland the case of railways and canals had been considered and provided for; for Clauses 21 and 22 of that Act provide for the appointment of a railway and canal assessor. He presumed that this special appointment was made in the interest of the Railway Companies. In point of fact, they knew that railways do claim and do get most substantial allowances. It, therefore, seemed to him that the railway interests had the remedy in their own hands. But if the hon. Gentlemen who promoted this Bill had been able to make out a grievance, the remedy which they propose was one which it would be impossible to adopt. What is the remedy they offered? They propose that every assessor acting under the Valuation Act should ascertain and fix what is to be the annual cost of repairs, insurances, and other expenses necessary in maintaining lands and houses, and also of the rates and taxes and public charges that are payable in respect of the same. Now, there were thirty counties in Scotland, with thirty assessors. Every one of those assessors, dealing with the same class of property, might put down his own idea of the rateable value of these different lands and heritages; so that, in point of fact, you would have thirty different ratings according to the view thirty different assessors may take in regard to the same subject in different localities. It seemed also to him that the proposal contained in the Bill, if carried out, will be most expensive in its operation. Inasmuch as the lands and heritages dealt with extend over every county in Scotland, these assessors will have to ascertain and assess the rateable value of the whole property of the kingdom. Every proprietor would of course send in an application for deductions, whereupon the unfortunate assessor has to sit in judgment on the claims, and put down a rateable valuation. In cases of appeal, who was to consider them? Who was to constitute the Court of Appeal? Were the Commissioners of Supply to sit in judgment in September and settle all these questions? He did not think that they would be disposed to do anything of the sort; nor would the month of September be sufficient for the proper hearing and disposing of all cases they would have to deal with. He thought the Bill would be found wholly unworkable in all respects, and that it would involve great and unnecessary expenditure. In the interests of his constituents, he therefore thought it right to propose that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Mackie.)

COLONEL DOUGLAS PENNANT said, he was in no way connected with the railway interest in Scotland, and had no wish to enter into any details with regard to the machinery of this Bill. He merely rose for the purpose of confirming the opinion expressed by the noble Lord the Member for North Derbyshire (Lord George Cavendish) with regard to the views the Committee took in reference to the new system which of late years had been adopted, and which was becoming every year more and more general in Scotland, of throwing all the roads and highways upon the counties of Scotland for assessment at their full gross value. In the assessments for the poor rates, certain deductions were made, and among those deductions came the sums paid by railways for repairs and maintenance of the permanent way, but in assessing for other purposes no such deduction was allowed. That question came under the consideration of the Committee on Scotch Road Bills—of which he was for one or two years chairman, and of which the noble Lord opposite was chairman this year—and it was admitted that great injustice would be done to the Railway Companies if they were compelled to pay on the gross rental, for which they were entered on the valuation roll. The Railway Companies wished the Committee to fix a specific value for each railway included in the Bill; but the Committee decided that they would not enter into the question in that partial way, and be the means of introducing a most anomalous system of rating, which might vary in each case according to the opinion of the Committee before which it might be brought. But on all occasions the Committee felt that some public measure ought to be passed for the purpose of placing the railways upon some clearly defined footing. The Committee inquired from the railway assessor whether any deductions were made from the gross value of railway property for the purpose of repairs, and he stated that no deduction was made for maintaining or repairing the permanent way. That alone was, in his opinion, a strong reason why something should be done to put the railways upon a fair footing with regard to valuation, and for that reason he should support the second reading of the Bill.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, it was not because he did not feel the force of the arguments used by his hon. Friend the Member for Greenock (Mr. Dunlop) with regard to the general principle of allowing in Scotland the same deductions which were allowed in England, that he could not consent to vote for the second reading of the Bill. The whole question was, whether you can enforce the deductions in the manner proposed by the Bill, or without introducing a much more extensive principle involved in the measure. The hon. Member said that he was quite ready to go into a Select Committee, and consider the question of the principle of the rates. But there was another principle which he must also consider, which laid at the root of the question—namely, by what public body was the question to be determined. It was proposed by the Bill that the valuation should be fixed by the officers for the county—the same officer who assessed for the income tax. To such a proposal he entirely objected. From the way in which his hon. Friend proposed that this officer should determine what in every individual property was the deduction to be made, the result would be that the assessor would make a separate valuation, and every individual assessed would appeal in the autumn to the Committee appointed by the Commissioners of Supply for the purpose of hearing appeals. The consequence would be that that body would be overwhelmed with work, and the appeals would be so numerous that it would be impracticable to carry out a measure of that sort. It was upon this ground of practical difficulty that it was found impossible to do anything with the question when it came before the House some years ago. His hon. Friend had referred to the case of England: but in England this duty was not done by an assessor but by the Boards of Guardians. He was perfectly ready to consider whether they should not form boards for the purpose of carrying out this proposal, but that was not a question that could be determined by affirming the principle laid down in the Bill. Then the time at which the Bill was brought forward was exceedingly inconvenient; for in many cases the rates had already been levied on the maximum valuation. Another objection was, that if the Bill was sent to a Select Committee it could not be a very brief one, and the Bill would come back to the House when nearly the whole of the Scotch Members would be out of town, and when it would be impossible to give proper consideration to the question. He must therefore impress on the hon. Member that which was urged upon his consideration at the meeting of Scotch Members—namely, that he should not persist with the Bill at this moment, when there was no opportunity of considering it. If on some future occasion the hon. Member would move for a Select Committee he (Sir E. Colebrooke) would be happy to support him.

LORD ELCHO said, that no one who knew the hon. Member for Greenock (Mr. Dunlop) would suppose that he was actuated by any desire other than that of promoting the public interest; but, strange to say, this Bill, which is brought forward to remedy a public grievance, and which one would think ought to be approved of by all the interests concerned, was approved of, so far as he (Lord Elcho) was aware, by no interest in Scotland except one. The object of the Bill was to place a burden which is now borne by all classes upon the shoulders of one. That was a proposal which he hoped the House would not readily sanction. Any doubt that might have been entertained as to the nature and character of the Bill must have been removed by the speeches of the noble Lord the Member for North Derbyshire, and his hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Colonel D. Pennant), both of whom spoke as chairmen of Road Committees, and both of whom were in favour of this Bill. The Railway Companies, who had a common interest and a common purse, fought the question four days before the Committee; but the Committee thought that the question was one for general legislation, and could not be dealt with as a private Bill. Failing there, his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Ayrshire, who he believed was one of their railway magnates, attempted to introduce a clause when the Bill was before the House. That attempt was also defeated. Since then the matter had been brought before a Committee upstairs; and as that also failed, the promoters of the Bill sought to obtain their object by a general measure. He hardly thought that the attention of this House had been sufficiently drawn to a matter which had been alluded to by his hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcudbright. He certainly agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcudbright, that the extraordinary document which had emanated from his hon. Friend the Member for Ayrshire was one of very questionable propriety. Here was a Bill purporting to be a Bill for general purposes to alter the valuation of land in Scotland generally. That was the specious guise in which it came before the House, and yet from the office of one of the chief Parliamentary agents in Parliament Street proceeds this letter—

And why? Because "it is a measure of the greatest importance to all Scotch Railway and Canal Companies;" and mark this, "it is believed to be framed also with a due regard to the interests of the ratepayers." Signed, "James Fergusson." This document had not been sent broadcast throughout this House. He (Lord Elcho) had not received a copy of it, and upon communicating with other Scotch Members he found that they were in a similar position. Whether it was from a spirit of chivalry before they entered the lists with the hon. Member for Kirkcudbright that they sent him a copy, he could not say; but his hon. Friend was a railway director, and it looks very much as if the Parliamentary agent had sent out the circular simply to those whom he believed to be connected with the railway interest. This, he thought, ought to be a warning to the House of Commons respecting the manner in which these Railway Companies manage their affairs. Now, as to the course the House should take in reference to a measure affecting a Bill which was passed ten years ago, the whole question relative to rating every description of property was then fully considered, and to show that railway interests were not neglected, he (Lord Elcho) might mention that out of 42 clauses not less than 10 were devoted to the way in which railway and canal property was to be assessed. Now, a measure to establish one uniform system of valuation brought in deliberately by the Government, on the responsibility of the Lord Advocate, ought not to be tampered with by a private Member of the House. If an Amendment of the Act was necessary, the Government were the proper parties to bring forward a measure for that purpose; and if they were not prepared to do so without further inquiry, let the right hon. Gentleman propose a Committee to inquire into the subject, and he (Lord Elcho) would be happy to second the proposition. But he certainly objected to private Members dealing with a subject of this great importance.

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE said, he wished to make a few remarks in consequence of what had fallen from his hon. Friend opposite, that railways were by the present operation of the law subject to great injustice on account of the opposition made to them, and that no allowance was made for repairs, for maintenance, and for the cost of keeping them in a condition to command the rate. Now, evidence had been given on this very point before Committees of the House of Lords and of the House of Commons in a Bill relating to tolls; and one very competent witness stated not only that railways did not pay 40 per cent higher than other lands and heritages, in consequence of their being rated at the full valuation, but he said he knew the fact to be exactly the reverse—that they got many deductions that other land and heritages did not get—that in fact they got a deduction of 100 per cent after paying every possible expense. Therefore his hon. Friend and the noble Lord opposite were misinformed when they said that railways receive no deduction, but were assessed on the full amount of their property. He objected to this Bill on various grounds. One of them had been alluded to by the noble Lord. This was a public Bill. It is one of these measures which the Lord Advocate prides himself upon, he having passed one which has been useful, and has given satisfaction to Scotland. It has been looked upon in Scotland as the only fitting one by which you can arrive at a fair valuation. The Bill proposes to introduce elements of uncertainty between the assessor and various classes of persons affected by it. In his opinion the Bill would introduce great confusion in the Valuation Act without producing any benefit whatever. If any Bill was necessary, it ought to be introduced by the Government after due deliberation, and not be left to any private Member. Considering the Bill most inexpedient and unjust, he should certainly give his vote against it.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he wished to say a few words with reference to the heavy charge which had been brought against him. The noble Lord

(Lord Elcho) had done him the honour of reading a circular requesting the attendance of hon. Members on the present occasion. He was sorry that the noble Lord regarded this as an improper proceeding. At any rate, it was one of common occurrence, for hardly a day passed on which he did not receive circulars from parties interested in measures, and begging his attendance and support. When the House recollected the little attention that was paid to Scotch business, he did not consider it improper, when great interests were concerned and important measures were to be considered, that the attendance of hon. Members should be requested. [Lord Elcho: Why was it not sent to all Members?] He was not aware that circulars were usually sent to all Members, but only to those who are presumed to be supporters of the particular measure. If that were an improper proceeding, it is, as he had already intimated, a very common one; and he should not be deterred on any future occasion, if he considered that any measure demanded the attendance of Members, from endeavouring to secure that attendance. The noble Lord who had been so careful in pointing out his duty to him had fallen into a slight error in regard to the nature and intentions of the Valuation Act of 1854. The noble Lord said it was intended to serve as a basis of valuation in Scotland. An opinion much more entitled to weight than that of the noble Lord—namely, that of the Lord Advocate—was very different. He said the principle of the Valuation Act was the ascertainment of the gross valuation wherever the assessment was directed to be made, and that the valuation roll should only afford the basis upon which the deductions were to be made, without affecting the principle or the extent of the deductions themselves. The noble Lord was entirely under a mistake. In conformity with that opinion, the Judges of the Court of Session on a recent occasion pointed out how manifestly unfair it was to assess property which was liable to deterioration and repairs in the same proportion as property that was not so liable. He believed that the Court of Queen's Bench had lately ruled in the same manner with regard to parochial assessments in England. All that was wanted by this Bill was to have the system of rating in counties and burghs and parochial rates placed on the same footing in Scotland as in England—and that deductions should be allowed for repair, maintenance, and so forth. He hoped the House would not be led away by the assertions of hon. Members that the Bill was introduced for the purpose of any one class more than another. There could be no doubt that railway property was the most hardly hit by the existing system; but it also affected gas companies and other similar properties. But if one class was more affected than another, surely it was entitled to make the loudest claim for redress. He trusted that the House would read the Bill a second time, and then refer it to a Select Committee for the purpose of considering its details.

THE LORD ADVOCATE expressed his regret that any course should be taken which might result in giving a limited effect to the Bill as now proposed. The question is a very important one, and can only be properly dealt with by a general Bill. The question ought not to be considered as affecting one class over another, but entirely with reference to the general interests of Scotland in the matter. The object of the Bill was to remedy what was unquestionably a defect in the Valuation Act of 1854. It was not a defect which was now newly discovered, because it was a defect of which they were perfectly conscious when the Bill of 1854 passed into law. The question arose in the Select Committee before which that Bill came—whether it was desirable, in the first place, and, if so, whether it was possible to make the valuation roll so that it would show the gross and also the rateable value? Two modes were proposed for accomplishing that object. The first was, that all assessments should be made on the gross value, and that the whole system of deduction should be founded on the gross value. The Committee did not see their way to that course, and it was resisted by a considerable majority of the representatives of Scotland. For himself he thought there would have been no practical injustice if that course had been taken, as the system of deductions was complex, cumbrous, and inconvenient. Another course was then suggested—namely, to insert in the Act a schedule of deductions to provide for certain classes of property a certain percentage of deductions. A great deal of discussion took place on that proposition, but in the end that was also found impracticable, for the reason that the same class of assessments in different parts of the country were not on the same footing as regarded deductions made upon them; that is to say, that deductions which were made in reference to mill property or house property in one part of the country were found to be wholly inapplicable to other parts. The Valuation Act as it passed provided solely for the ascertainment of the gross value, and left the rateable value to be ascertained by the persons or the body who are entitled to lay on the assessment. In all subsequent legislation the assessments had been made upon the gross value; but as regards the poor's rate, there were provisions for making deductions previous to the passing of the Valuation Act; and they remained precisely as they were, the only difference being that the gross valuation was taken as the sole criterion of the value from which the deductions were to be made. The object of the present Bill was to provide that the assessment should not be made on the gross rental, nor that a percentage of deduction should be laid down, but that the assessor should fix the gross value the same as he fixed the rateable value. He did not see any difficulty in the matter. The assessor could not be less competent to fix the assessment for the net value than the assessor of the Parochial Board, who must go through the same labour before the rateable value was ascertained. On the contrary, he thought the assessor for the county was more competent from his skill and knowledge to arrive at a satisfactory result. He did not see why the Bill should be considered as a Railway Bill. That could only be on the assumption that the assessor, whose duty it was at present to ascertain the gross value of railways, would make larger deductions in ascertaining the net value than the assessor of the Parochial Board. His object in any support he might give to the measure was certainly not to favour the railways or any other class of proprietors or owners of property, but simply to accomplish now what they failed to accomplish in 1854, and to make the valuation roll a record of the rateable as well as of the gross value in order to supersede the necessity for a double valuation in each parish. He thought the course the House ought to adopt was to read the Bill a second time and refer it to a Select Committee.

DENMARK AND GERMANY—THE ARMISTICE.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF SHAPTESBURY asked the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary, Whether it was true that an extension of the armistice had been agreed upon?

EARL RUSSELL: Yes; the Plenipotentiaries have agreed to a further suspension of hostilities for a fortnight.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE: Have both parties—the Danes and the Germans—agreed to this?

EARL RUSSELL: Both parties. The Danes agreed to a further suspension for a fortnight, and the Germans have consented to it.

CHIMNEY SWEEPERS AND CHIMNEYS REGULATION BILL REPORT (No. 112.)

Amendments reported (according to Order.)

EARL GREY moved to insert the following clause after Clause 11 of Bill, as amended in Committee:—

If any Occupier of a House shall knowingly allow any person under Twenty-one Years of Age to be sent up a Chimney in the House he occupies, he shall be liable to a Penalty not exceeding Ten Pounds.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD opposed the Amendment. The clause would expose householders to perpetual vexation. The regulations in the earlier clauses affecting master-sweeps would, he thought, be quite sufficient to insure the object in view.

LORD PORTLAND also opposed the Amendment.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY thought that the Amendment might endanger the safety of the Bill in this and certainly in the other House. A case had been pointed out to him in which a householder was convicted of a similar offence under the law as it now stood, and he hoped that his noble Friend would withdraw the Amendment.

EARL GREY said, that if the law really was already what he thought it ought to be he should not press the Amendment; but he had thought it most improper to fine the master chimney-sweeps and allow a person in a higher rank of life, who was guilty of the same offence, to escape.

Amendment (by Leave of the House) withdrawn: Bill to be read 3<sup>d</sup> To-morrow.

ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE in rising to move an humble Address to Her Majesty for Papers relative to the Enlistment of Irish Immigrants and others Her Majesty's subjects in the United States Army, said that their Lordships might think him somewhat pertinacious in entering again into this subject; but he could not help feeling that Her Majesty's Government had been remiss in the matter. The subject was one of considerable importance. It was of the utmost interest to the people of this country, from its connection with the prerogatives of the Crown and the welfare of a large portion of Her Majesty's subjects; and it was also a matter in reference to which we had incurred a great moral responsibility, inasmuch as there was reason to believe, that if proper measures had been taken to prevent it long ago, the civil war in America would have ended before now; and if the recruiting of British subjects were now put a stop to, he believed the war would be brought to a comparatively early termination. If the cases of this description, which had been brought before Parliament, were isolated and exceptional—if they had arisen only from over-zeal or indiscretion or avarice on the part of American citizens—he should not have been apt to notice them. But the Federal recruiting in the British dominions had attained large dimensions. No man could doubt that for two years there had existed a deliberate intention on the part of the Federal Government to feed its armies from the inhabitants of foreign countries, and especially with subjects of the Queen. The sanguinary war which had raged had rendered it impossible for the Federal Government to recruit its armies from the population of the Federal States, and it now deliberately sought to recruit its armies from abroad. He was not one of those who were disposed to lay very much stress upon the Foreign Enlistment Act, because he believed that it was seldom found to be very efficient in its working, either with regard to the belligerents or with regard to our own subjects. The results had not been creditable either to our legislation, our jurisprudence, our administration, or our Government; and especially the attempts which had been made by the Government of this country to preserve impartiality in the contest on the American Continent had not procured for us much credit, nor tended to increase the respect with which we were regarded. It was a fact, not at all unknown in the metropolis or in the business world, that one of the belligerent Powers had been plentifully supplied with arms and munitions of war by this country from the commencement of the contest; and this he was told was contrary neither to the Foreign Enlistment Act, nor to the Queen's proclamation of neutrality; and yet, as soon as it was proposed to supply the other belligerent Power with ships—a course which would practically have placed the resources of this country impartially within the reach of both parties—the Government had found itself compelled to take action and to assert its entire neutrality. He maintained that at no former period of our history had foreign enlistment so extensively prevailed. It was a fact perfectly notorious, that there had been approved agents of the Federal Government established not only in Ireland but also in England, for the purpose of enlisting recruits. He had received communications upon the subject from the midland counties, informing him that such was the case; and he had learnt that efforts to obtain recruits had even been made in Lincolnshire, where it would have been thought there was little likelihood of success. The Federal Government itself had made no secret of its actions. The Secretary of State presented to Congress a Bill strengthened by a Message from the President, actually providing for such enlistments, and the measure was referred to the consideration of a committee. The Bill proposed to establish a foreign recruiting department, the head-quarters of which were to be at New York, and that its recruiting agents should be scattered through foreign countries. He believed that such a plan had never been suggested any where but in America. Was it possible to doubt that the chief object of such a measure was to facilitate the enlistment of recruits from this country and other portions of Her Majesty's dominions? The law was not passed, and it failed partly because it was feared that so open a manifestation of the intentions of the Federals might excite the opposition of our Government. The Bill was what was called in the language of the country "tabled." We had not only this to complain of, but we had also submitted to what was contrary to every international law. He had by him a Liverpool paper in which it was stated that a regiment of 1,500 Germans had been levied in Germany, and that they were to sail from Liverpool as ships could be provided for the purpose. The newspaper recorded the departure of 130 Germans in the same manner as if the event were the embarkation of a regiment of the Guards. That was exactly one of those cases which the Foreign Enlistment Act had been intended to prevent. Of course, it was not openly stated that men were enlisted for the army. It was pretended that the demand for soldiers caused by the severity of the conflict had created such a displacement of industrial labourers, that many branches of the industry of the country were at a stand-still on account of the impossibility of procuring workmen. No man, however, who examined the provisions of the Bill to which he had referred would credit such statements for a moment. The provisions of the Bill, according to the account which he had read of it, proposed to advance the passage and other sums of money to the immigrants, which were afterwards to be deducted from their wages. It was obviously absurd to think that the Federal Government would appoint collectors to go round all over the country and collect weekly or monthly payments, as the case might be. The money could only be repaid by deductions from wages if the men were engaged in service under the Government, and it was notorious that that service was in the army. They knew that for the last two years proclamations had been issued for recruits, that the President of the Federal States had called upon the different States to supply their quota, and that some of those proclamations had scarcely produced more effect than so much waste paper. There were only two States where the quota of soldiers was supplied proportionate to the population; the quotas for the other States were in the aggregate 322,000 men short—a number equalling our whole army, including the army in India. To illustrate the difficulty the American Government were in to obtain soldiers, he might refer to a statement which he had seen in a newspaper of an answer which President Lincoln had given to a deputation from certain states on the subject of the enlistment of coloured men, who were paid the same as white men. The President's answer was that by making the pay the same he expected to raise 136,000 men. In even the more wealthy States the enlistments were not at all successful. It was well known how that the need of men had driven the United States' Government to employ negro soldiers, and President Lincoln had recently stated that he expected the negro regiments would provide him with 130,000 men. It was truly horrible to think that such vast numbers of men should be wanted for the mere purpose of slaughter. In the space of very few weeks no less than 40,000 men had been lost to one army alone, and from calculations based upon hospital returns there was no reason to think that that number was exaggerated. Such a state of things was not creditable to the civilized world, and at least we ought to take steps to prevent our fellow-subjects from becoming victims in the dreadful conflict now raging in America. When the pretence of inducing men to go over to America to work upon canals and railways was put forth, no one could be deluded by it in that House. They had heard of the case which occurred not long ago in Ireland, where a number of operatives were induced by a Federal agent to accompany him to the United States. Upon arriving in Boston the men were lodged in a sort of barn, where they were kept without food all day. In the evening strong drink was freely supplied, and some of the unfortunate men became so stupefied that they did not recover their senses for two days. After the men had drank deeply, Mr. Kidder, the person by whom they were engaged, visited them, accompanied by government and police officers, and informing them that he had been disappointed in the work for which he had engaged them, recommended that they should join the United States' army, at the same time tendering the bounty, specially inviting them to join a particular regiment, which, he said, was wholly composed of Irishmen. Some were induced to accept the bounty, but the others were turned out next day, and were indebted for food to the charity of their fellow-countrymen in Boston. That was the way in which subjects of this country had been treated in a town where we had a consul. He wanted to know what had been done for those men, and what reparation had been sought for them, and whether any precautions had been taken to prevent the recurrence of such transactions in future? That such practices as those he had referred to were not uncommon, they knew upon the authority of a Federal officer, General Wieden, who remonstrated against the sort of men who were sent to him, of their being mostly foreigners, and of the manner in which they were enlisted, stating that frequently they were sent off to the dépôt while drugged, and refused to do duty upon recovery, alleging that they had not been fairly enlisted. In these cases the men were shot at once without trial. Were such proceedings to be allowed to continue? It was not only in this country and in Ireland that the practices he complained of had been carried on; but he had seen letters from Canada, which spoke of similar doings there, and in one case mention was made of the desertion of several non-commissioned officers and men from a regiment serving there, tempted to do so by the inducement being held out to them of commissions in the Federal army. He would not mention the particular regiment referred to, because he trusted that the statement might not be correct. He might be told that all these were general statements; but even if so they were statements known to all the world, and could not be unknown to the authorities here. He wanted to know whether we were to continue upon terms of amity and alliance with a people who treated us in this manner, and who received our remonstrances with contempt? It was to be regretted that the case of the Kearsarge should have been suffered to pass almost without notice. A more flagrant case than that of the officers of this vessel in Cork Harbour had never occurred. This, however, was a question between nation and nation. How was a similar question treated by the Government of the United States in 1812? Mr. Madison, in his declaration of war against this country, went far beyond the Order in Council which was the immediate cause, and complained generally of the practice of impressing seamen found on board American ships. Mr. Madison did not complain that John Smith or Tom Jones was taken out of a particular ship, nor did he draw an indictment as particular as an Old Bailey lawyer would make it, but he complained of the general practice of this country, and said the United States would not suffer it longer. He did not wish to go to war—he rather desired to put a stop to war. When this country had been treated with insult and indignity—when our fellow-countrymen had suffered great injuries, he wished not for war, but for something like vigorous remonstrance and an assurance that the objectionable practices should not be continued. If he were asked whether, if remonstrance failed, he was prepared to go to war, he would ask, in reply, for what were we ever to go to war if not for insults offered to our sovereignty, and injuries done to our fellow-subjects for which no redress had been afforded? Why did we pay £30,000,000 a year for our army and navy if these forces were not to be employed in maintaining the honour of the country, and affording protection to our fellow-countrymen? We were doing neither. We had supplied the Northern States with arms and munitions of war to an enormous extent, and it might be difficult to prevent that. But we had also supplied during the last year or so many thousands of men, and of the tens of thousands who had been massacred in this awful conflict, there could be no doubt that a large proportion of the victims had been born subjects of the Queen. He contended that such a state of things ought to be put a stop to by Her Majesty's Government. We had no business to be in amity or in diplomatic relations with a country which paid so little regard to the rights of our fellow-subjects as the Federal States of America had shown in this matter. He could not help thinking that a great deal of blame must be laid to the charge of the nations of Europe for the continuance of this war. When two great armies were fronting each other was not perhaps a time when any hopeful interference could take place; but there had been times when he thought interference might usefully and effectively have taken place. While on the one hand we took a tone as regarded our fellow-subjects to show that we would not permit the repetition of such conduct as had gone on during the last year, he also hoped that within a very few weeks there might be such a state of affairs in that country when it would be perfectly proper and possible for the nations of Europe to enter upon this matter with a firm and decided tone, and that they would take those steps by which alone he believed this horrible carnage, utterly fruitless in itself—injurious, above all, to America—disgraceful to the century in which we lived, and shocking to the feelings of all mankind, would be terminated. The noble Marquess concluded by moving that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Papers, &c.

Lord BROUGHAM, in rising to second the Motion, wished to make a few observations on some parts of his noble Friend's statements. No one could lament more deeply than he did, not only the cruel and calamitous civil war which had been raging for the last three years in America, but the conduct of many of our countrymen in joining in this dreadful contest, more particularly those who came from that part of the country to which his noble Friend belonged, and who, he lamented to say, had in great numbers entered the Federal army. He highly disapproved of the conduct of the Federal Government, not only in the attempt, which they began but could not carry out, to establish depôts for raising foreign recruits; but he disapproved as entirely of their taking men—even if they did not inveigle them by the tricks which had been described—taking them even when the men honestly entered, and entered knowing what they were doing, even though not deceived by crimps and deluded under the influence of strong liquor. The men were told they were going merely to labour in the fields, and after they were there they were told there was no work for them, and they were asked, "Will you please come into the army?" But even suppose the most fair and honest contract made between these Irishmen and the recruiting officers of the Federal Government, he still disapproved of the course which they had adopted. What was their complaint against us? That we were not sufficiently neutral. That we did not hold the balance even between the two parties—Federals and Confederates. Both parties in America, he believed, complained of us in this respect; but could there be a more open infraction of neutrality than the conduct of those who compel the poor Irish immigrants to enter their service, or who take them into their service? They were taking men into their service who were guilty of an offence punishable severely in this country. These men were criminals. The crime of which they were guilty had lately been made a misdemeanour by the Foreign Enlistment Act; but in the reign of George II. it was felony, and at one time it was a capital felony. The men were still criminals, and the Federal Government employed men knowing them to be criminals, and that it was only as criminals that they were entering into their service. Time was when those same Americans complained bitterly of our employing foreign troops to subdue them—to do the very same thing towards them which the Federals were now doing towards the Confederates—endeavouring to restore the Union that was to conquer, or attempting to conquer, the Confederates by foreign troops. In the draughts to supply the enormous demands which this most lamentable war had made—he believed not less than 600,000 in the course of the last two years—they took not regiments or corps, but thousands of persons from Germany, and he grieved to say hundreds at least from Ireland. The Germans formed a great part of their resources to supply the blanks which this cruel war had made. These Americans complained of our conduct in 1778; and the worst thing they considered we did in attempting their conquest was the employment of Hessian and other German regiments in the course of the war. The eloquence of Mr. Burke and of Lord Chatham made the walls of Parliament ring with complaints of the German mercenaries being taken into the pay of the Government for the purpose of subduing America. Now, these Americans were doing the very self-same thing, not by taking corps, but thousands of individuals who are foreigners into their service, and employing them against the Confederates. He wished his voice, which hardly reached the limits of that room, could reach across the Atlantic to his old friends and clients—for taking part with whom in 1812, to which his noble Friend referred, he had suffered much abuse in this country, being called at one time the Attorney General of Mr. Maddison, at all times the tool of Mr. Jefferson, and said in every respect to have given preponderance to America over his own country—a groundless charge, but it was made, and it showed the anxiety and warmth with which he supported the cause of America. Would that his former clients would now listen to him, imploring them for once—once and for all, to be satisfied with the glory they had gained; for they had shown the greatest courage universally—both Confederates and Federals had shown the greatest fortitude, the greatest courage, the most extraordinary capacity for war—he meant for war as regarded mere fighting, which no doubt a great part of war was; and they had shown that, if they were not sparing of other men's lives, neither were they sparing of their own. Let them, then, be satisfied, for the love of peace, of Christian peace, with what they had gained by that glory, and let them at the last restore peace to their country. He believed there was but one universal feeling—not only in this country but all over Europe—of reprobation of the continuance of this war, of deep lamentation for its existence, and of an anxious desire that it should at length be made to cease. His noble Friend had adverted to the possibility of intervention. He had himself refused, during the last three weeks, to present petitions from various mercantile bodies to urge on the part of the Government intervention in the American war. He did not feel that the time had yet arrived; but he lived in hopes that before long an occasion might arise when, in conjunction with our ally on the other side of the Channel, we should interfere with effect, and when an endeavour to accommodate matters and restore peace

Moved,

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copies of or Extracts from any Despatches from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington relating to the Proceedings or Report of the Select Committee of the United States Congress on Immigration, or to Bills upon that subject brought into Congress.”

And also—

“Copies of or Extracts from Despatches or Reports respecting the Enlistment of Irish Immigrants at Boston and Portland in the month of March last, or to the Enlistment of any of Her Majesty's Canadian Subjects in the United States Army.”

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, my noble Friend has moved for copies of despatches and reports respecting the enlistment of Irish immigrants in the United States' service at Boston and Portland, and knowing perfectly well that those papers would be granted—for their production has been promised—he has thought it right to raise his complaint that remonstrances have not been made at Washington against the proceedings adopted at those two places. Now, it is no doubt more convenient to complain of your Minister abroad and your Foreign Secretary at home before you have the papers; but it would, I think, be more candid to wait till you have the papers, and then to see whether Lord Lyons or I have so entirely neglected our duty as my noble Friend presumes we have done. I can only say for Lord Lyons, that he has continually remonstrated, not only by despatches and notes, but, as he says, more frequently in interviews with Mr. Seward; and since he has been at Washington nothing has given him greater vexation and distress of mind than those proceedings at Boston. I shall say nothing about myself at this moment, except that I have seconded the efforts of Lord Lyons. Well, my noble Friend, after many explanations on this subject, remains in the same confusion of mind with respect to the Foreign Enlistment Act that was so prevalent at the commencement of this war. He says, “You allow muskets and powder to be conveyed to the Federal States, while at the same time you prohibit ships from going to the Confederates.” In the first place, it so happens that there is that distinction in the law. There is no law which prevents persons in this country from taking arms or powder either to the Federal States or to the Confederates. Such articles are liable to capture, and the vessel conveying munitions of war may also be condemned if found attempting to break the blockade. But those who carry such munitions are not liable to any punishment in this country for so carrying. There is likewise reason as well as law for this distinction. When you send muskets or powder as articles of merchandize, they, as the American authorities have always declared, are among the productions of the industry of the country from which they come, and those who send them do not themselves perform any act of hostility. Such munitions may, indeed, after reaching a belligerent, be then applied for purposes of hostility. But it is a very different thing if you have men either enlisted or arrayed in this country for the purpose of hostilities against any Power with which Her Majesty is at peace, or if you have a ship sent out from your shores for the purpose of hostilities against such a State. If the ship went, as some of the American Judges have in certain cases found was the fact, merely with a crew sufficient to take the vessel into the port of a belligerent, that might be a case somewhat analogous to the carrying of cannon and muskets. But when the vessel and crew go forth already equipped from the coast of the neutral, and with a sufficient crew, to commit hostilities directly they get to sea against the State in amity with Her Majesty, it is evident that that is quite a different proceeding from carrying muskets over from your own coast to a belligerent's coast as merchandize. Take the case which occurred 200 years ago, when 10,000 men were sent to take part in the civil war in Portugal. If you have 10,000 men arrayed and sent from your shores to take part in a civil war, the Government are properly responsible for that. But with a confusion of ideas on the part of my noble Friend which is hardly excusable—

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE : There is no confusion in what I said. What I said, or intended to say, was that one of the objections to the Foreign Enlistment Act was that it did not meet the contingency which has arisen. I found fault, not with the Government, but with the Act

EARL RUSSELL : I am aware of that; but my noble Friend did not appear to see the reason of the Act, and a very sound and sufficient reason it is—namely, that if you send cannon or muskets they are articles of merchandize; but if you send men armed with muskets and formed into regiments to be employed against a State in amity with Her Majesty, you are clearly taking part in the war. It is on that principle that we have not allowed ships to go from this country armed and ready to commence hostilities, if we could prevent it. We have so acted, believing not only that it is the law, but that the law is based on a sound principle. My noble Friend went on to complain of what has been done in Ireland; and certainly I am ready to complain of that as much as he is. But when we come to investigate the circumstances, the question is whether the Government or those who execute the law in Ireland are to blame for anything which has occurred there. It appears that a person named Finney, representing himself as a merchant who had lived twelve or thirteen years in the United States, engaged in a speculation with another person named Kidder to induce men to go from Ireland to America, in order to obtain the 600 or 700 dollars per head bounty money on their entering the army there. These speculators put the greater part of that money in their own pockets, and defrauded the honest, but I must say credulous, countrymen of my noble Friend. My noble Friend says that when these advertisements appeared, holding out the hope of high wages to these poor people by working on railways and canals in America, he is at a loss to conceive how any of them should have allowed themselves to be so duped. Well, if he is at a loss to conceive how that could be, certainly I must be much more so; but I am afraid that such credulity is somewhat characteristic of his countrymen. But how is the Government to blame in the matter? If a man comes to this country and says to labouring men already earning tolerable wages, "If you will go and work in Germany or in America, or wherever it may be, I will take care that you shall get very high wages," and if people are simple enough to yield to that temptation, how can the Government be blamed for their imprudence or folly? It must be a very singular Government indeed which should undertake that no man shall do anything imprudent or foolish. Well, about one hundred of these men went from Ireland to Boston and Portland. My noble Friend has truly described the nefarious treatment they met with in those places. I cannot but think that the United States' police acted a very unworthy part, as well as those who were immediately concerned in inveigling these persons.

But the police and the recruiting officers declared before a committee of inquiry which the American Government instituted, that when the men engaged to enlist they were perfectly sober, and that however drunk they were the evening before, they were sober at the time they enlisted. Well, Lord Lyons said, and I think very justly, that the men themselves should have been examined as to the treatment they received and the state in which they were when they enlisted. Instead of that several of them were carried off as recruits, and immediately sent to join the United States' army. One of them, named Sullivan, was afterwards taken to hospital; and he subsequently told his story to Lord Lyons, explaining the way in which he had been coerced, and how he had escaped. I have said before, that I think it highly discreditable to the United States' Government, to their civil as well as their military authorities, that they did not immediately make an investigation into the facts stated to them by Lord Lyons; that they did not bring all these men to Washington, and, unless they were found to have enlisted in a perfectly voluntary manner, discharge them. Lord Lyons has remonstrated against the inaction of the United States' Government, and their want of attention. But my noble Friend requires more than this; he seems to think we should have intimated, that if our remonstrances were neglected, we would go to war. He says that if ever there was a case for war, this is that case; and he asks, "If remonstrances of this kind are not attended to, when will you go to war?" Undoubtedly these acts of injustice are the sort of acts which are frequently calculated, unless they are redressed, to lead to war; and it is the bounden duty of the American Government to attend to remonstrances so well grounded as those which we have addressed to them. The conduct of the American Government in 1812 is held up by the noble Marquess as an example for imitation. I cannot think that this is the case; for if the complaints of the American Government had been well founded, if they had waited a few months they would have seen the effect of the eloquence of my noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham). But it is to be recollected that the American Government at that time had to complain of what I think was a very great abuse, the arbitrary and lawless power exercised by our officers, who had seized men, and, without any proof of their being British subjects, pressed them into our navy. Americans have told me how strong was the feeling which that caused. I have been told that it frequently happened that the sons of farmers in the New England States who had gone on board merchant ships for a year or two, were seized and made to serve on board our ships of war as if they were British subjects, and no redress could be obtained. Of course, that conduct rankled in the minds of the Americans; but still some years elapsed before they proceeded so far as to make it a casus belli against this country. Your Lordships must bear in mind, too, that if we were to resort to extremities we should have considerable difficulty in determining what course to pursue; for the Confederate States are in the constant habit of ordering conscriptions and forcing British subjects to serve under their standard. When our Consuls have remonstrated, they have been told, in the first place, that the men might apply to the courts of justice, and then, when they repeated their remonstrances, the Consuls themselves were sent away altogether. If, therefore, we have to complain of great injuries on the part of the Federal States, we have no less reason to complain of the conduct of the Confederate States; and if war is our only remedy we must go to war with both belligerents. The noble Marquess seems to have an appetite for war, and perhaps he would be better pleased to go to war with both parties than with one only. All, however, I can say at present is, that our remonstrances shall be continued; and that we shall continue to warn, as we have heretofore endeavoured to warn, the subjects of Her Majesty in Ireland against embarking in these plans, which pretend to be plans for obtaining their labour at high wages in America, but which are really intended to entrap them to serve in the armies of the Federal Government, and to secure the fraudulent gains which the concoctors of these schemes hope to make in the shape of bounties for enlistment. I agree with the noble and learned Lord, (Lord Brougham) who has just spoken, that this is a most horrible war. There appears to be such hatred and animosity between great hosts of men, who were lately united under one Government, that no consideration seems powerful enough to induce them to put an end to their fratricidal strife; and it is difficult to deal with them on those ordinary principles which have hitherto governed the conduct of civilized mankind. It is to be hoped that these hostilities may cease; but I am afraid it is not to be reckoned on that any interference of ours would tend to conduce to that end; because, among the other feelings of violence and animosity which prevail in America, there is a strong feeling against any of the nations of Europe, but especially any of the monarchical nations, pretending to meddle with the civil war now raging in that country. I am afraid, therefore, that we shall not be able by any of the means suggested to put an end to this war. Still, it is dreadful to think that hundreds of thousands of men are being slaughtered for the purpose of preventing the Southern States from acting on those very principles of independence which in 1776 were asserted by the whole of America against this country. Only a few years ago the Americans were in the habit, on the 4th of July, of celebrating the promulgation of the Declaration of Independence, and some eminent friends of mine never failed to make eloquent and stirring orations on those occasions. I wish, while they kept up a useless ceremony—for the present generation of Englishmen are not responsible for the War of Independence—that they had inculcated upon their own minds that they should not go to war with 4,000,000 5,000,000, or 6,000,000 of their fellow countrymen who want to put the principles of 1776 into operation as regards themselves. With respect to the Motion of the noble Marquess, I shall produce whatever papers we have got. Those papers, I think, tell a story very discreditable to the American Republic. All I can say is that we shall continue to remonstrate in the strongest terms, not to save the unfortunate men who have already enlisted, and many of whom have already fallen in the field, but with a view to prevent similar practices in future.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he did not want the Government to take any steps for the protection of persons who had voluntarily separated from their allegiance to the Queen and taken part with the Federal or Confederate States. But there were others who had been entrapped into the American service, and he was sorry to hear that the noble Lord intended to do no more than continue his remonstrances, which up to the present moment had proved quite ineffectual. If the noble Earl inquired of the Secretary for War, he would learn that about 5,000 men, chiefly bachelors, were now embarking every week at Cork for America; that they were provided with free passages paid for in greenbacks; and that as soon as they landed they were either put on board American ships of war, or sent to one or other of the American armies. While all this was going on the noble Lord would also learn that we could get no recruits in Ireland for our own regiments, and that the military authorities were actually going to reduce the recruiting dépôt at Cork.

EARL RUSSELL said, that if the noble Marquess would furnish him with reliable evidence of illegal transactions at Cork or elsewhere, he would at once order the parties to be prosecuted.

COUNTY COURTS ACT AMENDMENT BILL—[No. 70.]—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he was informed that his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack had called upon the County Court Registrars to report in detail the circumstances of all cases within their knowledge, where persons unable to pay their debts had actually been subjected to imprisonment. The answers of the County Court Judges had been laid upon the table, and he wished to know whether there would be any objection to lay their Reports on the table before the further consideration of the County Courts Act Amendment Bill to-morrow week?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had not given any instructions whatever that such Returns should be asked for from the Registrars; but he was not quite sure but that his Secretary might have written to some particular Registrars requesting information on the subject. However, he would make inquiry, and if he had found that Reports of the kind referred to had been made he should produce them. In his own opinion, the reduction of the limitation in the case of debts under £20 to one year was the true conclusion to which they must ultimately come, but at the same time the transition would at present be great. He was, therefore, prepared to agree to the Amendment to reduce the period in the first instance to three years. He held also that a measure of this description ought to be purely prospective, and not retrospective in its operation. It was intended that the period of limitation should be reckoned from the date of the last item supplied, or of the last part payment, or of any subsequent acknowledgment in writing of the debt after delivery.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he thought there would now be perfect accord on the subject, for the Amendment proposed by the noble and learned Lord was, subject to trifling variations, the same as he was himself prepared to move when the Bill was in Committee.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether there has been any Official Correspondence from the Commander-in-Chief at Devonport on the subject of the recent inspection of the Research; and, if so, whether he will lay it on the table of the House?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in reply, said, there was a very great objection to laying the Confidential Reports of Naval Officers to the Admiralty on the table of the House. If his hon. and gallant Friend would state any particular points in the case on which he wished for information, he should be very happy to furnish him with it. He objected to the production of the Correspondence in question simply on the ground of principle.

The Lord Chancellor

MR. FERRAND said, he had put a similar Question to the noble Lord a few nights ago, and he had stated in reply that he would lay the Correspondence on the table.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: My hon. and gallant Friend alludes to further Correspondence.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he must urge upon the noble Lord the expediency of producing the letter for which he had just asked, as it involved the character of a distinguished officer, and also the quality of one of Her Majesty's Ships.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: If my hon. and gallant Friend puts it to me in that way I cannot refuse, but as a rule it is my duty to object to produce Reports from officers, which are always more or less of a confidential nature.

THE COLONY OF LAGOS.

QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether his attention has been called to the disastrous condition of the Colony of Lagos, and to the circumstance that the policy adopted by the Governor has destroyed the trade with Abbeokouta, and compelled its inhabitants to defend themselves against the recent attack of the King of Dahomey with ammunition purchased in exchange for slaves from French merchants at Porto Novo; and that thus the Colony of Lagos, founded for the alleged purpose of suppressing the Slave Trade, has been the direct means of stimulating it; whether the Governor of Lagos has been or will be recalled; and whether, in order to avert the recurrence of such costly disasters as have recently taken place, both at Lagos and on the Gold Coast, Her Majesty's Government has considered the expediency of relinquishing all territorial Protectorates on the West Coast of Africa?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, the Governor of Lagos had written to him by the last mail stating that he was about to proceed upon a mission to Abbeokouta in the hope of restoring, by pacific measures, the peaceful relations between the people of that district and the King of Dahomey, the war between whom was the chief cause of the depression of trade to which the hon. Gentleman had referred, and also to obtain redress for the long standing claims of British subjects. The answer which he had returned to the communication of the Governor was that he should confine himself to pacific measures in the prosecution of his mission. In reply to the last part of the Question he was not prepared to say that there was any change in the policy hitherto pursued by the Government. He conceived that our object was to promote legitimate commerce, and to discourage human sacrifices by all legitimate means; and he should be always ready to use his best efforts to promote those objects, with the smallest possible expenditure of blood and treasure on the part of this country. It would be satisfactory to the House to know that the Slave Trade was now almost unknown in Lagos; and he wished to add that he must not be regarded as concurring in the assumption that it was the policy of the Governor which was the principal cause of the difficulties in that quarter. The chief cause, on the contrary, he believed to be the war between the Abbeokutas and the King of Dahomey, which the Governor was endeavouring by pacific measures to put down. He could not, he might add, countenance the imputation conveyed in the question, that the French merchants at Porto Novo had been concerned in the Slave Trade. The Government had not determined to recall the Governor of Lagos, nor was it his wish to say a single word in that House to discredit a public officer who was engaged in the discharge of such arduous duties as that gentleman had to perform.

OYSTER DREDGING AT BEACHY HEAD. QUESTION.

MR. CAVE said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been directed to a statement that a large fleet of oyster smacks has been lately dredging within twenty miles south of Beachy Head; whether this is not contrary to law; and, if so, why the prohibition against smacks putting to sea with dredges on board after the 30th of April, which has been rigidly carried out at Shoreham Harbour, is not enforced elsewhere?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, in reply, that some information, though not of a very definite character, had been obtained, that vessels were dredging under the circumstances mentioned in the Question of the hon. Gentleman. If that were so, undoubtedly it was contrary to the law. With respect to the latter part of the Question, all he could say was that repeated warnings had been given to the owners and masters of fishing vessels, that if they infringed the law they would render themselves liable to penalties, as well as the loss of their oysters, dredges, and other fishing gear.

MR. CAVE said, he wished to know why the prohibition to put dredges on board had not been enforced?

MR. MILNER GIBSON replied, that within certain limits and under certain circumstances it was not illegal to have dredges on board in the fine months. It was, however, prohibited to have dredges on board at certain seasons on the particular part of the coast to which the Question of the hon. Gentleman referred.

MR. CAVE said, the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the latter part of his Question. Without dredges on board there could be no illegal dredging.

DENMARK AND GERMANY—THE CONFERENCE.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he can give the House any information as to the result of the sitting of the Conference that day?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I am in a position to answer that Question, and in a manner which I hope will be satisfactory to the House. The Conference to-day prolonged the armistice for a fortnight from the 12th inst., the day on which it would have expired.

COUNTESS OF ELGIN AND KINCARDINE. [QUEEN'S MESSAGE, 6TH JUNE.]

(In the Committee.)

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Mr. Massey, Sir, the duty which I have to perform will, I am sure, commend itself to the acceptance of the Committee. There is no occasion upon which this House is more entirely the organ of the feelings of the nation than when it acknowledges the eminent services performed by those who have sacrificed their time, their health, and even their lives in the public service; and the proposal which I am about to make is one that falls within that category. That which I have to propose is that, in accordance with the recommendation of Her Majesty, this House should agree to confer a pension of £1,000 a year upon the widow of the late Earl of Elgin in acknowledgment of the public services of that lamented statesman. I may state that the Indian Department, equally sensible of the great services which the Earl of Elgin performed in the East, have agreed to settle upon his widow another pension of equal amount; so that the provision will be £2,000 a year—£1,000 I hope to be provided by this House, and another £1,000 by the Indian Department. Sir, it has seldom fallen to the lot of any public man to perform services more varied with regard to the scene of their action, more important with regard to their results, or attended with greater personal exertion and personal exposure than were performed by the late Earl of Elgin. He began his services as Governor of Jamaica, the affairs of which island he administered with great ability; and he was removed thence, in consequence of the high opinion which was entertained of his abilities, to become Governor General of Canada. He was four years in Jamaica, and eight years Governor General of Canada. During that period he had the fortune to conciliate the good will of the Government of the United States, and he was able, undertaking a mission to Washington, to conclude that treaty of reciprocity between those States and our North American Colonies which has produced so much advantage to the intercourse of those two countries, and also indirectly to the commerce of this country. In 1857 the Earl of Elgin was selected to go on a mission to China—a mission attended with very great personal difficulties, and labour, and exposure, and peculiarly difficult in consequence of the character of the people with whom he had to negotiate. He accompanied the expedition, which had to carry on military operations, and succeeded in negotiating and concluding the Treaty of Tien-tsin. He returned to England, and, as is well known, became Postmaster General, but he was afterwards despatched to China upon another mission in consequence of a rupture which took place between the English and Chinese Governments, resulting from the refusal of the latter to ratify by the Emperor's signature the Treaty of Tien-tsin. He succeeded, after overcoming many difficulties, in obtaining the ratification of that treaty, and establishing our Minister at Peking; a result which I am sure those best acquainted with China will acknowledge to have been pregnant with good results, and most favourable to the maintenance of friendly relations between this country and the Government of China. Not only did he succeed in that very important transaction, but he also went to Japan and concluded the Treaty of Jeddo, which has opened a field of very profitable and extensive commerce to this country. To succeed in those difficult negotiations with people so little acquainted with the habits and manners of Europeans as the Chinese and Japanese, so accustomed in their intercourse with foreigners to deal in deceit, evasion, and even sometimes in breaches of faith, required a singular combination of firmness and conciliation, and I may say of the late Earl of Elgin that he was in an eminent degree the possessor of those peculiar qualities. He returned from that successful enterprise in China and Japan, and was performing his duties as Postmaster General when the unfortunate loss of Earl Canning rendered it necessary to appoint a successor to him in the Governor Generalship of India. I ought to mention, in connection with the Earl of Elgin's mission to China, that being on his way thither with troops, and with every prospect, therefore, of an early and successful accomplishment of the object of the very important mission which had been intrusted to him, and hearing of the mutiny in India, he sacrificed all personal considerations, forewent that which might perhaps have been the turning point of his diplomatic career, returned to Calcutta, and gave to Earl Canning the most important and effectual assistance which it was in his power to render. That was an act of great decision, of great vigour, and of great forbearance and self-denial, and of great patriotism. Being in England at the time when news arrived of the unfortunate loss of Earl Canning, he was asked to undertake the Government of India, and although it was well known that to encounter the climate of that country at his time of life was not unattended with certain hazards, the opinions of those who from their knowledge of his ability and experience urged him to undertake that important duty prevailed over all other considerations; he went to India and became Governor General. If it had been the will of Providence that he should have fulfilled the ordinary term of government in that country, he would, like other Governors General, have been able to make such a provision for his family as would have placed them beyond the necessity of any appeal to the country for assistance. It so happened, however, that his life was cut short, and he was, therefore, unable to make any provision for his family. We all know that when a man first undertakes an appointment of that kind he has to incur great expenses, which are only reimbursed by his continuing to enjoy the emoluments of the office for some time. I trust, then, that the Committee, considering, on the one hand, the great and valued services of the Earl of Elgin, and, on the other, that he was unable to take that advantage of his Indian appointment which in the natural course of things he would have been enabled to do, will concur with me in thinking that we are only paying a proper tribute to his merit and making a proper acknowledgment of his services by agreeing to the Vote which I have now the honour to propose. The noble Lord concluded by moving a formal Resolution conferring upon the Countess of Elgin for life a pension of £1,000 a year.

LORD STANLEY: Sir, I do not intend to detain the Committee, nor do I think it necessary to add anything to what has been said by the noble Lord the First Minister; but upon an occasion of this kind it did not seem to us fitting that entire silence should be observed on this side of the House; and I say for myself, and I know I may say it for those who sit near me, that we cordially and entirely concur in the estimate which the noble Lord has formed and expressed of the public character and services of the Earl of Elgin. When services like his have been rendered, and rendered not to a party but to the State, it is right that they should be recognized by all parties; and I am sure that the Vote which the noble Lord has proposed will meet with no objection or no unfriendly reception from any party in this House.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY: Will the grant by the East Indian Company be brought before the House in any shape? I have constitutional reasons for wishing to have an answer to that question from the noble Lord.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: Perhaps I may be allowed to answer the question by stating what the Council for India has done. A large portion of the services of the Earl of Elgin having been rendered in other parts of the world, it was not for them to take upon themselves the entire charge of recognizing his services, but they felt that services were rendered by him to India on the occasion referred to by the noble Lord, when, with the highest honour to himself, he responded at once to the application of Earl Canning, and diverted the troops which were then on their way to China for the service of India. The service which the Earl of Elgin thus rendered, and also by going himself from Canton to Calcutta to see what further aid could be given to India at the time of her greatest need, had established a claim upon the Government of India which those who had charge of the Indian revenue felt it their bounded duty to recognize. His tenure of office in India was not long. He had no opportunity of distinguishing himself in the way that his predecessors in the governorship of India had done; but he had shown, so far as opportunity has afforded, the greatest discrimination and judgment with regard to all the matters that had been submitted to his consideration. So strongly was this felt that the first act of the Council of the Governor General after his death was to record in a confidential memorandum, which was transmitted to me, an expression of their unanimous opinion that some recognition of his services should be given in the shape of a pension to his widow; and it was their feeling that the revenues of India might bear their part in the general recognition of his services. That confidential memorandum was signed by every Member of the Council of the Governor General in India, and it was transmitted by Sir William Denison when temporarily occupying the position of Governor General. The statement which my noble Friend has made I concur in most strongly; and the Council of India, taking into consideration the distinguished services of the Earl of Elgin, have this very morning unanimously voted a pension of £1,000 a year to be paid to Lady Elgin for her natural life, commencing from the time of her husband's death, in addition to that which I hope and trust this House will be ready unanimously to give.

MR. HENNESSY: The question of the hon. Baronet has not been answered, namely, whether the £1000 voted by the Indian Council to the Countess of Elgin, will come before the House. The Countess of Elgin, no doubt, well deserves this pension, and I do not find fault with it. Indeed she might receive with propriety perhaps a more liberal pension than has been granted; but, in a constitutional point of view, it was important to know whether the grant of the additional £1000 would come under the consideration of the House.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: There is no doubt that question will not be brought before the House. The Council of India exercises independent functions with reference to the revenues of India, and the Vote of the Council concurred in by the Secretary of State does not require the confirmation of the House.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER: I have no desire to prolong this discussion, but I wish to impress on Her Majesty's Government, that on another occasion, when a similar Vote will be brought before the House, the noble Lord ought to explain the principle upon which pensions are granted. I think the pension of £1,000 a year a very moderate sum; but when the Vote of £20,000 to Sir Rowland Hill is brought before the House, I shall be glad to hear the principle upon which pensions are granted, more particularly to general officers. It is usual when the Crown confers a title for this House to grant a pension of £2,000 per annum for life, and for two generations; but it is considered by some that it is not a good arrangement or economical to the country, or an adequate sum to enable a noble Lord to sustain his position. When Sir Rowland Hill's pension comes before the House, I do not think it will be an improper time to raise the question, and receive an explanation from the noble Lord of the principle upon which these sums are granted.

Resolved,

That the annual sum of One Thousand Pounds be granted to Her Majesty, out of the Consolidated Fund of Great Britain and Ireland, the said Annuity to commence from the 20th day of November, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and to be settled in the most beneficial manner upon Mary Louisa, Countess of Elgin and Kincardine, widow of the late James, Earl of Elgin and Kincardine, Her Majesty's Viceroy and Governor General of India, for the term of her natural life.

House resumed.

[BILL 96.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Mr. Hennessy

COLONEL GILPIN said, this Bill had been committed and re-committed, amended and re-amended, but it had undergone no discussion in that House; and, so far as he could discover, it had found no favour with the country. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced the Bill he laid considerable stress upon the clause that proposed to exonerate the taxpayers from responsibility in case of defaulting collectors. Nothing was more just in principle than that when once the tax had been paid to an authorized officer, the taxpayer should not be called upon to pay it over again; but it was not necessary to bring in a Bill for that object, and at the same time make the payment of the tax more odious. The object which the Bill professed to have in view might be attained by taking proper security from the collectors. The right hon. Gentleman on one occasion said that the Bill was a reply to the local commissioners; but he remembered that some time ago a project of the same kind was referred to the commissioners with whom he was in the habit of acting. Their opinion was unanimously against the proposal, and he considered they were right in coming to that conclusion. The only way for hon. Members to test the practical effect of a Bill of the kind was to refer to their own districts, and see how it would work there. In a report from the Inland Revenue Office to the Treasury it was alleged that a saving of £50,000 a year might be expected under the Bill; but during the thirty years which he had been connected with one of the largest districts in the county of Bedford, though he had never known a single instance of a defaulting collector appointed by the local commissioners, he could not say the same of officers appointed by the Government. The district contained twenty-nine parishes, which hitherto had been assessed by two persons in each parish, making fifty-eight in all. He had gone narrowly into a calculation of all the charges that, on the lowest estimate, would be entailed under the new system introduced by the Bill, and found that the collection in the twenty-nine parishes would cost £570. In the year 1861, when the income tax stood at 9d. in the pound, the whole expenses of collecting and assessing the tax in that particular district was £176 5s.; so that the increased charge there would amount to no less than 399 per cent. In his calculation he had taken no account of contingent expenses, or of the known facilities with which all Civil Service Estimates expanded; he had merely taken moderately and fairly those items which were contemplated by the Bill. The Bill was understood to have the warm support of the Revenue department, which might get some pickings, and likewise have its patronage increased; but in the counties adjacent to his own, and in other districts of his own county, having made inquiry, he found that its operation would be attended with much the same effect which he had already shown it would have in his own district. If anywhere, one would expect to find the principal saving effected in large towns; but, strangely enough, the right hon. Gentleman had omitted from the re-committed Bill the whole of the London district. He could not help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman found the Bill so unpopular in London that he was afraid to encounter the opposition of the metropolitan Members. If that were the case, he ought to have some consideration for the country districts, in which the measure was not a whit more popular. He could not conceive that any saving would be effected by the passing of the Bill, and he hoped the House would hesitate before sanctioning a measure that would certainly render the collection and payment of taxes more odious than at present.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he had hoped his hon. Friend would have concluded with a Resolution expressing his views on the subject. He had himself given notice of his intention to move an Amendment to the Motion for going into Committee. The fact was, that the House had had no opportunity of expressing an opinion on the Bill. They had, indeed, slid into a very inconvenient kind of legislation in allowing Bills to pass their earlier stages in silence. Those who objected to a measure were hampered by being compelled to state their objections to the principle of a Bill on the Motion for going into Committee. That system had been carried to such an extent during the present Session, that the House had not, up to that time, had an opportunity of passing an opinion upon the principle of the Government Annuities Bill. It was read a first time, and then, after the second reading, was handed over to a Select Committee, which led to much general discussion on Loan and Friendly Societies. The Committee altered the preamble and the title. When the Bill came again it contained seventeen clauses instead of three, and only a few words of the original Bill were left unaltered to save the point of order. He was told that the Committee had heard evidence which had never been reported. The House had since had no opportunity of considering that Bill, and it was in a similar position in regard to the measure before them. Was the House prepared to sanction the principle of a Bill which provided that, in lieu of collectors, who were appointed by the local commissioners, the land tax, the assessed tax, and the income tax should be collected by the officers of the Inland Revenue? The House had not yet gone into Committee on the Bill, although that before them was the third edition. The fact that London was excepted from the measure was striking evidence that there was something faulty in it, because the metropolis was precisely the district in which it would seem to be right and fair to apply the principle of the Bill. When the income tax was proposed by the late Sir Robert Peel he gave two distinct pledges—first, that the tax should be temporary, and next, that its collection should be local. Was the House prepared lightly to abandon the latter principle, which constituted the only safeguard which the country had with reference to that extremely disagreeable tax. He was not prepared to contend that the law regulating the local collection was what it ought to be. It had been, on the contrary, a disgrace to every Government for the last twenty years that it should have been left in such a state. What was wanted was a consolidation of the law, which was spread over more than twenty confused Acts, having their origin in the Assessed Tax Act of 1803. The law ought to be comprised in a single statute, clear and intelligible to every person, and giving the local commissioners power to appoint, under the sanction of the Inland Revenue Board, a proper number of collectors at fair salaries, taking proper securities for the faithful discharge of their duties. The existing system was unsatisfactory, because it left parishes in this dangerous position—that after they had paid their taxes to the collector legally appointed to receive the same, they might be called upon to pay the same taxes a second time. That system was so unfair and unjust that it was marvellous it should have been tolerated up to that time. Mr. Pressly stated in his evidence that there were 54,000 local collectors, who cost £85,000. Mr. Pressly admitted that if the collectors were abolished it would be necessary to increase the number of Excise officers under the Inland Revenue Board, and he also confessed that any change in the local collection was extremely distasteful to the commissioners, who, he stated, very much reflected the opinion of the country. It was worthy of remark that in the few cases that had occurred in which the local collectors had been superseded by the officers of the Inland Revenue, the expense of collection had been found to be considerably increased. It might, no doubt, be more advantageously carried into effect as a general, and not as a partial measure. He trusted that the House would pass before sanctioning the principle of the Bill. It was the thin end of the wedge, and he would therefore move, That it is not expedient that the land tax, the assessed taxes, and the income tax should be collected by the officers of Inland Revenue.

Motion
 Mr. PACKE said, that if there were no other reason for opposing the Bill, he should oppose it on the ground that it would be a great evil to have different modes of collection in various parts of the country. The proposed alteration in the collection of Government taxes was most unpopular in his part of the country. Instead of collection by assessors in the various parishes, the Bill proposed that persons should collect these taxes in the various market towns. Some of the payments under the land tax did not exceed 2s. and 3d., and it would be a great hardship and extremely vexatious to compel persons having such sums to pay to go fourteen or fifteen miles to a market town instead of paying them to the collector of the parish. Moreover, the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed by the Bill to place the collection of taxes in the hands of the most unpopular body in the kingdom—namely, the Excisemen. He had the greatest pleasure in seconding the Amendment.

Land Tax
 Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is not expedient that the Land Tax, Assessed Taxes, and the Income Tax should be collected by the officers of the Inland Revenue,"—(Sir Henry Willoughby.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. HUNT said, he was sorry to find in the Bill a principle which was generally in favour with weak Governments when they had any doubt about carrying their measures. It was made a permissive measure, and left to the authorities in the country to adopt it or not. An attempt was made on the previous day to carry a Bill with reference to the sale of intoxicating liquors, embodying that principle. A more successful attempt was made two years ago, and the principle was adopted in the case of the Highways Bill. The Government introduced that measure, and left it to the magistrates to say whether they would adopt it or not. In that case a compulsory Bill had passed a second reading the Session before, and there was no occasion therefore to make the new measure permissive. The consequence was, that the Highways Act had been a bone of contention between the ratepayers and the magistrates in half the counties of the kingdom. In his opinion, it was for the representatives of the people in that House to act in an independent manner, and incur any odium that might attach to them in supporting or opposing a measure, and not get rid of it by a kind of compromise. He protested against their delegating to local bodies the task of deciding whether any particular measure should or should not be adopted in their respective localities. The Bill before the House was open to that objection, for the second clause provided that the Bill should not be adopted in any county, riding, city, borough, town, or parish, if one-third of the Board within that jurisdiction expressed their opinion, in a formal manner, that they were unwilling to adopt it. What, then, would be the position of the unfortunate Commissioners of Taxes? It was well known that in the country the persons who had the duties of making the assessments were, generally speaking, appointed collectors, and looked to be repaid for their trouble in assessing the tax by the small profits of its collection. All those persons would lose a portion of their income if the Bill were to be adopted, and, in such a case, it was only human nature that they should importune the Commissioners of Taxes in their districts to put a veto on the Bill. It was unconstitutional that those persons, not being elected by the ratepayers, should be intrusted with such a power. He protested against the Commissioners having such an odious task imposed upon them; and he felt so strongly on that point that, had it been omitted, he should have been prepared to consider the Bill in Committee, but it being part of the measure, he should support the Amendment.

Mr. WARNER said that some of the objections which had been urged against the Bill would rather induce him to support it. It was perfectly well known that the payment of the collectors varied enormously in different districts. There might be reasons for leaving out places where the pay for collection was large, but there were districts in which collectors could not be induced without compulsion to work for the remuneration which they received. The consequence was that all sorts of illegal proceedings were resorted to in order to repay the collectors for their trouble. In one place the collector was paid out of the highway-rate; in another a voluntary rate which was collected with the poor-rate was made for him. Another grave objection to the present state of the law was the liability of a man who had paid his tax to be again called upon to pay it in consequence of the default of the collector. The Bill might not be the best remedy for existing evils, but, as no better had been proposed, he should support it.

Mr. BARROW said, that he objected to the Bill as it was a measure for one class of society and not for another. It would involve the necessity of small farmers having very small sums to pay going sometimes a distance of twenty miles to pay their tax twice in every twelve months. That to his mind was a very serious objection, particularly as he knew the difficulty there was in persuading the ordinary class of small farmers of the necessity of their paying their taxes before any legal process was taken. For instance, a man appealed against the tax charged for his horse, and it was shown that he had used it once or twice for the purposes of pleasure, although at other times for the purposes of agriculture only; and he was ordered to pay. That man felt he had suffered a hardship, and he would doggedly refuse to pay the tax; and he did not think the proposal was likely to diminish the difficulty. By the present system a man's neighbour was the collector, and pressed him to pay the tax; his neighbour was the assessor, the commissioners also were his neighbours, and for them he would be likely to have some respect. Under the Bill he would have nothing but a notice by letter, which would not have the same effect as the remonstrances of his neighbours, and he would at once become liable to a very expensive process on the part of Her Majesty's Exchequer. He was unwilling to accept any measure which was likely to put the poorer classes of his constituents in such a position, and render them liable to such expense. The Bill did not apply to the inhabitants of the metropolis, who would have no difficulty in paying. The collection was infinitely more profitable in London than in the country; but, though the country collector was very badly paid, he (Mr. Barrow) knew from a very long experience that there was no difficulty in persuading men to undertake the duty of collection, because they believed it was a kindness to their neighbours to do so. The Bill had had its clauses altered over and over again by the right hon. Gentleman; it had been put through Committee pro forma, but there had never been any real opportunity of discussing it. He should, therefore, oppose the measure.

Mr. HORSFALL said, he thought the Bill was a step in the right direction. They must bear in mind that the rate-payers had felt the present mode of collecting the rates in many instances to be a great grievance. It was calculated that the saving to the revenue would be £50,000; but from the evidence taken before the Committee it appeared that it would be a saving to the public revenue of as much as £80,000 per annum. At present, in case the collector eloped, although the taxpayer had paid his taxes, he was liable to be again called upon. That was because the collectors were appointed by irresponsible parties, and not by Government. But if a Government collector were to fail, no such thing could happen. When the tax was paid once, it was paid for all. As to the supposed difficulty of collecting the tax by letter, they had it in evidence that in Scotland, where collection by letter had been tried, it had been found easier to collect it in that than in any other way. Though very much in favour of the Bill, he thought the Members for London, sixteen in number, had exercised an undue influence on the Government in the matter, and he should be prepared, if the Bill went into Committee, to vote that the exception in favour of London should be struck out.

Mr. LIDDELL said, it seemed to him that an important point had been lost sight of in the discussion—namely, that the Bill was a breach of Parliamentary faith. He always understood that Sir Robert Peel imposed the income tax upon the express condition that it should be locally assessed, and it was accepted by the country on that condition. The income tax was an obnoxious, but he feared it was a necessary tax; but now that it appeared to be fixed in perpetuity, to alter the conditions of its assessment was to his mind highly objectionable. The proposed mode of collection was a leaf taken out of the Scotch book. The system had been successful there, but it was introduced with the concurrence of the Scotch people. There had been no such concurrence on the part of the English people, and he should therefore vote for the Amendment.

Mr. JACKSON said, he thought if the late Sir Robert Peel had been alive he would have gladly supported the measure, because experience would have taught him that the present mode of collection was a bad one. He only regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not introduced a Bill to make not only the collection, but also the assessment by Government officers, as he believed there would be a very large amount thereby added to the income of the country; and those who had honestly paid would be relieved by making those pay who had not acted with equal honesty. He thought, however, that the operation of the Bill should be general and include the Metropolis.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON said, he objected to the Bill, as it was most undesirable that that sort of permissive Bills should be brought in. So far as the assessment was concerned, it was practically not altered, as the assessment was in fact made by a Government officer. As to the assessors, although they were very sharp men in their own way, when called upon to make the assessment, they were the dullest people possible; and when they had to discharge duties with which they were utterly unacquainted, they were as stupid and ignorant as could be imagined. If, however, it was right to take the collectorship out of the hands of the Commissioners, the same rule should be applied to the towns as to the country districts. He would therefore vote in favour of the Amendment.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Liddell), whilst he allowed that there had been a saving in Scotland by the adoption of the system proposed by the Bill, stated that the House would be guilty of a breach of faith if it adopted the measure, as the late Sir Robert Peel made a promise that the collection of the income tax should be a local collection. Puzzled by the conflict in these two statements he endeavoured to escape from the difficulty by saying that the system had been adopted in Scotland by the will of the people; but if the Bill was carried in that House, he apprehended that in England also it would be adopted by the will of the people of England. The indication of the will of the people was to be found, first, in the judgment expressed through the medium of the representative principle in that House; and, secondly, in the various utterances of opinions, which were made known by the usual channels of information. On many occasions during the time in which he had had the honour of holding his present office, the question of the collection of taxes had been raised and discussed in that House; and he was sure all who shared in those discussions would bear him witness that he had always expressed his own opinion that the present system was very faulty, and contained hardships and grievances in different forms; but that while it was easy, in his opinion, to devise an amendment to the system, it would be impossible to carry it out unless with a general concurrence of opinion. Therefore, it must not be supposed that the present was a Bill which there was any endeavour to force by the effort of Government on a reluctant House. If the opinion of the House should be adverse to the measure he would bow to its decision, though he would have to regret the continuance of the evils of the present system. He thought that the course taken by the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham in not giving notice of opposition to a Bill which had been months before the House was not usual; but, as he courted criticism, he was glad to see an opportunity afforded for bringing out the opinion of the House. He did not think himself in the slightest degree wedded to the Bill, and he also thought that it should pass with a great amount of approval or not at all. After what had been said he must remind the House that there were serious evils in the present system with which they had to deal. There had been constant complaints of the conduct of collectors of taxes—not perhaps very numerous when the vastness of their operations was considered—in respect to their incivility, officiousness, for not calling at a proper time for the taxes, on account of nothing being heard of them until some summons or threat of legal process appeared, and on the ground that demands were made for taxes before they were legally due. Year after year these complaints had been made subjects of debate in that House, and his answer had been that those officers were persons over whom the Executive had no control, as they were appointed by independent parties. From the dissatisfaction with which that answer was apparently received, he concluded that hon. Gentlemen felt that the existing state of things was not sound, and if any reasons existed for its continuance they should be very strong ones. It was not desirable that taxpayers should have their taxes collected by persons who were practically irresponsible. Another grievance was that unwilling or reluctant persons were appointed to hold the office of collectors. The hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) said that a great pressure would be put upon the Commissioners to veto the Bill. Such knowledge as he possessed led him to an opposite conclusion, for he believed that in rural districts very generally the appointment to the office of collector was not valued, and many persons considered it a grievance that the office was imposed on them, and that they were bound by law to take it. There were even cases—exceptional cases—where it had been supposed that personal spleen had been indulged through the medium of the power of compelling parties to take the office. Then there was the great and abominable grievance of re-assessment when the local officer failed in his duty, and the Government said that they would divest localities of that grievance, if the local commissioners divested themselves of the power of appointing the collectors. The hon. and gallant Member for Bedfordshire (Colonel Gilpin) had favoured the House with his calculations as to the expenses of the Act, but with the greatest respect for the opinion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, he could not place so much reliance on his judgment, as on that of the Board of Inland Revenue Department, who would have had to carry the Act out, and knew precisely how they could do it with effect, and who had not deserved the censures the hon. and gallant Gentleman had passed upon them; for whatever might have been the tendency of other departments to become more expensive, thrift and economy had always characterised that; and the consequence was a reduction rather than an increase in the estimates for the collection of the Revenue. He did not think the hon. and gallant Member could, moreover, fairly take his district as a sample of the whole country. In some districts the expense would be comparatively great, and in the more populous districts the saving would be the greatest; but, at the same time, the small districts would receive the greatest share of relief. He fancied that he needed not to speak of the supposed breach of faith with respect to the promise of Sir Robert Peel, for how could Sir Robert Peel promise that under all circumstances Parliament would continue to believe it expedient to leave the collection of taxes under local officers? They must look to the principle contained in Sir Robert Peel's words. No doubt there was an important principle involved in the announcement which Sir Robert Peel made—control over the distribution of taxation by local independent authority—but as far as regarded collection, that was not a matter of principle, but of convenience. Very little had been said to enable him to judge of the objections to the details of the Bill: two had been mentioned, one was that the metropolis was omitted, and the other that the Bill was permissive. Now, with regard to the omission of the metropolis. There was one very important reason, besides subsidiary ones, which had led the Government to except the metropolis from the operation of the Bill, and that was that the stamp distributors about the country, through whose instrumentality it was proposed to work the scheme with economy, did not exist in London, and it was not thought desirable to create a special staff for the purpose. In many cases, too, in the metropolis, the collections were on so large a scale that the officers were of a high class, and had round them a large staff, which it would not be for the interests of the metropolis to displace. However, if it were the opinion of the House that the metropolis should be inserted, it was in the power of any hon. Gentleman to move in Committee that the exception should be left out. But the more important objection was that taken by two hon. Members opposite, that the Bill was permissive and not compulsory. He looked upon its permissive character as essential to the measure. It was true that the permissive clause might be struck out, and thus altogether alter the machinery of the Bill; but considering that it had been months in the House, and had been originally announced as a permissive Bill, he did not think the country would have reason to be dissatisfied if the measure were then made compulsory. If the House should, however, agree with the hon. Members for Northamptonshire and Shropshire that the Bill ought to be compulsory, they had better give expression to that opinion by an adverse vote on the Resolution of the hon. Baronet; but he was bound to express a strong opinion that no other than a permissive Bill would ever pass the House. There was the greatest possible difference in the feelings and circumstances of different districts of the country, which would make it difficult to pass anything but a permissive Bill. It might be said that the Bill was a sort of patchwork measure, and the political virtue of some hon. Members might be shocked and scandalized at the law being operative here and inoperative there. But those hon. Members were neither shocked nor scandalized in the matter of church rates, the law with regard to which was altogether permissive. He perfectly agreed that if they were dealing with matters of high politics it would be absurd to have different systems in operation in different parts of the country, and the choice of those systems dependent upon the will of the people; but that was a question as to whether the man who went about and knocked at their doors to ask for the taxes should be a Queen's officer or a local officer, and he was not aware of any principle or usage of the constitution which made it improper to allow a variation of practice in that respect, always presuming what the Bill evidently involved—namely, that the variation of practice could only arise between county A and county B, because county A wished for the Bill and county B did not. It had been said that the Government had admitted that the commissioners were opposed to the Bill. No such admission was ever made. It was, indeed, untrue. A circular was sent round to all the Boards of Commissioners in the kingdom, and the majority of them, in reply, expressed their desire to see the Bill passed. Large communities had also petitioned in its favour. Birmingham had done so. So had Liverpool, which petitioned for a similar change with regard to the assessment as well as the collection. Considering the imperfections in the law and the total want of any other scheme containing an adequate remedy, he hoped the House would go into Committee on the Bill, with a view of allowing such portions of the country as chose to do so to avail themselves of the provisions of the measure. He had no egotistical feeling with regard to the Bill. He hoped he had stated the case fairly; and his opinion was that, after full consideration, the Bill should be freely accepted and passed or decidedly rejected.

Mr. HENLEY said, the right hon. Gentleman had truly stated that the present state of the law on the subject under discussion was not very satisfactory. There were great difficulties attending it, and he was afraid that, make what changes they might, the tax collector, whether he came in the shape of a Government officer or a local collector, would always be a most unpleasant visitor. People would always say that he came at the wrong time, and asked for the money in the wrong way. The right hon. Gentleman had completely misunderstood, and, misunderstanding, had in a great degree misrepresented the objection of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire and the hon. Baronet on the same bench. Because to what did the right hon. Gentleman liken this measure? He said there could be no objection to the permissive character of the Bill, because the ratepayers had an option whether they would or would not levy church rates. What possible analogy could there be between ratepayers levying a church rate and a dozen or half-dozen commissioners not elected by the ratepayers setting themselves against—what? Against the Queen's Government. Because that was what it would amount to. They were to do nothing unless the Queen, through her Revenue department, expressed an opinion that a particular mode of collecting the taxes was desirable in a particular county. It was not a fair thing to put those gentlemen in a position antagonistic to the Queen's Government in a matter of this kind. The taxpayers had no voice in the matter. The commissioners could in no sense be said to represent the taxpayers. All they had to do was to see that the taxpayers were first assessed and then harried and squeezed for the money. The taxpayers would like to get rid of the whole boiling of the commissioners and the whole kit of the collectors, tax, and all. They would pay no taxes at all if they could help it. The hon. Member for Evesham had remarked that the Bill did not come in in the usual way. It did not come in in the usual way. There had been two or three editions of the measure; and the last edition had in one fell sweep struck out one-sixth part of the whole community. If the measure were good why was it not good for London. The hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Horsfall) had spoken of its beneficial operation in Scotland; but Scotland was to be exempted from the measure. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: The system is already in force there.] The next point was, the saving to be effected by the Bill. He supposed the calculations on that subject included London. The hon. Member for Liverpool spoke of the evidence on the matter taken before the Committee. He supposed that did not exclude London. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said he was certain that the rural districts were so oppressed by the collection of taxes that they would be only too glad to adopt the new measure. But the unfortunate people who were so oppressed would have no voice. It was the commissioners who would have to decide the question. It was difficult to separate the assessment from the collection. The assessment was a burdensome duty. In the country districts the assessors of one year were generally the collectors of the next, and the poundage of the collection paid them for the work of the assessment. The unfortunate officer would be sadly off if he received no more than his three halfpence a line. In conclusion, the right hon. Gentleman said he should vote for the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham, because he could not see that the Bill was likely to do any good.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he felt bound to say that, while there appeared to be a strong feeling against the Bill in the county which his hon. Friend behind him represented, he had heard of no feeling being expressed in his favour. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he might add, had not informed the House what amount of money would be required for the purpose of compensation if the measure were to pass. Now, at the end of the Bill, there was a clause providing compensation to the local collectors who were removed from their present avocations; and as the intention of the Government was to work the measure through the agency of the existing distributors of stamps, it was quite clear that the compensation which would have to be paid, if the Bill should pass, would make a serious inroad upon the saving which the right hon. Gentleman calculated upon. Seeing, therefore, that there was no chance of any saving accruing to the public under the provisions of the Bill, he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would not deem it necessary to press the House to a division on the Bill, but would withdraw it.

MR. W. WILLIAMS was understood to allude to a defalcation in one of the parishes of the borough he represented as one of the reasons why he gave his support to the measure.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 137; Noes 103: Majority 34.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Commissioners of Inland Revenue to give Notice to Commissioners of Land Tax of intention to appoint Officers of Inland Revenue to be Collectors of Taxes, unless the Boards of Commissioners of Land Tax respectively express their dissent).

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to explain the reason why the metropolis was to be excluded from the operation of this Bill, while other large towns were included.

MR. HORSFALL said, he should move, as an Amendment to the clause, that all the words should be struck out which exempted the metropolis from its operation.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out the Proviso at the end of the Clause—namely, "Provided always, That nothing in this Act contained shall be deemed to extend or apply to the Circuit of Receipt called 'The London Receipt,' as settled under the authority of the third section of the Act passed in the first and second years of the reign of King William the Fourth, chapter eighteen, and the sixth section of the Act passed in the fifth and sixth years of the reign of the same King, chapter twenty." —(Mr. Horsfall.)

MR. AYRTON said, he trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not sanction the Amendment, as all the parties in the metropolis concerned had been under the impression that the Bill in its present form did not apply to them; otherwise they would have shown good reasons why the measure should not apply to the metropolis.

MR. LYALL said, he was in favour of the Bill, and had voted for going into Committee, but he understood that only the Land Tax Commissioners, who received £40,000 a year, had been consulted on the subject. The Income Tax Commissioners, who received a very much larger sum, had not been consulted at all. He wished to see London included in the Bill. It would be to the advantage of the metropolis to be within the Bill, because, if it was not, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be more strict as to re-assessment in case of default, than he would be in districts of which the Government had taken the management and control.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the law of re-assessment was a severe and harsh one, and the questions of waiving a re-assessment were among the most unsatisfactory and disagreeable duties which a person in his position had to deal with. It was always difficult to arrive at the bottom of the interests so keenly concerned, and the questions raised were so nice that he frankly owned that no Minister could discharge the duty satisfactorily. He would explain why it was that he had assented to the exemption of the metropolis. One important distinction was this, that in the case of almost every very large town it was the centre of a rural district, in which the payment of the taxes from the rural district took place. Consequently, if they exempted those large towns the Government would be obliged to have offices and officers in those towns, and at the same time the officers would have nothing to do with the most profitable part of the receipts. They would, in fact, have no duty to perform except the receiving of taxes collected in the rural districts; and his hon. Friend would see that the Government could not undertake to discharge the duty upon those terms. But when they came to the case of still larger towns, they found a large business done under a very efficient system; and if they disturbed the collectors, compensation would be required, while under this Bill their services might be continued. Again, as he had already explained, the Government in the metropolis had no stamp distributors, who in the country would have to carry out the Bill, and who in doing so would have to make the best arrangement they could for the public interest. If the Act were applied to London, they would have to do one of two things—either they must leave the collection in the hands of the existing collectors, or else displace the collectors and give them compensation, and then they would be obliged to appoint, de novo, a fresh staff of Government officers. If a burden were placed upon the country districts, then he admitted that London ought not to be exempted; but that was not the case. It had been erroneously stated that the Bill was not discussed before; it had been discussed on two occasions in the early part of the Session. Gentlemen had called the attention of their constituents to its provisions. It had now been four months before the country, and not a single petition had been presented against it.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he wanted to know why the metropolis was to be the only place having a brand put upon it, distinct from the rest of the country, of working with the existing collectors, the right hon. Gentleman having stated at the same time that it might be expedient to pursue that system in some of the large towns. Some arrangement seemed to have been come to under which the metropolitan Members were to support the Bill, on condition that the metropolis was excluded from its provisions. In the division which had just taken place they enabled the Government to force the measure upon county constituencies, while they themselves were sheltered and shielded by the compact entered into with Government.

MR. COX said, the noble Lord was mistaken in supposing that the whole of the metropolitan Members went into the lobby with the Government. No arrangement whatever had been come to with the metropolitan Members, but a large deputation of inhabitants of the metropolis had waited on the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and whatever agreement was entered into must have been with them. He had previously voted against the Bill, because he believed it would have the effect of vesting a great deal of patronage in the hands of the Government, and because it exhibited a centralizing tendency; and for the same reason he should vote against the metropolis being included.

MR. COLLINS said, that if the Committee sanctioned the Amendment they would produce this difficulty—that, as the metropolis was situated in several counties, the commissioners of the respective counties might come to different resolutions with respect to London itself.

MR. HORSFALL said, the country constituencies had a right to complain of the insertion of the exemption. It was the country constituencies, and not the metropolis, who were taken by surprise.

In the original Bill there was no exclusion of the metropolitan districts. There was a very strong feeling upon the subject ; and his constituents thought that if the Bill was inapplicable to London, it was equally inapplicable to Liverpool.

MR. BAZLEY said, exceptions were always causes of dissatisfaction, and he therefore hoped the Committee would not sanction a different law for London and Manchester.

MR. AYRTON observed, that the Bill had been before the House for a considerable period, but no notice had been given of the Motion of the hon. Member, and many of the metropolitan Members, in fact, were not present. Special clauses would be necessary to render the Act applicable to the metropolis, the circumstances of which differed entirely from the rest of the country.

MR. HUNT said, he would remind hon. Members for the metropolis that the Wine Licences Bill originally introduced did not apply to Ireland, and the Irish Members assisted in passing it. But later in the same Session a Bill, extending the provisions of the former measure to Ireland, was brought in by the Government, when, of course, the English Members, like foxes who had lost their tails, were naturally anxious that others should be placed in the same condition. He assured the right hon. Gentleman that if the measure passed into law with the assistance of the metropolitan Members, his cordial support would be given to a supplementary measure for applying its provisions to the metropolis.

MR. C. TURNER said, the Bill in its original form was intended to apply to every part of England. The metropolitan Members then opposed the Bill, and in common with others went upon deputations to the Government ; but now that London had been exempted they threw their colleagues overboard and gave their support to the Government. Their Friends whom they had deserted felt that they were not well treated.

MR. BRIGHT said, he wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if there was any reason for excluding the metropolis, which contained between three and four millions of people, that did not apply to Birmingham, which contained between two and three hundred thousand. The constituency which he represented had sent a memorial which expressed very strong feelings on this question, and they thought if the metropolis were excluded they also ought to be excluded. It appeared to him that if the metropolis were excluded, there could be no reason why such towns as Birmingham and Manchester should not be excluded also.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he had had no communication with any metropolitan Member on the subject of the Bill, except that his noble Friend the Member for Middlesex (Lord Enfield) wrote to him to receive a deputation..

Question put, "That the Proviso stand part of the Clause."

MR. KNIGHT said, he would then move to add to the end of the clause the words "or to any city or town containing more than 20,000 inhabitants according to the last census."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would suggest to the hon. Member that it would be better for him to move that the Chairman leave the Chair. The adoption of the addition which the hon. Member proposed would be the destruction of the Bill.

Amendment negatived.

Clauses 3 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 12 (Persons refusing to pay the Taxes after demand made to be returned in Schedules of Defaulters).

MR. BARROW said, that a personal demand ought in all cases to be made on the taxpayer at his own house before he was distrained upon. Rich men could easily send a check, but men in humbler life did not keep an account with a banker.

MR. HUNT said, he should move the omission from the clause of the words "or sent." He thought that the notice for neglect of which a man was liable to be posted as a defaulter ought to be delivered personally. Many persons were careless about letters, and the House ought to take some security that the notice actually reached the defaulter. The letter, for example, might be registered, and the postman instructed to make an endorsement of delivery.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the suggestion of the hon. Member was deserving of consideration. The first step in an Exchequer process was not execution, but notice to pay, and a defaulter would have a notice personally served upon him before he would be distrained upon. It was proposed to take power to receive taxes in postage-stamps up to a certain amount, and subject to certain regulations. He saw no reason why the amount should be limited to 5s. As objection had been taken to the hardship of making the taxpayer travel many miles, he would state that the greatest distance any man would have to travel to pay his taxes would be four miles.

MR. BARROW, as a Commissioner of Taxes, thought the right hon. Gentleman was mistaken. In his district the taxpayers would sometimes have to travel six miles.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was calculated that, with very few exceptions, there was a Money Order Office within four miles of everybody. If the market town where the money was payable was six miles distant, the taxpayer could go to the nearest Money Order Office and send the money thence.

MR. HUNT said, he would admit that the arrangements for using money orders and accepting postage stamps had very much obviated his objection to the Bill. He took it that the notice referred to by the right hon. Gentleman would be a proceeding under the Court, but he could not help thinking, however, that some personal notice should be served upon a taxpayer before he was returned as a defaulter to the Court of Exchequer. In the absence of a more satisfactory explanation he must press his Amendment.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not accede to the principle of the Amendment. To require a public officer to travel several miles to give a personal notice instead of a written one would be most unreasonable. Such a provision would be a premium on carelessness. It was neither the law nor the practice at present. It had happened to him, possibly from the distraction of other occupations, to neglect paying his taxes at the proper time. He had, thereupon, received the usual notice, that if the tax were not paid he would be returned as a defaulter.

MR. HUNT said, he did not wish to protect persons whose object it was to avoid paying their taxes, but the present practice was to leave the notice open, while under the Bill the notice would be sent by post in a sealed envelope. He would put the case of sealed applications for taxes coming through the post to a man's house while he was abroad. No one might have authority to open those letters, and the result might be that on coming home a person might find that process had been issued against him.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought it would be unreasonable to make the Revenue department responsible for the taxpayer going abroad. He would give the subject his attention before the Report.

MR. F. S. POWELL suggested that the subject of the letters should be marked outside, or that they should be sent open.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that proposal was very reasonable, and one of the two suggestions of the hon. Member should be adopted.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN asked whether these taxes would be payable at any Money Order Office.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, they might be paid through any Money Order Office without charge for the order, but the postage would have to be paid.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 13 to 17 agreed to.

In answer to MR. SCLATER-BOOTH

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had not felt himself justified in altering the system of poundage to collectors, further than was required by the nature of the Bill. With regard to the assessed taxes, there was no reason for maintaining the system of poundage which they had in the income tax. It was much fairer to pay the assessors by the amount of work done.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 19 and 20 agreed to.

Clause 21 (Treasury may award Compensation to Collectors whose Services are discontinued by the operation of this Act).

MR. F. S. POWELL suggested that it should be made obligatory on the Treasury to award compensation in such cases.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER assured the hon. Gentleman that the Bill would be worked in an equitable spirit, and said that, practically, it would be obligatory on the Treasury to give compensation in every case in which there had been no gross dereliction of duty. The collectors as a class, so far as he could ascertain, were satisfied with the provision.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read 3<sup>d</sup> on Monday next.

BILL.—[Bill 84.]

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [30th May]. "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, it might appear presumptuous in a layman to ask the postponement of a measure dealing with so technical a subject; but if the House would grant him a few minutes attention, he thought he could show that the question was not one which required a legal mind, but one which came clearly within the comprehension of every one. The Bill was introduced at a comparatively late period of the Session, and it was not till about ten days since that the Lord Advocate made an extended statement of its scope and objects; he thought, therefore, it would be right that they should have longer time for its consideration. He now asked the House whether, by the light of the Lord Advocate's statement, there was any ground for introducing such sudden and sweeping changes? According to the learned Lord Advocate, one of the great advantages that would accrue from the abolition of the double registers would be the abolition of a double search, and that different kinds of economy would be accomplished by certain changes in the different classes of deeds in the record. The learned Lord Advocate remarked particularly on the improvements that would be effected by one general register, and the saving of expense in searching; and declared that in proposing the measure he was not consulting the interests of any exclusive body of petitioners, but that, in fact, the proposal emanated from a large and important body in Glasgow, and that Edinburgh was interested in only a secondary degree. He wound up his clear and candid statement by saying that his object was, that dealers in land, whether buyers or sellers, should have a good and clear title at the least possible expense. If the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman accomplished that object, it would be hailed with gratitude by the whole country. There was no object so desirable as the cheap and ready transfer of land. But if some of the things proposed in this Bill were beneficial, it was utterly unnecessary to accompany these proposals by a wide and sweeping change, not called for by any complaint, and which, he believed, would in many respects entail greater inconvenience and expense than had hitherto been experienced. The first merit which the learned Lord Advocate claimed for his measure was the abolition of the double search; but the House ought to know that the necessity of a double search arose from the abuse of the general register, and that were the general register only employed for the purpose for which it was originally designed, there would be no necessity for the double search. Were deeds affecting property in one county recorded only in the particular register belonging to that county, there would be no double search, and it would only be in the case of composite deeds that a double search would be necessary. But it had become the practice to register ordinary deeds in the general register, and hence the necessity of a double search. No one doubted that entailed large expense and inconvenience, and that any Bill which did away with that necessity would be acceptable; and it must be distinctly understood that those who opposed the Bill did not object to the abolition of the double search. But in order to do away with the double search, why was it necessary that the local registers should be removed from the places where they had been kept for two centuries? There was no allegation or complaint as to the manner in which these records had been kept. As to the economy of the scheme, the hon. and learned Lord Advocate pointed out that there were twenty different registries in different parts of Scotland, and that it would be much cheaper to have one staff, by whom the work could be efficiently done. But, in the first place, it was well known that the keepers of the particular registers did not give the whole of their business to the keeping of records—that they usually held other offices, and that but a small portion of their time was required to perform the duties of that office. One man could not perform the duties of the whole of those twenty keepers of records, and, therefore, if one great office were established in Edinburgh, the change must therefore involve a great increase of staff. It was impossible that one keeper of registries could be conversant with the separate details of the register which the Bill proposed should be kept in Edinburgh. Local knowledge was of the greatest importance for this business; and it was impossible that the officials of the Register House could be possessed with the same knowledge as the particular registrars. The commissioners themselves who recommended the change pointed out that it could only be made very gradually on account of the enormous staff that would be required. Present fees must be reduced; but the Lord Advocate evidently anticipated an increase in the expense for a time, because it was proposed that the fees should remain at their present scale for two years. Then if the pay of the registrars and other officers was not found sufficient, they were to be paid by salary; that was, the Bill rendered it competent for the Government—that was, in fact, the Lord Advocate—to raise the salaries of the officers to any amount they could persuade Parliament was proper. He must say he could not see the economy of that arrangement. Then he was told that in numerous petitions which had been sent to that House that considerable delay and inconvenience might arise in the transmission of deeds to Edinburgh. He was also told that deeds were not registered so rapidly in Edinburgh as at the burghal and county registers, and therefore it was not surprising that the county agents should entertain some doubts as to the expedition with which their deeds will be registered in Edinburgh. It was not intended to remove the local registers from burghs on account of the necessity of local knowledge; but surely local knowledge was as necessary in the case of the county as of the burgh registers. Undoubtedly it would be an improvement to have only two books of registers, instead of six, as now existed. But why was the principle not carried further, and one book be kept for the register of the possession and of the incumbrances affecting the property? That would be a reform of a very simple kind? He believed also that there would be a great inconvenience and delay arising from the transmission of deeds to Edinburgh, for at the general registry deeds were kept longer than at the local registries; and that delay would be a matter of considerable importance. He was informed that it was no uncommon occurrence for persons to register their deeds where they could have them returned the quickest; in addition to which many of the agents desired to witness the process personally, so that it was hardly necessary to point out that in many cases great delay would ensue if the deeds must be registered at Edinburgh. The abridgment of the indices proposed by the Bill formed a most excellent feature in the measure, but it was necessary that the abridgment should be as simple and accessible as possible, and he did not see what was to prevent their meeting that requirement in the particular registers, as at Edinburgh. The Bill did not touch the registers in burghs, and it was urged as a reason that there was a necessity for local knowledge; but that local knowledge was surely as important in the counties as it was in the burroughs, and he believed, therefore, that the real reason was that the burroughs were too strong to make such an attempt upon them. It was no doubt intended by the Bill to make an improvement by having only two books of registry instead of six as at present; but why did the Bill not go further, and provide for one book only, so that the registry of seisin might be accompanied with a statement of the charges with which the estate was burdened? One important fact to which he desired to call the attention of the House was, that the change was not asked for by the country. No petitions had been presented upon the subject before the introduction of the measure, and only three since, and the petitioners included members of every class who would be affected by the Bill. All had complained of the great inconvenience which would result from the passing of the measure. The best test of the feeling of the country upon the subject was to ascertain the method generally followed in the registration of deeds. Hitherto the people had had the option of registering their deeds either in their counties or in Edinburgh. It appeared, upon examination, that out of 14,405 deeds registered annually, only 3,244 had been registered at Edinburgh. That number did not include the 2,000 deeds which referred to property in the metropolitan counties, but it did include those registered by Edinburgh agents though referring to distant properties. Those figures proved that the proposed change would not suit the custom or inclination of those interested in the matter. He did not come before the House as the champion of vested interests. He represented what they would all acknowledge to be important local interests as opposed to centralization. As regarded Scotland, for some years past all legislation had tended to concentrate business in the direction of Edinburgh. That he believed to be unnecessary and undesirable, and it behoved them to set their faces against such a course, and to insist that local business should be transacted locally. It had been said that an inconvenience occurred in reference to composite deeds, in consequence of the necessity of a double search. Seeing that those deeds only numbered 250 out of the 14,405 registered annually, he did not believe that any special legislation on their account was necessary. No more trouble was caused, however, than would still be the case under the new measure, in deeds relating to property, part of which was in a borough, and another part in the county. He asked English hon. Members what would be the general feeling if it were attempted to remove all the conveyancing business of the country to London. Such a course would, no doubt, be a very good thing for London lawyers, but the inconvenience which the country would experience in consequence would be very great. His opinion was that the reason why boroughs were not affected by the Bill was that the boroughs were too powerful to be interfered with at present; but if the county business were allowed to be taken to Edinburgh, that of the boroughs would soon follow. He maintained that the Bill had been introduced at a period of the Session which was not favourable to its due consideration. The Commissioners themselves recommended that no measure affecting the subject should be hastily introduced. They did not suggest that the present system should be entirely changed in one year, on account of the confusion which would ensue, but recommended that any alteration should be introduced gradually, and that, in the first instance only, some of the smaller registries should be transferred to Edinburgh, whilst by the Bill now before the House, it was proposed in one year to abolish all the registries of seigns. He thought that he had shown reasonable grounds for the Amendment to the Motion, which he now ventured to submit, that this Bill be read a second time that day three months.

MR. BAXTER seconded the Amendment, and said that the hon. Baronet (Sir James Fergusson) had pointed out so clearly and distinctly the reason why the Bill ought to be rejected, that he did not think it was necessary to trouble the House with a re-statement of the case. But he must say that the manner in which this Bill had been pressed forward supplied a most singular commentary upon the speech of his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate, the other night, with regard to the admirable way in which Scotch business was conducted in the House. English Members were continually told that the representatives of Scotland were in the habit of meeting privately to consider measures affecting that part of the United Kingdom, and that by this course they were enabled to prevent the occurrence of debates in the House, except upon questions that involved important political considerations, upon which such harmony could not be maintained. He had often thought, and it was as well that English Members should know it, and that the people of Scotland should know it, that there was a considerable amount of misapprehension abroad on this subject, and that here to-night they had a remarkable example of it. What he wished to state was this—for he felt rather aggrieved at the treatment which the representatives and people of Scotland had met with on the subject—that the representatives of Scotland had been assembled by the Lord Advocate to consider this very Bill, and would the House believe it when he said, that not a single Member present could be found to support the measure except his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Black), who, of course, was bound to do so, because this was, in fact, one of those centralizing measures which were every now and then introduced for the benefit of the lawyers of Edinburgh. He had heard it frequently said that Scotland was governed and overridden by lawyers, and he could not help suspecting that the Lord Advocate was sometimes driven to bring forward measures against his own conviction by the pressure which was brought to bear upon him from that quarter. He was strengthened in that conviction by the fact that, although the Members who met the other day in New Street, Spring Gardens, were opposed to the Bill, the Lord Advocate nevertheless felt obliged to go on with it in consequence of the pressure put on him by place-hunting lawyers. What was this Bill about which there was such desperate hurry, and which was in reality being forced through the House. His hon. and gallant Friend (Sir James Fergusson) had stated the main objections to the details of the measure. For 250 years Scotland had had a system of registration of deeds, which upon the whole had worked remarkably well, and was exceedingly popular and highly prized by the people. He agreed with the hon. and gallant Baronet that the system was not perfect, and that it was susceptible of many improvements. The supporters and the opponents of the Bill were equally agreed in objecting to the double system of registration, and desired to simplify and improve it; but the opponents of the measure desired to do it in a different way from that which was proposed by the Lord Advocate, for they wished to get rid of the general register in Edinburgh, in which only 3,000 deeds were recorded, and improve the local registers, which were so popular that upwards of 14,000 writs were recorded in them. His hon. and gallant Friend (Sir James Fergusson) had omitted to state this further fact—that not only had these local registers been more popular in past times, but they were becoming more so every day; for if they looked back ten or twelve years they would find that whilst the increase in the local registers was 70 per cent, the increase of the general register was only 30 per cent; thus clearly proving that, at the present moment, the local registers were the favourite registers of the country. He came now to the question of expense. His right hon. and learned Friend, the Lord Advocate, recommended the Bill to the House upon the ground of economy; but if this were a measure of economy, he must say that it was the first example of a measure of the sort having emanated from the Edinburgh lawyers. He took the 23rd Clause of the Bill, and he should be glad if some English Member who took an interest in the Civil Service Estimates and matters of finance, would pay attention to that clause. Clause 23 provided—

“ It shall be lawful for the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty’s Treasury, upon the application of the Lord Clerk Register, to regulate from time to time the offices of the general register of sasines, and of the general register of hornings, inhibitions, and adjudications under this Act, and to sanction such increased establishment of deputies, assistants, clerks, or other officers, as may be necessary for the purposes hereof, and to fix the salaries and remuneration to be allowed to the officers of the said departments respectively; and such salaries and remuneration shall be payable out of the fees to be drawn in said departments respectively, or”—let the House observe—“ out of any other funds to be provided by Parliament for that purpose.”

Mr. Baxter

Now, he entertained a shrewd suspicion, and he believed it would come out in the end, that if this Bill were passed into law, they would be called on to provide for a good many of these officers, and that the expense of the proposed system would be considerably greater than that of the present. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman were really anxious to introduce economical reforms in Scotland, let him begin elsewhere. Let him begin by reducing the number of Judges in the Court of Session. Let him abolish the system of double sheriffships; both of which were subjects that, if discussed in this House, would be found not to stand investigation for a single hour, and upon which it was his intention at some future and not distant time to take the opinion of the House. The fact was that the Lord Advocate dared not introduce measures in favour of the principles of financial economy of that kind, because they would be unpopular among his professional brethren in Edinburgh, and might place him in an uncomfortable and unpleasant position. Looking at the clause he had read to the House, and the additional work that must of necessity be thrown upon the General Register Office in Edinburgh, he believed that so far from being a measure to promote economy, it would in the end lead to a greatly increased expenditure. His hon. and gallant Friend (Sir James Fergusson) had observed that by abolishing the general register the search would be more economically and quite as easily conducted in the local registers, and there was no doubt that it was the desire of the people in the localities that this should be so. A number of gentlemen who took an interest in this matter had proposed a scheme of their own to the Lord Advocate, and he thought it was only reasonable and fair that the House should have both schemes before them, and that they should not be called upon to sanction this Bill until they had had the opportunity of considering the provisions of each. But the Lord Advocate would not consent to wait, although many Scotch Members interested in other important measures—the Rivers Pollution Bill, for instance—were compelled to wait. He could not help suspecting then that there were some places to be created under the present measure, and that this was the real reason for hurrying it forward. Where was the necessity for pushing on the Bill at this time of the Session? Already they had waited ten years for the measure, and it had never before been discussed in the House. The right hon. and learned Gentleman might have brought in a Bill years ago, but he did not; and they were now called upon in the month of June—a few weeks before the Session came to a close—to decide hastily upon the subject. He trusted the right hon. and learned Gentleman would not press the Bill further this Session. The representatives of Scotland were generally very docile; but surely that was the very reason why they might ask that a proposal which was objected to by a large majority of them, and which had excited a strong feeling of opposition in Scotland should not be persisted with until the House and the country had had time and opportunity to consider the other scheme.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day three months.”—(Sir James Ferguson.)

COLONEL SYKES said, he had presented a Petition to the House from the Society of Advocates in Aberdeen, a body of gentlemen who, from their experience and position, were quite as competent to form a judgment upon the subject as any body of lawyers in Edinburgh, and they were decidedly opposed to the Bill. The people of Scotland desired to have facilities for registration locally, and without going to Edinburgh. If there were no other objection to the Bill, there was this most conclusive one, that it proposed to take from local bodies the management of their own affairs, and establish a system of centralization in its stead.

MR. AYTOUN said, he did not wish to offer any opinion with regard to the merits of the Bill, but simply to urge that he did not think the House was in a position to legislate upon the subject, and that, if it attempted to do so, it might be legislating in the dark. All he knew was that it was very desirable to cheapen and facilitate the transfer of land—so far he agreed with the Lord Advocate; but that his right hon. and learned Friend's plan would have that effect he had heard nothing to induce him to believe. He should like to know why this measure was not brought forward at a period of the Session when it might have been discussed at the county meetings in Scotland, so that Members like himself, who were not well informed on the subject, might have had the opportunity of hearing the opinions of their constituents upon it. If a measure of this kind could not have been brought forward a little earlier, it might be postponed till next Session, when they would have the means of ascertaining all those facts, without which it would be idle to attempt to arrive at a judgment on the subject. They were told it was expedient that the county registers should be abolished, and that there should be one register in burghs. If there existed such an anxiety to cheapen the transfer of land, that might be effected by lowering the fees on registry, one half of which, he understood, went to the Exchequer. He was informed that the fees paid to the registrar were in some cases greater than all the other expenses; and he thought that legislation to cheapen the transfer of land ought to begin there. He had heard it said that the opposition to the present Bill was an agitation got up by the county registrars and the lawyers in the country districts. He was sorry that such an imputation should be made, as it gave rise to the counter imputation that the present Bill was got up by the lawyers of Edinburgh. He, however, did not wish to attribute any unworthy motives to any person. All he said was, that he did not possess any knowledge of the subject, and thought it would be better to postpone the farther consideration of the Bill until next Session.

MR. MURE said, he should certainly feel it his duty to support the second reading of the Bill. It was said that the House was not in a condition to enter on so difficult and important a measure; but when would it be in a condition to enter on it? It was not a new subject. So far from the scheme having originated with the Edinburgh lawyers, it originated with the professional gentlemen of Glasgow. So far back as the year 1850, there was a report deliberately prepared by the procurators of Glasgow recommending the very change which was now proposed. That report was printed and circulated in Scotland among the different legal bodies there, and the proposal was deliberately considered by the procurators of Edinburgh; and in 1858, this same proposal having been considered by the practitioners of the Supreme Court of Scotland, met with their approval. Since then, in order to test the soundness of the views taken by these various legal bodies, commissioners were appointed by his right hon. Friend to consider the question. These commissioners were not English lawyers, but one of them was a most distinguished advocate of Glasgow—Mr. Bannatyne—and conjoined with him was a gentleman of equal eminence in Edinburgh. These gentlemen, after an anxious investigation all over Scotland, and conferring with the local commissioners in the different towns, agreed upon the plan embodied in this Bill; and as far as he knew, the Bill had not met with opposition from any large body in Scotland. That was a sufficient answer to the observation that they were not in a condition to deal with the question, because that report had been printed for about a year, and had been accessible to every Member of the House. Another objection as to matter of time was, that it was rather late in the Session. He did not think there was much weight in that objection. If no measure of that kind were to be proceeded with unless it were introduced a certain time before the 30th of April, it would be almost stopping legislation altogether. But if the county meetings had not had the Bill before them there was this to be said in its favour, that only three petitions had been presented against it. There was nothing to prevent their calling special meetings to consider it. There had been special meetings in reference to the Valuation and other Bills, but not a word had been said against this. The Bill was substantially a good one, and ought to have a favourable reception from the House. Its main object was to get rid of the system of double search. The fact of there being both a general and a local register involved the necessity of searching both. That caused considerable expense—he believed about £15—and that expense was not regulated by the value of the property, but the expense was the same whether the consideration for the transfer was £150 or £100,000. So serious and so heavy was this expense that the commissioners in their report stated that, in many districts where the property transferred was small, the parties, in order to save expense, ran the risk of taking the transfer without a search, and trusted to the honour of the agent employed that there was no incumbrance on his property. Therefore he said that so far as the saving of the double search went, this Bill was an improvement which would not be questioned, and which should be effected as soon as possible. The two gentlemen who were appointed to consider this question made a very elaborate report. They said that if the plan they recommended were carried out, there would be a saving in the ordinary administration of the registrar's department of about £7,000 a year to the public. Well, that being the state of the case, what objection was there to going into Committee on this Bill? The time at which the local registers would be extinguished could be settled in Committee. Well, then, the objections raised were in the first place that this was part of what was called the system of centralization. Now it was a sufficient answer to that to say, that this scheme originated at Glasgow, and was recommended by Mr. Bannatyne, who was a Glasgow procurator. But further than that, the commissioners had no hesitation in recommending this centralization as the only way in which they could improve the present system of registration. It was said that this centralization was part of a system, which had been introduced a great deal too much of late into Scotch legislation. He was not aware that there had been that great tendency to centralization. Looking at the present facilities of postal communication and of travelling by railway, he did not think there was a Member of that House who would say that there would be inconvenience in having one general registry. In 1617, when the means of communication was quite different, it was necessary to have district registries, and his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Ayrshire quite misapprehended the matter when he said the general register had crept in by some improper practice. The words of the Act of Parliament were clear, that there should be a general and a local register. He found from the Report that, in regard to registration of deeds in Ireland, the central control was in Dublin; and in 1827, when it was proposed to have a registration of deeds in England, it was recommended that London should be the place. It was said that a risk of delay would probably occur in the transfer of the deeds from the particular county to the city of Edinburgh for registration. Now he thought that that objection was already met by the actual facts. It was stated distinctly by the officials connected with those matters, that there had never yet been known an instance of deeds having been lost; and they went further in saying that at all events, as far as the county of Ayr and other counties were concerned, four-fifths of the deeds sent for registration were transmitted, not by a special messenger, but by the ordinary post. With these facts before them, he did not think that this Bill was fairly open to the charge of risking the safety of those deeds. Well, another objection was, that the measure would interfere with the local practitioners and authorities. The report, however, of Mr. Bannatyne, from Glasgow, and another gentleman from Edinburgh, distinctly showed that the Bill would not interfere in any way with the emoluments of the local agents or authorities. It appeared to him that there was nothing in the Bill which could interfere so as to place the local commissioners in an invidious position. The local practitioners at present sent up their deeds for registration without the interposition of agents on the spot. Why could they not do the same thing in respect to the registration of deeds that would take place in Edinburgh only? If any other scheme was suggested by persons competent to deal with this question—a scheme that would present as effective and economical a system of registration—he, for one, would be most willing to give it the most attentive consideration. It appeared by the Report of the two gentlemen to whom he had already referred, that two plans had been suggested and brought under their consideration with a view of improving the existing system, while preserving the principle of local registration. Having, however, heard all the details of these two plans, Mr. Bannatyne and his learned colleagues deliberately decided against them. One of those plans was that the register should be made up in the county town, and thence sent to the general office in Edinburgh for preservation. Now, the moment they sent up the deeds to Edinburgh for preservation, they would involve themselves in the difficulty of a double search. He had taken the opportunity of inquiring of those gentlemen alluded to as to the feasibility of this plan, and the answer they always gave was that the thing could not be done. He heard it said that the registration should not only be made perfect in itself, but that it should be made for public preservation. Now, that would leave the matter of the double search just where it was, and for this reason—the registration was for the last forty-one years. The books were sent up to the Register Office, and the search must go back for a period of forty years. Leaving the registration of the last forty years in Edinburgh, and beginning the new registration in the county, there must necessarily be a double search for the next thirty-nine years. It was for the House to say, whether a subject which had received such patient consideration by the two learned gentlemen so often alluded to, who had reported favourably of the present measure, whether it was one that ought to be postponed until the next year. It appeared to him that the Bill was really open to no objections which might not be better discussed and arranged in Committee. They were all agreed that there was a grievance to be got rid of. They must be equally convinced that the plan under consideration had been deliberately adopted by the various bodies interested in the question, and that it had been specially recommended by a Commission. For those reasons he did not see upon what reasonable grounds they could delay the Bill for three months, or, in reality, to another Session of Parliament.

Mr. DUNLOP most cordially thanked the Lord Advocate for having at last introduced a measure of this kind. At the same time, considering that the Government had taken ten years to consider the matter and prepare a definite scheme in the shape of the Bill before the House, he did not think they should grudge very much about granting the country as many months to consider it, as they had taken years. The matter had certainly been talked of in a general way for ten years, but in a vague, general, and uncertain way; and until it assumed the definite form of a Bill, people really did not give their attention to it. They had now a Bill proposed by the Government, and he was sure that in discussing it his right hon. and learned Friend would acquit him of any undue jealousy either of centralization or against Edinburgh lawyers, or of any want of sympathy with him in his desire—for which he gave him the fullest credit—to put the system of registration for Scotland on a footing more efficient than that which had been the admiration of the world at large. They were all agreed as to the necessity of getting rid of the double search. This might be accomplished in two ways—either by abolishing the general register, or by transferring the local registers to Edinburgh. The Lord Advocate proposed to transfer the local registers to Edinburgh. But the great preference in Scotland was in favour of the local registers. There was the option now, either to go to Edinburgh or to the local registers; and it was found that only one-tenth of the whole went to Edinburgh, the large majority preferring the local registers. He did not mean to say that that preference alone ought to regulate the matter; but the strong conviction of the great mass of the people in Scotland being so largely in favour of the local registers, the House should consider carefully before they abolish a system which was viewed with so much favour. There was another point of great consequence. It was quite clear that if any change was made now, it ought to be a complete change, so that no further alteration would be required. When they were remodelling and re-organizing a system which had lasted for 200 years, they ought to remodel it in such a way that they should not be obliged to hammer and cooper upon it afterwards. The inevitable result of the change now proposed would be to make further legislation necessary. The Bill was framed on the principle that all burgh registers were to be preserved as local registers, and all county registers were to be taken to Edinburgh. One would fancy at first sight that this was founded on the greater convenience that parties dwelling in towns should have, in having their registration where their agents were, and where they would have every facility for recording their deeds. The deeds, it might be said, might as well be sent to Edinburgh by post as to a county town, while in the towns the inconvenience of sending them to Edinburgh was quite unnecessary. But the Bill did not carry out this principle. The burgh registers did not include the whole urban district. In the burgh of Glasgow, for instance, the extent of the town beyond the burgh was even larger than the extent of town within the burgh; and in that case, in the burghal part on the one side of the street, a person registering would not have the convenience of a local register; whereas a person on the other side of the street, being in the regality district, would be in a more favourable position. Clearly the distinction between the urban territory within the burgh and beyond the burgh could not be ultimately maintained — they must either bring back the urban territory beyond the burgh and give it a register with the burghal territory, or take it all to Edinburgh at once. This, and other questions of difficulty, he did not think had been considered at all by the Commissioners; and the Bill would undoubtedly establish a system which would leave some great questions to be settled at a future time. As to the merits of the two modes of registration, he did not disguise that he had no decided preference for the one over the other. Under the circumstances he had stated, he urged his right hon. and learned Friend most earnestly not to press this measure against the almost unanimous views of the Scotch Members, and the strong feeling of a very large class of the community in Scotland, without apparently any great object to be attained.

MR. CARNEGIE said, it was very significant that the only voice that had yet been raised in favour of the Bill was that of the hon. and learned Member for Bute (Mr. Mure), a practising lawyer and ex-Lord Advocate. This was an instance of the self-conceit of the Edinburgh gentlemen who took upon themselves to speak in the name of all Scotland. The only check upon them was the existence of another city called Glasgow, which had a still larger population; and when it was found that some gentlemen in Glasgow were of opinion that these registers might be removed, the opportunity was eagerly seized, and a Commission was appointed, consisting of one Edinburgh and one Glasgow man, the rest of Scotland being entirely ignored. The Glasgow man was a gentleman who had distinctly enunciated his opinion upon the subject, and, therefore, while wishing to speak with all respect of the commissioners, and to give their report all the weight it was worth, he considered it simply valuable as recording the reasons on which two decidedly clever men supported their pet scheme. The sort of sneer with which the hon. Member for Bute spoke of the county meetings was quite of a piece with the general manner in which the proceedings in regard to this Bill had been conducted. He thought those meetings the most valuable checks upon the general principle of what might be called Edinburgh legislation; and perhaps it was convenient to bring in Bills of this kind at a time when the county meetings were not sitting. They had heard a good deal about the expense of the double search; but he believed that the expense arose solely from the extent of arrears in the indices at Edinburgh, and that they had been kept in arrears for the purpose of bringing discredit upon the present system.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE joined in the appeal to the Lord Advocate not to press his motion to a division in no hostile spirit, but because he thought the country required further time for the consideration of the measure. The Lord Advocate acceded to a suggestion of that nature at the meeting of Scotch Members, and he was surprised to find him in little more than a week afterwards moving the second reading of the Bill. Great credit was due to the Government for grappling with the subject, for there were no doubt abuses in the present system of registration; but the subject was one that required the calm consideration of the country. After the strong testimony in favour of the local system, there ought to be some stronger argument than had hitherto been brought forward to overthrow it. The subject had never been properly considered. They had a most able Report of the Commissioners, but they had not the arguments on which it was founded, and no discussion had taken place throughout the country to enable them fully to see the bearings of the question. The question certainly was one that required consideration, and no injury would result from allowing it to stand over to another Session.

MR. CRAUFURD said, it was remarkable only one voice had been raised in favour of the Bill, and that came from Edinburgh. He did not attribute motives to the lawyers of Edinburgh or any one else, but assumed that the opinions expressed on both sides were conscientious views as to what was most conducive to the welfare of the country. But the whole of the country was against the opinions expressed from Edinburgh, and he thought that fact was sufficient to call for a postponement of the Lord Advocate's plan. They wanted to get rid of a double search, and the Bill did not affect that object, it simply removed one set of registers from the county town in Edinburgh. It was said that the Bill would save £7,000 a year, but the real question was which was the best thing to do—to maintain two searches, removing twenty county registers to Edinburgh, or to do away with the borough register and leave the county registers as they were. He could see no advantage in removing the registers from the counties to Edinburgh. Well, it was said in Ireland it was done so, and that might be a good argument if they were establishing the registry for the first time in Scotland, but as it already existed and was working well, the feelings of the people of Scotland should be considered, and they were not in favour of the centralisation.

If the Lord Advocate had confidence in the principle of his measure, surely the more it was ventilated the more it would gain the support of the country. But, said the hon. and learned Gentleman, the more the Bill is delayed the more opposition it is likely to meet with. Surely there could not be a stronger argument against the Bill than this. The Lord Advocate told them that there was an excess of receipts of £5,000 over and above the requirements of the present system. This money went to the Consolidated Fund. Now, was it right or just that the people should be taxed for the sake of the Consolidated Fund? And then, with regard to another point, it was said that the second reading of this Bill might be carried, and it could be altered in Committee. He (Mr. Craufurd) objected to their doing anything of the kind. They objected to the Bill, and he contended that the second reading was the proper time to enter their protest against the Bill being proceeded with. In conclusion, he pressed upon the Lord Advocate the advisability of withdrawing the Bill, in deference to the wishes which had been so generally expressed by the Scotch Members.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that as all the arguments had been one way it would be unnecessary for him to detain the House at any length, but he trusted that his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate would not press this measure on at present. The petitions against it were signed by ablest men in Scotland, and the Council of the Society of Solicitors, the Lord Advocate's own friends, had in a report presented to a meeting held on the 6th inst. referred to the limited time which had been allowed for the consideration of the measure. Public feeling in Scotland at the present time was decidedly opposed to the plan proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, though not to the object which he had in view—namely, the simplification of the registration system. He implored his right hon. and learned Friend to give more time for the consideration of the measure.

MR. B. P. BOUVERIE regretted that the opposition to this Bill should have taken the form of imputations upon the motives of the hon. and learned Lord Advocate, whose only object could be to benefit the public. He did not think that it was at all conducive to the dignity of Scotch discussions in the House to have imputations cast upon hon. Gentlemen who might introduce measures for the public good.

Every one knew the zeal of the Lord Advocate for the public weal and for the benefit of Scotland, and there was, therefore, no ground for imputing to him any desire to favour Edinburgh lawyers or to advance Edinburgh interests. A great deal had been said about centralization; but, to have a permanent system of local registration they must make it central, and therefore all the arguments on the subject fell to the ground. In his opinion this question was one which essentially affected the landed proprietors of Scotland, as the cost fell upon them; and it was agreed to on all hands that the existing system was not satisfactory, for it was neither as simple nor as cheap as it could be made. The experience they had went to show that the existing system was thoroughly unsatisfactory; and therefore when the Report of the commissioners was in the hands of his hon. Friend the Lord Advocate—coming, as it did, from gentlemen capable of forming an opinion upon such an intricate question—it became his duty to prepare a measure for the consideration of Parliament. It was a misfortune that he was encumbered with so much hostility to his proposal; and he doubted very much whether that hostility would be lessened by the delay which was now sought at his hands. But still he thought the debate must have shown him that he had comparatively little choice in the matter, and therefore he (Mr. Bouverie) must concur with his colleagues from Scotland in inquiring whether it would not be wise to postpone the carrying out of this scheme, so that, by further consideration, he might be able to add another claim to the debt of gratitude due to him from his countrymen, by carrying into effect a cheap and efficient system of registering titles in Scotland.

MR. BLACK: Sir, I cannot pretend to be acquainted with the legal circumstances connected with this question. I can only say that if I were in the position of a seller or purchaser of property, I should like very well to have the opportunity of ascertaining readily and correctly whether there are or are not any burdens on the property; and it seems to me that it would be better for that purpose that there should be one general register in one particular place, which would give me the information I require, than that I should have to hunt for it in several different registers in different parts of the country. The proper place to go to for such a register is, I venture to think, the central office in Edinburgh. I am not speaking now as Member for Edinburgh. I do not care a farthing where the register is kept, whether it be in Edinburgh or in Glasgow or anywhere else, provided it be in one particular and accessible place, and that I should be relieved from the necessity of running from one place to another in order to obtain the information concerning the property. I am quite aware that considerable objection is entertained to this measure; but it is only natural that it should be so. I should like to know when there was ever a reform proposed in this House to which there was not some sort of opposition from persons who thought that their interests would be injuriously affected by it? In the present instance it is perfectly clear that the procurators and other members of the legal profession connected with the different counties imagine—and it is really a very small matter that they are afraid of—that their pecuniary interests will be somewhat affected by having the whole of the registers collected in one particular place. It is said that there are a great many petitioners against the Bill, and that they come from twenty-four different quarters. I took the trouble to look into the matter, and found that out of the twenty-four eighteen were from procurators. These persons imagine that they will lose a few pounds a year by the new system, and therefore are very strongly in favour of preserving the present system, which is not at all for the interest of those who buy and sell land or houses. That has happened to this Bill which happens to every reform, we have individual interests opposed to those of the community at large. Now we must recollect who these procurators are. They are law agents and very important men in the burghs. Members who intend to offer themselves for re-election at the next election no doubt have a notion that if they do not find grace in the eyes of the law agents in the different burghs, it will be a very dangerous thing for them. Therefore, I do not at all wonder that a number of our Scotch representatives should feel a little chary about showing themselves in favour of a Bill which they know is far from meeting the approval of a class of persons who exercise great weight in the return of Members to Parliament. The true question we have to consider is, what would be most for the benefit of those who have dealings in lands or heritages in Scotland? I think there can be no question that there would be great advantage in having a single and uniform register instead of two or three separate ones. It might not altogether suit the procurators, perhaps, but it would be a great advantage to the parties to transactions in land. I find it stated in the petition of the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town Council of Glasgow, that for years past a system of centralization has been going on in Scotland, by which it is sought to concentrate in Edinburgh, at the expense of the rest of the land, all offices and places of importance—which system the petitioners say they hold to be opposed to the principle and spirit of the Constitution. Now, that is just one of the clap-trap cries which men get up when they want to frighten the public. No doubt there are objections to excessive centralization; but I see no ground for supposing that centralization is, under all circumstances, of necessity a bad thing. Give a dog a bad name, says the proverb, and you may hang him at once. And here an attempt is made to fasten a bad name on centralization; but if it is for the benefit of the people, why should they not have it? I hope nobody will be alarmed by all this talk about centralization into opposing the Bill. I need not go into the matter further. I am satisfied that all the arguments raised against the Bill could be refuted, and that its passing would be for the benefit of all who have dealings in property.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Sir, the expense of conveyancing has long been a subject of complaint in Scotland among all who are concerned in land; and those who have considered the means of diminishing that expense have, on the whole, come to the conclusion that it is mainly caused by the state of the registration of lands. We have in Scotland the benefit of a very valuable system of registration of titles, but we have to pay for that by a very heavy amount of costs at every step and stage of the transfer of land. There is no doubt about that among all those most qualified to judge of the question. Until the Report of the Commissioners appeared, I am sure that there was in almost every quarter but one opinion on the subject, which was, that the reform of the registers was to be the main channel through which we were to reach economy in the transfer of land; and that the reform of the registers consisted chiefly in bringing them all into one place, under one system and authority, and according to a uniform principle. We have often been invited to grapple with this question. It is a very material one, not merely with regard to the expense of searches, but with regard to other reforms which may be engrafted on it. I hope the House will understand that we have not proceeded at all hurriedly in this matter. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Greenock (Mr. Dunlop) says that we have been ten years at it. That is quite true. It is an ancient system, not to be rashly touched, and we deemed it only proper that the question should be allowed to ripen in the public mind. It has been ventilated from time to time for the last ten years. It is well known, I should think, to every one except the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), who seems to be supremely ignorant on this subject, that it was the lawyers, not of Edinburgh but of Glasgow, who first put the proposition of this Bill into a tangible shape. They brought it forward in 1856. The question was subsequently remitted to a Commission in 1860-1, and in 1864 we have proposed to carry into effect the recommendation of the Glasgow Procurators in 1856, and of the subsequent Commission. This is a most important reform for the landed interest. I am told that I have not given any estimate of its expense. Now, I am in a position to show, if it were necessary, that by this Bill a large economy would be at once effected. After the compensations run out, the surplus of the Register House would be about £16,000 a year, and that not only a reduction of fees, but a more economical system of working might be secured. I am not prepared to admit that the debate has altogether shown the real sense of the Scotch Members on the subject—I cannot think that—but we have not received the amount of support we were entitled to expect. Have the landed proprietors come forward to help us? How have my hon. Friends assisted us? Even the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Smollett) is not in his place. The hon. Gentleman challenged me to grapple with large questions, who taunted me with bringing in Bills for fish not men, and with the lateness of the hour at which Scotch business is brought on. But now, when we have a night to ourselves for the discussion of Scotch business, when a very important Bill is brought forward at an early hour—and that Bill relates to land not fish—the hon. Member allows me to be torn to pieces by his hon. Friends behind me and is not here to raise his voice to my assistance. It is true, as has been said, that we had a meeting of Scotch Members on this question. They were not friendly to the Bill; not because they had formed a decided opinion on the matter, but because strong representations had been made to them against it. I was quite aware that representations would be made against it. There was a whisper last year of such a Bill being introduced, and at once strong representations began to be made against it. For the last six years the appointments to the office of keeper of the registers in the counties have borne a clause that if it should happen that the registers were taken to Edinburgh the holders of such offices should not be entitled to compensation. There has, therefore, been distinct and ample warning to the country on the matter. I do not impute that this is a mere pecuniary question to the opponents of the Bill. There is a kind of esprit de corps in the counties, and they are unwilling to part with the prestige of the ancient registers. That is only natural. It is an element that necessarily arises. It is an element which has arisen in England in regard to the proposed system of registers; and it is an element with which we must deal if we want to carry out an efficient reform. I cannot say that I felt confident about carrying this Bill when I introduced it; but I was anxious in the first instance to bring the matter to a point and see what were the difficulties which weighed against my proposal. We have had a discussion to-night which has served that purpose. The hon. and gallant Member for Ayr (Sir James Fergusson) has studied the subject carefully, and expressed his views with clearness and ability. I listened to his speech, I must say, with great pleasure. The hon. and learned Member for Greenock (Mr. Dunlop) has also made some suggestions which derive value from his experience, and the long consideration he has given to the matter. I expected, however, more vigorous support from my hon. and learned Friend. As to my hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), I cannot congratulate him on the appearance he has made to-night. That an hon. Gentleman of his position in the House should come forward on a matter of this kind, proposed in accordance with the opinions of men who, in respect of learning, experience, and integrity, stand as high as any in Scotland, and should charge us with bringing in a Bill (which he ought to have known was first suggested by the procurators of Glasgow) for the purpose of benefiting the lawyers of Edinburgh—I say I much regret that he should have done so. I wish he only knew the feeling with which I heard his words. I am not in the least afraid that any man whose opinion I value will for a moment give credence to the hon. Member's assertions. I must say, however, I am somewhat surprised that any one of the Scotch Members, who generally express themselves with moderation and good feeling, should have given vent to such paltry criticism. This is not a measure for the lawyers of Edinburgh. It is a measure for the landed interest. If it be inferior to any other scheme for the accomplishment of the same object, let the hon. Member for Montrose or any other submit a better proposal, and defend it on philosophical and logical grounds instead of appealing to feelings of the least elevated kind that can be roused. I shall be very glad to give his proposition fair consideration. When charges of this sort are levelled against the Edinburgh lawyers, and when it is said that no practising advocate will bring in a Bill for an economical reform of the legal system, it ought to be known that thirty years ago offices to the extent of £60,000 a year were abolished in Scotland at the instance of Edinburgh lawyers. This, however, is all beside the question. It is admitted on all hands that a reform is required. It is admitted on all hands that the system of the old registers requires amendment, and that the amendment should be in the direction of abolishing the double registers. That being agreed, the second reading of this Bill seemed to me a matter of course. The only question that remains is whether you should do away with the local registers and collect them all at Edinburgh, or whether you should keep the registers in the counties and abolish the general office in Edinburgh. Our proposal is that, instead of a score of local registers, you should have a single central one. The expense to the landed proprietors of these local registers is immense. The fees in Glasgow amount to £5,000 a year; in Forfarshire to £1,100; in Aberdeen to £800; and the total comes to £12,000 a year. On the other hand, the chief registrar in Edinburgh would have only £1,000 a year salary, and there would generally be a great saving. Of course, if you increase the staff of the local offices, you must incur an increased expenditure. But, even if you keep up the local registers, you cannot abolish the General Register Office altogether. It will still be required for the old registers, and for those of the three Lothians—as well as for the registration of adjudications, hornings, &c. If you want a thorough effectual reform, I can only say it is utterly impossible to accomplish it with twenty different offices, without control, without a uniform principle, and distributed throughout the country. You must have a uniform system, and a complete arrangement for indexing. It was proposed in 1863 that the local registers should be abolished, and that Edinburgh should be made the central office, but that Glasgow should be allowed to retain its register as an exception to the rule. Several of the most distinguished members of the procurators of Glasgow, from whom that proposal emanated, dissented on the ground that it would be incompatible with a uniform national system, and that the facilities for searching would be lessened and the expense increased if so many of the registers were to be kept in Edinburgh and so many in Glasgow. I have thought it right to make these remarks in vindication of the course I have taken; but it cannot be disguised that the measure receives but little support from the representatives of Scotland, and as I am usually favoured with their cordial and kindly co-operation, I feel bound, in spite of my own strong feelings on the matter, to defer to their opinion. I have therefore come to the conclusion that the Bill had better be withdrawn in the meantime, and I hope that when we next return to the question we shall consider it on its merits, apart from personal or professional insinuations.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he would withdraw his Amendment.
